TO THE MOST HIGH AND MIGHTIE PRINCESSE ELIZABETH, BY THE GRACE OF GOD OF ENGLAND, Fraunce, and Ireland Queene, defender of the Faith, &c.

VNDER hope of your highneſſe gratious and accuſtomed fauor, I haue preſumed to preſent here vnto your Maieſtie, Plutarkes liues tranſlated, as a booke fit to be protected by your highneſſe, and meete to be ſet forth in Engliſh. For who is fitter to giue countenance to ſo many great ſtates, than ſuch an high and mightie Princeſſe? who is fitter to reuiue the dead memorie of their fame, than ſhe that beareth the liuely image of their vertues? who is fitter to authorize a worke of ſo great learning and wiſedome, than ſhe whom all do honor as the Muſe of the world? Therefore I humbly beſeech your Maieſtie, to ſuffer the ſimpleneſſe of my tranſlation, to be couered vnder the ampleneſſe of your highneſſe protection. For, moſt gracious Soueraigne, though this booke be no booke for your Maieſties ſelf, who are meeter to be the chiefe ſtorie, than a ſtudent therein, and can better vnderſtand it in Greeke, than any man can make it Engliſh: yet I hope the common ſort of your ſubiects, ſhall not onely profit them ſelues hereby, but alſo be animated to the better ſeruice of your Maieſtie. For among all the profane books that are in reputation at this day, there is none (your highneſſe beſt knowes) that teacheth ſo much honor, loue, obedience, reuerence, zeale, and deuotion to Princes, as theſe liues of Plutarke do. How many examples ſhall your ſubiectes reade here, of ſeuerall perſons, and whole armies, of noble and baſe, of young and old, that both by ſea and land, at home and abroad, haue ſtrayned their wits, not regarded their ſtates, ventured their perſons, caſt away their liues, not onely for the honor and ſafetie, but alſo for the pleaſure of their Princes?

Then well may the Readers thinke, if they haue done this for heathen kings, what ſhould we doe for Chriſtian Princes? If they haue done this for glorie, what ſhould we do for religion? If they haue done this without hope of heauen, what ſhould we do that looke for immortalitie? And ſo adding the encouragement of theſe examples, to the forwardneſſe of their owne diſpoſitions: what ſeruice is there in warre, what honor in peace, which they will not be readie to do, for their worthie Queene?

And therfore that your highnes may giue grace to the booke, and the booke may do his ſeruice to your Maieſtie: I haue tranſlated it out of French, and do here moſt humbly preſent the ſame vnto your highneſſe, beſeeching your Maieſtie with all humilitie, not to reiect the good meaning, but to pardon the errors of your moſt humble and obedient ſubiect and ſeruant, who prayeth God long to multiply all graces and bleſſings vpon your Maieſtie. VVritten the 16. day of Ianuarie. 1579.

Your Maieſties moſt humble and obedient ſeruant,

Thomas North.

TO

To the Reader.

THE profit of ſtories, and the praiſe of the Author, are ſufficiently declared by Amiot, in his Epiſtle to the Reader: ſo that I ſhall not neede to make many words therof. And indeed if you will ſupply the defects of this tranſlation, with your owne diligence and good vnderſtanding: you ſhall not neede to truſt him, you may proue your ſelues, that there is no prophane ſtudie better then Plutarke. All other learning is priuate, fitter for Vniuerſities then cities, fuller of contemplation than experience, more commendable in ſtudents themſelues, than profitable vnto others. Whereas ſtories are fit for euery place, reach to all perſons, ſerue for all times, teach the liuing, reuiue the dead, ſo farre excelling all other bookes, as it is better to ſee learning in noble mens liues, than to reade it in Philoſophers writings. Now for the Author, I will not denie but loue may deceiue me, for I muſt needes loue him with whom I haue taken ſo much paine: but I beleeue I might be bold to affirme, that he hath written the profitableſt ſtorie of all Authors. For all other were faine to take their matter, as the fortune of the countreys whereof they wrote fell out: But this man being excellent in wit, learning, and experience, hath choſen the ſpeciall actes of the beſt perſons, of the famouſeſt nations of the world. But I will leaue the iudgement to your ſelues. My onely purpoſe is to deſire you to excuſe the faults of my tranſlation, with your owne gentleneſſe, and with the opinion of my diligence and good intent. And ſo I wiſh you all the profite of the booke. Fare ye well. The foure and twentie day of Ianuarie. 1579.

THOMAS NORTH.

Amiot to the Readers.

THe reading of bookes which bring but a vaine and vnprofitable pleasure to the reader, is iustly misliked of wise and graue men. Againe, the reading of such as doe but only bring profit, and make the reader to be in lone therwith, and doe not ease the paine of the reading by some pleasantnes in the same: doe seeme somewhat harshe to diuerse delicate wits, that cannot tary long vpon them. But such bookes as yeeld pleasure & profit, and doe both delight and teach, haue all that a man can desire why they should be vniuersally liked and allowed of all sorts of men, according to the common saying of the Poet Horace:

That he which matcheth profit with delight,
Doth winne the price in euery poynt aright.

Either of these yeeld his effect the better, by reason the one runneth with the other, profiting the more because of the delight, and delighting the more because of the profit. This commendation (in my opinion) is most proper to the reading of stories, to haue pleasure and profit matched together, which kind of delight and teaching, meeting in this wise arme in arme, hath more allowance then any other kind of writing or inuention of man. In respect whereof it may be reasonably auowed, that men are more beholding to such good wittes, as by their graue and wise writing haue deserued the name of Historiographers, then they are to any other kind of writers: because an historie is an orderly register of notable things sayd, done, or happened in times past, to maintaine the continuall remembrance of them, and to serue for the instruction of them to come.

And like as memorie is as a storehouse of mens conceits and deuises, without the which the actions of the other two parts should be vnperfect, and wellneere vnprofitable: so may it also be sayed, that an historie is the very treasury of mans life, whereby the notable doings and sayings of men, & the wonderfull aduentures and strange cases, (which the long continuance of time bringeth forth) are preserued from the death of forgetfulnes. Hereupon it riseth that Plato the wise sayeth, that the name of historie was giuen to this recording of matters, to stay the fleeting of our memorie, which otherwise would be soone lost, and retaine litle. And we may well perceiue how greatly we be beholding vnto it, if we doe no more but consider in how horrible darkenes, and in how beastlie and pestilent a quamyre of ignorance we should be plunged: if the remembraunce of all the things that haue bene done, and haue happened before we were borne, were vtterly drowned and forgotten. Now therefore I will ouerpasse the excellencie and worthines of the thing it selfe, forasmuch as it is not onely of more antiquitie then any other kinde of writing that euer was in the world, but also was vsed among men, before there was any vse of letters at all: because that men in those daies deliuered in their life times the remembrance of things past to their successors, in songs, which they caused their children to learne by hart, from hand to hand, as is to be seen yet in our daies by the exãple of the barbarous people that inhabite the newfound landes in the VVest, who without anie records of writings, haue had the knowledge of things past, welneare eight hundreth yeares afore. Likwise I leaue to discourse, that it is the surest, safest, & durablest monument that men can leaue of their doings in this world, to cõsecrate their names to immortality. For there is neither picture, nor image of marble, nor arch of triumph, nor Pillar, nor sumptuous sepulcher, that can match the durablenesse of an eloquẽt history, furnished with the properties which it ought to haue. Againe, I mind not to stand much vpon this, that it hath a certaine troth in it, in that it alwayes professeth to speake truth, and for that the proper ground thereof is to treate of the greatest and highest things that are done in the world: insomuch that (to my seeming) the great profit thereof is as Horace saith, that it is commonly called the mother of troth and vprightnesse, which commendeth it so greatly, as it needeth not elsewhere to seeke any authoritie, or ornament of dignitie, but of her very selfe. For it is a certaine rule and instruction, which by examples past, teacheth vs to iudge of things present, and to foresee things to come: so as we may know what to like of, and what to follow, what to mislike, and what to eschue. It is a picture, which (as it were in a table) setteth before our eyes the things worthy of remembrance that haue bene done in old time by mighty nations, noble kings and Princes, wise gouernours, valiant Captaines, and persons renowmed for some notable quality, representing vnto vs the maners of strange nations, the lawes and customes of old time, the particular affaires of men, their consultations and enterprises, the means that they haue vsed to compasse thē withall, & their demeaning of them selues when they were come to the highest, or throwne down to the lowest degree of state. So as it is not possible for any case to rise either in peace or warre, in publike or priuate affaires, but that the person which shall haue diligently read, well conceiued, and throughly remembred histories, shall find matter in them whereat to take delight, and counsell whereby to resolue him selfe to take a part, or to giue aduice vnto others, how to chuse in doubtfull & dangerous cases that, which may be for their most profit, and in time to findout to what point the matter will come if it be well handled: and how to moderate him selfe in prosperitie, and how to cheare vp and beare him selfe in aduersitie. These things it doth with much greater grace, efficacie, and speed, than the bookes of morall Philosophie do: forasmuch as examples are of more force to moue and instruct, than are the arguments and proofes of reason, or their precise precepts, because examples be the very formes of our deedes, and accompanied with all circumstances. Whereas reasons and demonstrations are generall, and tend to the proofe of things, and to the beating of them into vnderstanding: and examples tend to the shewing of them in practise and execution, because they do not only declare what is to be done, but also work a desire to do it, as well in respect of a certaine naturall inclination which all men haue to follow examples, as also for the beautie of vertue, which is of such power, that wheresoeuer she is seene, she maketh her selfe to be loued and liked. Againe, it doth things with greater weight and grauitie, than the inuentions and deuises of the Poets: because it helpeth not it selfe with any other thing than with the plaine truth, whereas Poetry doth commonly inrich things by commending them aboue the starres and their deseruing, because the chiefe intent thereof is to delight. Moreouer, it doth things with more grace and modestie than the ciuill lawes and ordinances do: because it is more grace for a man to teach and instruct, than to chastise or punish. And yet for all this, an historie also hath his maner of punishing the wicked, by the reproch of euerlasting infamie, wherewith it defaceth their remembrance, which is a great meane to withdraw them from vice, who otherwise would be leudly and wickedly disposed. Likewise on the contrarie part, the immortall praise and glorie wherewith it rewardeth weldoers, is a very liuely and sharpe spurre for men of noble courage and gentlemanlike nature, to cause them to aduenture vpon all maner of noble and great things. For bookes are full of examples of men of high courage and wisedome, who for desire to continue the remembrance of their name, by the sure and certaine record of of histories, haue willingly yeelded their liues to the seruice of the common weale, spent their goods, sustained infinit paines both of bodie and mind in defence of the oppressed, in making common buildings, in stablishing of lawes and gouernments, and in the finding out of artes and sciences necessarie for the maintenance and ornament of mans life: for the faithfull registring whereof, the thanke is due to histories. And although true vertue seeke no reward of her commendable doings like a hireling, but contenteth her selfe with the conscience of her well doing: yet notwithstanding I am of opinion, that it is good and meete to draw men by all meanes to good doing, and good men ought not to be forbidden to hope for the honour of their vertuous deeds, seeing that honor doth naturally accompany vertue, as the shadow doth the body. For we commonly see, not to feele the sparkes of desire of honor, is an infallible signe of a base, vile and cloynish nature: and that such as account it an vnnecessarie, needlesse, or vnseemely thing to be praised, are likewise no doers of any things worthy of praise, but are commonly men of faint courage, whose thoughts extend no further than to their liues, whereof also they haue no further remembrance, than is before their eyes. But if the counsell of old men be to be greatly esteemed, because they must needes haue seene much by reason of their long life: and if they that haue trauelled long in strange countries, and haue had the managing of many affaires, and haue gotten great experience of the doings of this world, are reputed for sage, and worthy to haue the reynes of great gouernments put into their hands: how greatly is the reading of histories to be esteemed, which is able to furnish vs with more examples in one day, than the whole course of the longest life of any man is able to do? Insomuch that they which exercise them selues in reading as they ought to do, although they be but yong, become such in respect of vnderstanding of the affaires of this world, as if they were old and gray headed, and of long experience. Yea though they neuer haue remoued out of their houses, yet are they aduertised, informed, and satisfied of all things in the world, as well as they that haue shortened their liues by innumerable trauels and infinite daungers, in running ouer the whole earth that is inhabited: whereas on the contrary part, they that are ignorant of the things that were done and come to passe before they were borne, continue still as children, though they be neuer so aged, and are but as strangers in their owne natiue countreyes. To be short, it may be truly sayd, that the reading of histories is the schoole of wisedome, to fashion mens vnderstanding, by considering aduisedly the state of the world that is past, and by marking diligently by what lawes, maners, and discipline, Empires, kingdomes and dominions, haue in old time bene stablished, and afterward maintained and increased: or contrariwise changed, diminished, and ouerthrowen. Also we reade, that whensoeuer the right sage and vertuous Emperour of Rome, Alexander Seuerus, was to consult of any matter of great importance, whether it concerned warres or gouernment: he alwayes called such to counsell, as were reported to be well seene in histories. Notwithstanding I know there are that will stand against me in this point, and vphold that the reading of histories can serue to small purpose, or none at all, towards the getting of skill: because skill consisteth in action, and is ingendred by the very experience and practise of things, when a man doth well marke and throughly beare away the things that he hath seene with his eyes, and found true by proofe, according to the saying of the ancient Poet Afranius:

My name is Skill, my Syre Experience hight,
And Memorie bred and brought me foorth to light.

Which thing was meant likewise by the Philosopher that sayd, that the hand is the instrument of skill. By reason whereof it comes to passe (say they) that such as speake of matters of gouernment and state, but specially of matters of warre by the booke, speake but as booke knights, as the French prouerbe termeth them, after the maner of the Grecians, who call him a booke Pilot, which hath not the sure and certaine knowledge of the things that he speakes of: meaning thereby, that it is not for a man to trust to the vnderstanding which he hath gotten by reading, in things that consist in the deed doing, where the hand is to be set to the worke: no more then the often hearing of men talk and reason of painting, or the disputing vpon colors, without taking of the pensill in hand, can stand a man in any steed at all to make him a good painter. But on the contrary part, many haue proued wise men and good Captaines, which could neither write nor reade. Besides this, they alleage further, that in matters of warre, all things alter from yeare to yeare: by meanes whereof the slights and policies that are to be learned out of bookes, will serue the turne no more than mynes that are blowen vp. According whereunto Cambyses telleth his sonne Cyrus in Xenophon, that like as in Musicke the newest songs are commonly best liked of for once, because they were neuer heard afore: So in the warres, those pollicies that neuer were practised afore, are those that take best successe, & commonly haue the best effect, because the enemies do least doubt of them. Neuertheless I am not he that will maintaine that a wise gouernor of a common weale, or a great Captaine can be made of such a person, as hath neuer trauelled out of his study, and from his bookes: howbeit that which Cicero writeth of Lucius Lucullus, is true, that when he departed out of Rome as Captaine generall and Lieutenant of the Romanes, to make warre against king Mithridates, he had no experience at all of the warres, and yet afterward he bestowed so great diligence in the reading of histories, & in conferring vpon euery point with the old Captaines and men of long experience, whom he caried with him, that by the time of his comming into Asia, where he was in deede to put his matters in execution, he was found to be a very sufficient Captaine, as appeared by his deedes: in so much that by those wayes, cleane contrary to the common order of warre, he discomfited two of the most puissant, and greatest Princes that were at that time in the East. For his vnderstanding was so quicke, his care so vigilant, and his courage so great, that he needed no long trayning, nor grosse instruction by experience. And although I graunt there haue bene diuerse Gouernours and Captaines, which by the onely force of nature (furthered by long continued experience) haue done goodly and great exployts: yet can it not be denied me, but that if they had matched the giftes of nature with the knowledge of learning & the reading of histories, they might haue done much greater things, and they might haue become much more perfect. For like as in euery other cunning and skill wherein a man intendeth tendeth to excell: so also to become a perfect & sufficient person to gouerne in peace & warre, there are 3 things of necessity required, namely, nature, art, & practise. Nature (in the case we treate of) must furnish vs with a good mother wit, with a body well disposed to endure all maner of trauell, and with a good will to aduance our selues: Arte must giue vs iudgement and knowledge, gotten by the examples and wise discourses that we haue read & double read in good histories: and practise will get vs readines, assurednes, & the ease how to put things in execution. For though skill be the ruler of doing the deede, yet it is a vertue of the minde which teacheth a man the meane poynt betweene the two faultie extreamities of too much & too litle, wherein the commendation of all doings consisteth. And whosoeuer he is that goeth about to attaine to it by the onely tryall of experience, and had rather learne it at his owne cost, than at another mans: he may well be of the number of those that are touched by this auncient prouerbe, which sayth, Experience is the schoolemistresse of fooles: because mans life is so short, and experience is hard and dangerous, specially in matters of warre, wherin (according to the saying of Tamachus the Athenian Captaine) a man can not faulte twice, because the faultes are so great, that most commonly they bring with them the ouerthrow of the state, or losse of the liues of those that doe them. Therefore we must not tarie for this wit that is wonne by experience, which costeth so deare, and is so long in comming, that a man is oft times dead in the seeking of it before he haue attained it, so as he had neede of a second life to imploy it in, because of the ouerlate comming by it. But we must make speede by our diligent and continuall reading of histories both old and new, that we may enioy this happinesse which the Poet speaketh of:

Three things necessary for a Magistrate, or Captaine.

Prouerbe.

A happie wight is he that by mishappes
Of others, doth beware of afterclappes.

By the waye, as concerning those that say that paper will beare all things: if there be any that vnworthylie take vppon them the name of Historiographers, and doe deface the dignitie of the storie for hatred or fauour, by mingling any vntruth with it: that is not the faulte of the historie, but of the men that are partiall, who doe abuse that name vnworthylie, to couer and cloake their owne passions withall, which thing shall neuer come to passe, if the writer of the storie haue the properties that are necessarilie required in a storie-writer, as these: That he set aside all affection, be voyde of enuie, hatred, and flatterie: that he be a man experienced in the affayres of the world, of good vtteraunce and iudgement, to discerne what is to be sayed and what to be left vnsayed, and what would doe more harme to haue it declared, than doe good to haue it reproued or condemned: forasmuch as his chiefe drift ought to be to serue the common weale, and that he is but as a register to set downe the iudgementes and definitiue sentences of goddes Court, whereof some are giuen according to the ordinarie course and capacitie of our weake naturall reason, and other some goe according to gods infinite power and incomprehensible wisedome, aboue and against all discourse of mans vnderstanding, who being vnable to reach to the bottome of his iudgementes and to finde out the first motions and groundes thereof, doe impute the cause of them to a certaine fortune, which is nought else but a fained deuise of mans wit, dazeled at the beholding of such brightnesse, and confounded at the gazing of so bottomlesse a deepe, howbeit, nothing commeth to passe nor is done without the leaue of him that is the verie right and truth it selfe, with whom nothing is paste or come, and who knoweth and vnderstandeth the verie originall causes of all necessitie. The consideration whereof teacheth men to humble themselues vnder his mightie hande by acknowledging that there is one first cause which ouerruleth nature, whereof it commeth, that neither hardinesse is all wayes happie, nor wisedome all wayes sure of good successe. These so notable commodities are euerie where accompanied with singular delights, which proceedeth chiefly of diuersitie and noueltie wherein our nature delighteth and is greatly desirous of: because wee hauing an earnest inclination towards our best prosperitie and aduancement, it goth on still seeking it in euery thing which it taketh to be goodly, or good in this world. But forasmuch as it findeth not wherewith to content it selfe vnder the cope of heauen, it is soone wearie of the things that it had earnestly desired before, and so goeth on wandering in the vnskilfullnesse of her likings whereof she neuer ceasseth to make a continuall changing vntill she haue fully satisfied her desires, by attayning to the last end, which is to be knit to her chiefe felicity, where is the full perfection of all goodlines and goodnes. This liking of variety cannot be better releeued, than by that which is the finder-

out and the preſeruer of time, the father of all noueltie, and meſſenger of antiquitie. For if we finde a certaine ſingular pleaſure, in harkening to ſuch as be returned from ſome long voyage, and do report things which they haue ſeene in ſtrange coũtries, as the maners of people, the natures of places, and the fashions of liues, differing from ours: and if we be ſometime ſo rauished with delight and pleaſure at the hearing of the talke of ſome wiſe, diſcreete, and well ſpoken olde man, from whoſe mouth there floweth a ſtreame of ſpeech ſweeter than honny, in rehearſing the aduentures which he hath had in his greene & youthfull yeares, the paines that he hath endured, and the perils that he hath ouerpaſſed, ſo as we perceiue not howe the time goeth away: howe much more ought we to be rauished with delight and wondering, to behold the ſtate of mankind, & the true ſucceſſe of things, which antiquitie hath and doth bring forth from the beginning of the world, as the ſetting vp of Empires, the ouerthrow of Monarchies, the riſing and falling of kingdomes, and all things els worthie admiration, & the ſame liuely ſet forth in the faire, rich, and true table of eloquence? And that ſo liuely, as in the very reading of them we feele our mindes to be ſo touched by them, not as though the things were already done and paſt, but as though they were euen then preſently in doing, and we finde our ſelues caried away with gladneſſe & griefe through feare or hope, well neare as though we were then at the doing of them: whereas notwithſtanding we be not in any paine or danger, but onely conceiue in our mindes the aduerſities that other folkes haue endured, our ſelues ſitting ſafe with our contentation and eaſe, according to thoſe verſes of the Poet Lucretius.

It is a pleaſure for to ſit at eaſe
Vpon the land, a nd ſafely for to ſee
How other folkes are toſſed on the ſeaes, That with the bluſtring windes turmoyled be.
Not that the ſight of others miſeries Doth any way the honeſt hart delight,
But for becauſe it liketh well our eyes,
To ſee harmes free that on our ſelues might light.

Alſo it is ſeene that the reading of hiſtories doth ſo holde and allure good wits, that diuers times it not onely maketh them to forget all other pleaſures, but alſo ſerueth very fitly to turne away their griefes, and ſometimes alſo to remedie their diſeaſes. As for example, we find it written of Alphonſus king of Naples, that Prince ſo greatly renowned in Chronicles for his wiſedome and goodneſſe, that being ſore ſicke in the city of Capua, when his Phiſicions had ſpent all the cunning that they had to recouer him his health, and he ſaw that nothing preuailed: he determined with himſelfe to take no mo medicins, but for his recreation cauſed the ſtorie of Quintus Curtius, concerning the deeds of Alexander the great, to be read before him: at the hearing whereof he tooke ſo wonderfull pleaſure, that nature gathered ſtrength by it, and ouercame the waywardnes of his diſeaſe. Whereupon hauing ſoone recouered his health, he diſcharged his Phiſitions with ſuch words as theſe: Feaſt me no more with your Hippocrates and Galene, ſith they can no skill to helpe me to recouer my health: but well fare Quintus Curtius that could ſo good skill to helpe me to recouer my health. Now if the reading & knowledge of hiſtories be delightfull and profitable to all other kind of folke: I ſay it is much more for great Princes and Kings, becauſe they haue to do with charges of greateſt weight and difficultie, to be beſt ſtored with giftes and knowledge for the diſcharge of their duties: ſeeing the ground of ſtories is, to treate of all maner of high matters of ſtate, as warres, battels, cities, coũtries, treaties of peace and alliances, and therefore it ſeemeth more fit for them, than for any other kind of degrees of men: becauſe they being bred and brought vp tenderly, and at their eaſe, by reaſon of the great regard and care that is had of their perſons (as meet is for ſo great ſtates to haue) they take not ſo great paines in their youth for the learning of things as behoueth thoſe to take which will learne the noble ancient languages, and the painefull doctrine comprehended in Philoſophie. Againe when they come to mans ſtate, their charge calleth thẽ to deale in great affaires, ſo as there remaineth no exerciſe of wit more conuenient for thẽ, than the reading of hiſtories in their own tongue, which without paine is able to teach them euen with great pleaſure and eaſe, whatſoeuer the painefull workes of the Philſophers concerning the gouernment of common wealthes can shewe them, to make them skilfull in the well ruling & gouerning of the people and coũtries that God hath put vn-

der their ſubiection. But the worſt is, that they euer (or for the moſt part) haue ſuch maner of perſons about them as ſeeke nothing els but to pleaſe them by all the wayes they can, and there are verie few that dare tell them the truth freely in all things: whereas on the contrary part, an hiſtory flattereth them not, but layeth open before their eyes the faults and vices of ſuch as were like them in greatneſſe of degree. And therefore Demetrius Phalerius (a man renowmed aſwell for his skill in the good gouernment of a common weale, as for his excellent knowledge otherwiſe) counſelled Ptolomy, firſt king of Aegypt after the death of Alexander the great, that he ſhould often and diligently reade the bookes that treated of the gouernment of kingdoms, becauſe (ſaid he) thou ſhalt find many things there, which thy ſeruantes and familiar friends dare not tell thee. Moreouer this is another thing, that ſuch great perſonages cannot eaſily trauell out of the bounds of their dominions, to goe view ſtrange countries as priuate perſons doe: becauſe the iealouſie of their eſtate, and the regard of their dignity, requires that they ſhould neuer be in place where another man might cõmand them. And oftentimes for want of hauing ſeene the countries, and known the people and Princes that are their neighbours, they haue aduentured vpon attempts without good ground: to auoide the which, the inſtruction they may haue by the reading of hiſtories, is one of the eaſieſt & fitteſt remedies that can be found. And though there were none other cauſe then onely this laſt, ſurely it ought to induce Princes to the often and diligent reading of hiſtories, wherein are written the heroicall deedes of wiſe and valiant men, ſpecially of kings that haue bene before them, the conſideration whereof may cauſe them to be deſirous to become like them, ſpecially which were of ſtately and noble courage: becauſe the ſeedes of Princely vertues that are bred with themſelues, doe then quicken them vp with an emulation towards thoſe that haue bene or are equall in degree with them, aſwell in reſpect of noblenes of blood, as of greatnes of ſtate, ſo as they be loth to giue place to any perſon, and much leſſe can find in their harts to be outgone in glory of vertuous doings. Whereof innumerable examples might be alleadged, if the thing were not ſo well knowen of it ſelfe, that it were much more againſt reaſon to doubt of it, than needfull to proue it. Therfore a man may truly conclude, that an hiſtorie is the ſchoolemiſtriſſe of Princes, at whoſe hand they may without paine, in way of paſtime, and with ſingular pleaſure learne the moſt part of the things that belong to their office. Now, according to the diuerſitie of the matter that it treateth of, or the order and maner of writing that it vſeth, it hath ſundry names giuen vnto it: But yet among the reſt there are two chiefe kinds. The one which ſetteth downe mens doings and aduentures at length, is called by the common name of an hiſtorie: the other which declareth their natures, ſayings, & maners, is properly named their liues. And although the ground of them both do cloze very neare in one, yet doth the one reſpect more the things, and the other the perſons: the one is more common, and the other more priuate: the one concerneth more the things that are without the man, and the other the things that proceed from within: the one the euents, the other the conſultations: betweene the which there is oftentimes great oddes, according to the anſwer of the Perſian Siramnes, to ſuch as maruelled how it came to paſſe, that his deuiſes being ſo politicke had ſo vnhappy ſucceſſe: It is (quoth he) becauſe my deuiſes are wholly frõ my own inuention, but the effects of them are in the diſpoſition of fortune & the king. And ſurely among all thoſe that euer haue taken vpon them to write the names of famous men, the chiefe prerogatiue, by the iudgement of ſuch as are cleareſt ſighted, is iuſtly giuen to the Greeke Philoſopher Plutarke, borne in the citie of Chæronea in the country of Bœotia, a nobleman, perfect in all rare knowledge, as his workes may well put men out of doubt, if they liſt to read them throughout, who all his life long euen to his olde age, had to deale in affaires of the common weale, as he himſelfe witneſſeth in diuers places, ſpecially in the treatiſe which he intituled, Whether an olde man ought to meddle with the gouernment of a common weale or not: and who had the hap & honor to be ſchoolmaiſter to the Emperor Traian, as is commonly beleeued, and as is expreſsly pretended in a certaine Epiſtle ſet before the Latine tranſlation of his matters of ſtate, (which to ſay the truth) ſeemeth in my iudgement to be ſomewhat ſuſpitious, becauſe I find it not among his works in Greeke, beſides that it ſpeaketh as though the booke were dedicated to Traian, which thing is manifeſtly diſproued by the beginning of the booke, and by diuers other reaſons. Yet notwithſtanding becauſe me thinks it is ſagely & grauely written, and well beſeeming him: I haue ſet it downe heere in this place. Plutarke vnto Traian ſendeth greeting. I know well that the modeſtie of your nature was not deſirous of Some-

« raignтie, though you haue alwayes indeuored to deſerue it by your honorable conuerſation: by reaſon « whereof you haue bene thought ſo much the worthier of it, as you haue bene found the further off « from all ambition. And therefore I do now reioyce in your vertue & my fortune, if it be ſo great as « to cauſe you to adminiſter that thing with iuſtice, which you haue obtained by deſert. For otherwiſe « I am ſure you haue put your ſelfe in hazard of great dangers, and me in perill of ſlanderous tongues, « becauſe that Rome cannot away with a wicked Emperour, and the common voice of the people is al- « wayes wont to caſt the faultes of the ſchollers in the teeth of their ſchoolemaiſters: as for example: « Seneca is rayled vpon by ſlanderous tongues, for the faults of his ſcholler Nero: the ſcapes of Quinti- « lians young ſchollers are imputed to Quintilian himſelfe: and Socrates is blamed for being too mild « to his hearers. But as for you, there is hope you ſhall doe all things well enough ſo you keepe you as you « are. If you firſt ſet your ſelfe in order, and then diſpoſe all other things according to vertue, all things « ſhall fall out according to your deſire. I haue ſet you downe the meanes in writing, which you muſt « obſerue for the well gouerning of your common weale, and haue ſhewed vnto you of how great force « your behauior may be in that behalfe. If you thinke good to follow thoſe things, you haue Plutarke « for the director & guider of your life: if not, I proteſt vnto you by this Epiſtle, that your falling into « danger to the ouerthrow of the Empire, is not by the doctrine of Plutarke. This Epiſtle witneſſeth plainly that he was the ſchoolemaiſter of Traian, which thing ſeemeth to be auowed by this writing of Suidas: Plutarke being borne in the citie of Chæronea in Bœotia, was in the time of the Emperour Traian, and ſomewhat before. But Traian honored him with the dignity of Conſulship, and commaunded the officers and magiſtrates that were throughout all the country of Illyria, that they ſhould not doe any thing without his counſell and authoritie. So doth Suidas write of him. And I am of opinion, that Traian being ſo wiſe an Emperour, would neuer haue done him ſo great honor, if he had not thought himſelf greatly beholding to him for ſome ſpeciall cauſe. But the thing that maketh me moſt to beleeue it true, is, that the ſame goodneſſe and iuſtice appeared to be naturally imprinted in moſt of Traians ſayings and doings, whereof the patterne and mould (as a man might terme it) is caſt and ſet downe in Plutarkes Morals, ſo as men may perceiue expreſly, that the one could well skill to performe rightly, that which the other had taught wiſely. For Dion writeth, that among other honors which the Senate of Rome gaue by decree vnto Traian, they gaue him the title of the Good Emperour. And Eutropius reporteth that euen vnto his time, when a new Emperour came to be receiued of the Senate, among the tries of good hanſell, and the wiſhes of good lucke that were made vnto him, one was: happier be thou than Auguſtus, and better than Traian. Howſoeuer the caſe ſtood, it is very certaine that Plutarke dedicated the collection of his Apothegmes vnto him. But when he had liued a long time at Rome, and was come home againe to his owne houſe, he fell to writing of this excellent worke of Liues, which he calleth Parallelon, as much to ſay, as a coupling or matching together, becauſe he matcheth a Grecian with a Romane, ſetting downe their liues each after other, and comparing them together, as he found any likeneſſe of nature, conditions, or aduentures betwixt them, and examining what the one of them had better or worſer, greater or leſſer than the other: which things he doth with ſo goodly and graue diſcourſe euery where, taken out of the deepeſt and moſt hidden ſecrets of morall and naturall Philoſophy, with ſo ſage precepts & fruteſull inſtructions, with ſo effectuall commendation of vertue, and deteſtation of vice, with ſo many goodly allegations of other authors, with ſo many fit comparisons, & with ſo many high inuentions: that the booke may better be called by the name of the Treaſory of all rare & perfect learning, than by any other name. Alſo it is ſayd, that Theodarus Gaza, a Grecian of ſingular learning, and a worthie of the auncient Greece, being asked on a time by his familiar friends (which ſaw him ſo earneſtly giuen to his ſtudie, that he forget all other things) what author he had leuereſt to chuſe, if he were at that peint that he muſt needes chuſe ſome one to hold him to alone, did aunſwere, that he would chuſe Plutarke: becauſe that if they were all put together, there was no one both ſo profitable, and ſo pleaſant to reade, as he. Soſſius Senecio to whom he dedicateth his worke, was a Senatour of Rome, as witneſſeth Dion, who writeth that the three perſons whom Traian moſt loued and honoured, were Soſſius, Parma, and Celſus, inſomuch that he cauſed images of them to be ſet vp. « True it is that he wrote the liues of many other mẽ, which the ſpiteſulnes of the time hath bereft vs of, among which he himſelfe maketh mention of the liues of Scipio Africanus, & Metellus Numidi-

cus. And I haue read a litle Epiſtle of a ſonne of his, whoſe name is not expreſſed, copied out of an old copie in the Librarie of S. Marke in Venice, wherein he writeth to a friend of his, a regiſter of all the bookes that his father made: and there among the couples of lines, he ſetteth downe the liues of Scipio and Epaminondas, and laſtly the liues of Auguſtus Cæſar, of Tiberius, of Caligula, of Claudius, of Nero, of Galba, of Vitellius, and of Otho. But hauing vſed all the diligence that I could in ſearching the chiefe Libraries of Venice, and Rome, I could neuer finde them out. Onely I drewe out certaine diuerſities of readings, and many corrections, by conferring the old written copies with the printed bookes: which haue ſtood me in great ſtead to the vnderſtanding of many hard places: and there are a great number of them which I haue reſtored by coniecture, by the iudgement and helpe of ſuch men of this age, as are of greateſt knowledge in humane learning. Yet for all this, there remaine ſome places vnamended, howbeit very few, becauſe ſome lines were wanting in the originall copies, whereof (to my ſeeming) it was better for me to witneſſe the want by marking it with ſome ſtarre: than to gueſſe at it with all aduenture, or to adde any thing to it. Now finally, if I haue ouershot my ſelfe in any thing, as it is verie eaſie to do in ſo hard and long a worke, ſpecially to a man of ſo ſmall abilitie as I am: I beſeech the Readers, to vouchſafe for my diſchatge, to admit the excuſe which the Poet Horace giueth me, where he ſayth:

A man may well be ouerſeene
In workes that long and tedious beene.

Specially ſith that of ſo many good men, and men of skill as haue heretofore ſet hand to the tranſlating of it, there was neuer yet any one found that went through with it in any language, at leaſt wiſe that I haue ſeene or heard of: and that ſuch as haue enterpriſed to tranſlate it, ſpecially into Latine, haue euidently witneſſed the hardneſſe thereof, as they may eaſily perceiue which liſt to conferre their tranſlations with mine. Neuertheleſſe if it ſo fortune that men find not the ſpeech of this tranſlation ſo flowing, as they haue found ſome other of mine, that are abrode in mens hands: I beſeech the readers to conſider, that the office of a fit tranſlator, conſiſteth not onely in the faithfull expreſſing of his authors meaning: but alſo in a certaine reſembling and ſhadowing out of the forme of his ſtyle, and the maner of his ſpeaking: vnleſſe he will commit the error of ſome painters, who hauing taken vpon them to draw a man liuely, do paint him long where he ſhould be ſhort, and groſſe where he ſhould be ſlender, and yet ſet out the reſemblance of his countenance naturally. For how harſh or rude ſoeuer my ſpeech be, yet am I ſure that my tranſlation will be much eaſier to my countrimen, than the Greeke copie is, euen to ſuch as are beſt practiſed in the Greeke tongue, by reaſon of Plutarkes peculiar maner of inditing, which is rather ſharpe, learned, and ſhort, than plaine, polished, and eaſie. At the hardeſt, although I haue not compaſſed my matters ſo happily as ye could haue wiſhed and deſired: yet do I hope that your Lordſhips in reading it will hold the parties good will excuſed, which hath taken ſuch paines in doing of it to profit you. And if my labour be ſo happie, as to content you: God be praiſed for it, which hath giuen me the grace to finish it.

THE LIVES OF THE NOBLE GREEKES AND ROMAINES, THE MOST OF THEM COMPARED together by that graue learned Philosopher and Historiographer PLVTARCH of Chœronea.

Theseus.

LIKE as the historiographers which do set forth the description of the earth in figure (my friend Sossius Senecio) are wont to place in the lowermost part of their mappes, the farre distant regions vnknowne vnto them, and to marke in the margent such like notes and reasons as these: beyond these countreyes are nothing but deepe drye sands without water, full of foule ill fauoured venimous beasts, or much mudde vnnauigable, or SCYTHIA forsaken for cold, or else the sea frosen with Ise. Euen so in this my historie, I could speake of strange things and more ancient, and further off from mens memorie. But herein I haue compared the liues of some noble men, the one with the other, hauing followed all those times, whereof the monuments remaine yet so whole, that men may speake of verie great likelihood, or rather write a very troth. What hath bin written before, is but of strange faynings, and full of monstrous fables, imagined and deuised by Poets, which are altogether vncertaine, and most vntrue. Howbeit hauing heretofore set foorth the liues of Lycurgus (which established the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and of king Numa Pompilius, me thought I might with reason also asced vnto the time of Romulus, sithens I was come so neere Sossius Senecio a Senatour of Rome.

vnto his time. Wherfore hauing long debated with my ſelfe what Æſchilus the Poet ſayd:

VVhat champion may with ſuch a man compare?
or who (thinke I) ſhalbe againſt him ſet?
VVho is ſo bold? or who is he that dare defend his force, in ſuch encounter met?

In the end I reſolued, to compare him which did ſet vp the noble and famous citie of ATHENS, vnto him which founded the glorious and inuincible cittie of ROME. Wherein I would haue wiſhed, that the fables of her antiquity had beene ſet out ſo in our writings, that we might yet haue graced them with ſome apparance of hiſtoricall narration. But if by chance in ſome places they range a litle to boldly out of the boundes or limites of true apparance, and haue no manner of conformity with any crediblenes of matter: the readers in curteſie muſt needes hold me excuſed, accepting in good part that which may be written, and reported, of things ſo extreamely old and ancient. Now ſurely me thinkes, that Theſeus in many things was much like vnto Romulus. For being both begotten by ſtealth, and out of lawfull matrimony, they were both bruted to be borne of the ſeede of gods.

Theſeus and Romulus very like.

Both valiant were, as all the world doth know.

Both were very wiſe, and ſtrong beſides of body. The one of them built ROME, and the other the city of ATHENS, two of the moſt noble cities of the world. The one and the other were rauiſhers of women: and neither the one nor the other could auoid the miſchiefe of quarell and contention with their friends, and to defile themſelues with the bloud of their neareſt kinſemen. Moreouer, they ſay that both the one and the other in the end, did get the hate and ill will of their citizens. At the leaſt if we beleeue thoſe things which are left written, and cary greateſt ſhow of troth, Theſeus of his fathers ſide, was deſcended of the right linage of Erichtheus the great, & of the firſt inhabitants which occupied the countrey of ATTICA, the which ſince were called AVTOCTHONES, as much to ſay, as born of themſelues. For there is no memory, or other mention made, that they came out of any other countrey then that. And of his mothers ſide he came of Pelops, who was in his time the mightieſt King of al the countrey of PELOPONNESVS, not ſo much for his goods and riches, as for the number of children which he had. For his daughters which were many in number, he beſtowed them on the greateſt Lords of all the couutrey: his ſonnes alſo, which likewiſe were many, he diſperſed into euery city and free towne, finding meanes to make them gouernours and heads of the ſame. Pitheus, granfather to Theſeus on the mother ſide, was one that founded the litle city of TROEZEN, & was reputed to be one of the beſt learned and wiſeſt men of his time. But the knowledge and wiſedome, which onely carried eſtimation at that time, conſiſted altogether in graue ſentences and morall ſayings. As thoſe are, which wan the Poet Heſiodus ſuch fame for his booke intituled, The works and dayes: in the which is read euen at this preſent, this goodly ſentence, which they father vpon Pitheus.

The linage of Theſeus.

Pelops King of Peloponneſus.

Pitheus, the grandfather of Theſeus. The wiſdome of Pitheus.

Thou ſhalt performe, thy promiſe and thy pay:
to hired men, and that without delay.

And this doth Ariſtotle the Philoſopher himſelfe teſtifie: and the Poet Euripides alſo, calling Hippolytus the ſcoller of the holy Pitheus, doth ſufficiently declare of what eſtimation he was. But AEgeus deſiring (as they ſay) to know how he might haue children, went vnto the city of DELPHES to the oracle of Apollo: where, by a Nunne of the temple, this notable prophecie was giuen him for an aunſwer. The which did forbid him to touch or know any woman, vntill he was returned againe to ATHENS. And becauſe the words of this prophecy were ſomewhat darke, and hard, he returued by the city of TROEZEN, to tell it vnto Pitheus. The words of the prophecy were theſe.

AEgeus the father of Theſeus.

O thou which art a gemme of perfect grace, plucke not the tappe out of thy truſty tunne: Before thou do, returne vnto thy place, in Athens towne, from whence thy race doth runne.

Pitheus vnderſtanding the meaning, perſwaded him, or rather cunningly by ſome deuiſe deceiued him, in ſuch ſort, that he made him to lie with his daughter called AEthra. AEgeus, after ter he had accompanied with her, knowing that she was Pitheus daughter with whom he had lyen, and douting that he had gotten her with child: left her a sword and a payre of shoes, the which he hidde vnder a great hollow stone, the hollownes wherof serued iust to receiue those things which he layde vnder it, and made no liuing creature priuie to it but her alone, straightly charging her, that if she happened to haue a sonne, when he were come to mans state, and of strength to remoue the stone, and to take those things from vnder it which he left there: that she should then sende him vnto him by those tokens, as secretly as she could, that no body els might know of it. For he did greatly feare the children of one called Pallas, the which lay in wayte and spyall by all the meanes they could to kill him, only of despight because he had no children, they being fiftie brethren, and all begotten of one father. This done, he departed from her. And AEthra within few moneths after was deliuered of a goodly sonne, the which frō that time was called Theseus: & as some say, so called, because of the tokens of knowledge his father had layd vnder the stone. Yet some others write, that it was afterwards at ATHENS when his father knew him, and auowed him for his sonne. But in the meane time, during his infancie & childhood, he was brought vp in the house of his granfather Pitheus, vnder the gouernmēt & teaching of one called Connidas, his schoolemaster: in honor of whom the ATHENIANS to this day doe sacrifice a weather, the day before the great feast of Theseus, hauing more reason to honour the memorie of this gouernour, then of a Silanion and of a Parrhasius, to whom they doe honour also, because they painted and cast mowldes of the images of Theseus. Now there was a custome at that time in GREECE, that the yong men after their infancy and growth to mans state, went vnto the citie of DELPHES, to offer part of their haires in the temple of Apollo. Theseus also went thither as other did: and some say that the place where the ceremonie of this offering was made, hath euer since kept the olde name, (and yet continueth) Theseia. Howbeit he did not shaue his head but before onely, as Homer sayth, like the fashion of the ABANTES in olde time: and this manner of shauing of haires, was called for his sake, Theseida. And as concerning the ABANTES, in trothe they were the very first that shaued them selues after this fashion: neuertheless they learned it not of the ARABIANS as it was thought of some, neither did they it after the imitation of the MISSIANS. But because they were warlicke and valiant men, which did ioyne neere vnto their enemie in battell, and aboue all men of the worlde were skilfullest in fight hande to hand, and would keepe their ground: as the Poet Archilochus witnesseth in these verses.

They vse no slynges in foughten fields to haue, nor bended bowes: but swords and trenchant blades.
For when fierce Mars beginneth for to raue, in bloudy field: then euery man inuades His fiercest foe, and fighteth hand to hand, then doe they deedes, right cruell to recompt.
For in this wise, the braue and warlike bande doe shew their force which come from Negrepont.

The cause why they were thus shauen before, was, for that their enemies should not haue the vauntage to take them by the hayres of the head while they were fighting. And for this selfe same consideration, Alexander the great commanded his captaines to cause all the MACEDONIANS to shaue their beards: because it is the easiest holde (and readiest for the hand) a man can haue of his enemie in fighting, to hold him fast by the same. But to returne to Theseus. AEthra his mother had euer vnto thar time kept it secret from him, who was his true father. And Pitheus also had giuen it out abroad, that he was begotten of Neptune, because the TROEZENIANS haue this god in great veneration, and doe worship him as patron and protector of their citie, making offerings to him of their first fruits: and they haue for the marke and stamp of their money, the three picked mace, which is the signe of Neptune, called his Trident. But after he was come to the prime and lustines of his youth, and that with the strength of his body he shewed a great courage, ioyned with a natural wisedome, and stayednes of wit: then his mother brought him to the place where this great hollow stone lay, and telling him truely the order of his birth, and by whom he was begotten, made him to take his fathers tokens of knowledge, which he had hidden there, & gaue him counsell to go by sea to ATHENS vnto him. Theseus easily lift vp the stone, and tooke his fathers tokens from vnder it: Howbeit he answered plainely, that he would not goe by sea, notwithstanding that it was a great deale the safer way, and that his mother and grandfather both had instantly intreated him, because the way by lande from TROEZEN to ATHENS was very daungerous, all the wayes being beset by robbers and murderers. For the world at that time brought forth men, which for strongnesse in their armes, for swiftnesse of feete, and for a generall strength of the whole bodie, did farre passe the common force of others, and were neuer wearie for any labour or trauell they tooke in hand. But for all this, they neuer employed these gifts of nature to any honest or profitable thing, but rather delighted villanously to hurt and wrong others: as if all the fruit and profite of their extraordinary strength had consisted in crueltie, and violence onely, and to be able to keepe others vnder and in subiection, and to force, destroy, and spoyle all that came to their handes. Thinking that the more part of those which thinke it a shame to doe ill, and commende iustice, equitie, and humanitie, doe it of faint cowardly hearts, because they dare not wrong others, for feare they shoulde receiue wrong themselues: and therefore, that they which by might could haue vantage ouer others, had nothing to doe with such quiet qualities. Now Hercules, trauelling abroade in the world, draue away many of those wicked theeuish murderers, and some of them he slew and put to death, other as he passed through those places where they kept, did hide themselues for feare of him, and gaue place: in so much as Hercules, perceiuing they were well tamed and brought low, made no further reckoning to pursue them any more. But after that by fortune he had slaine Iphitus with his owne handes, and that hee was passed ouer the seas into the countrie of LYDIA, where he serued Queene Omphale a long time, condemning himselfe vnto that voluntarie paine, for the murder he had committed. All the Realme of LYDIA during his abode there, remained in great peace and securitie from such kinde of people. Howbeit in GREECE, and all thereabouts, these old mischiefes beganne againe to renew, growing hotter and violenter then before: because there was no man that punished them, nor that durst take vpon him to destroy them. By which occasion, the way to goe from PELOPONNESVS to ATHENS by lande was very perillous. And therefore Pitheus declaring vnto Theseus, what manner of theeues there were that lay in the way, and the outrages and villanies they did to all trauellers and wayfaring men, sought the rather to perswade him thereby to take his voyage along the seas. Howbeit in mine opinion, the fame and glory of Hercules noble deedes, had long before secretly set his heart on fire, so that hee made reckoning of none other but of him, and louingly hearkened vnto those which would seeme to describe him what manner of man he was, but chiefely vnto those which had seene him, and beene in his companie, when he had layd any done any thing worthy of memorie. For then he did manifestly open himselfe, that he felt the like passion in his heart, which Themistocles long time afterwardes endured, when he saide: that the victorie and triumph of Miltiades would not let him sleepe. For euen so, the wonderfull admiration which Theseus had of Hercules courage, made him in the night that he neuer dreamed but of his noble actes and doings, and in the day time, pricked forwardes with emulation and enuie of his glorie, he determined with himselfe one day to doe the like, and the rather, because they were neere kinsemen, being cosins remooued by the mother side. For Aethra was the daughter of Pitheus, and Alcmena (the mother of Hercules) was the daughter of Lysidices, the which was halfe sister to Pitheus, both children of Pelops and of his wife Hippodamia. So he thought he should be vtterly shamed and disgraced, that Hercules trauelling through the world in that sort, did seeke out those wicked theeues to ridde both sea and land of them: and that he, farre otherwise, should fly occasion that might be offered him, to fight with them that he should meete on his way. Moreouer, he was of opinion, he should greatly shame and dishonour him, whom fame and common bruite of people reported to be his father: if in shunning occasion to fight, he should conuey himselfe by sea, and should carrie to his true father also a paire of shooes, (to make him knowen of him) and a sword not yet bathed in bloud. Where he should rather seeke cause, by manifest token of his worthy deedes, to make knowen to the world, worlde, of what noble bloud he came, and from whence he was deſcended. With this determination, Theſeus holdeth on his purpoſed iourney, with intent to hurt no man, yet to defend himſelfe, and to be reuenged of thoſe which would take vpon them to aſſault him. The firſt therefore whom he ſlewe within the territories of the citie of EPIDAVRVM, was a robber called Periphetes. This robber vſed for his ordinarie weapon to carrie a clubbe, and for that cauſe he was commonly ſurnamed Corynetes, that is to ſay, a clubbe carrier. So he firſt ſtrake at Theſeus to make him ſtande: but Theſeus fought ſo luſtely with him, that he killed him. Whereof he was ſo glad, and chiefly for that he had wonne his clubbe, that euer after he caryed it himſelfe about with him, as Hercules did the Lyons skinne. And like as this ſpoyle of the Lyon did witneſſe the greatnes of the beaſt which Hercules had ſlaine: euen ſo Theſeus went all about, ſhewing that this clubbe which he had gotten out of anothers hands, was in his owne handes inuincible. And ſo going on further, in the ſtreightes of PELOPONNESVS he killed another, called Sinnis ſurnamed Pityocamtes, that is to ſay, a wreather or bower of pine apple trees: whom he put to death in that ſelfe cruell manner that Sinnis had ſlaine many other trauellers before. Not that he had experience thereof, by any former practiſe or exerciſe: but onely to ſhew, that cleane ſtrength could doe more, then either art or exercise. This Sinnis had a goodly faire daughter called Perigouna, which fled away, when ſhe ſawe her father ſlaine: whom he followed and ſought all about. But ſhe had hidden her ſelfe in a groue full of certaine kindes of wilde pricking ruſhes called Stœbe, and wild ſparage, which ſhe ſimply like a childe intreated to hide her, as if they had heard, and had ſenſe to vnderſtande her: promiſing them with an oath, that if they ſaued her from being found, ſhee would neuer cut them downe, nor burne them. But Theſeus finding her, called her, and ſware by his faith he would vſe her gently, and doe her no hurt, nor diſpleaſure at all. Vpon which promiſe ſhe came out of the buſh, and lay with him, by whom ſhee was conceiued of a goodly boy, which was called Menalippus. Afterwardes Theſeus maried her vnto one Deioneus, the ſonne of Euritus the Oechalian. Of this Menalippus, the ſonne of Theſeus, came Ioxus: the which with Ornytus brought men into the Countrie of CARIA, where he built the Citie of IOXIDES. And hereof commeth that old auncient ceremonie, obſerued yet vnto this day by thoſe of IOXIDES, neuer to burne the bryers of wilde ſparage, nor the Stœbe, but they haue them in ſome honour and reuerence. Touching the wild ſauage Sowe of Crommyon, otherwiſe ſurnamed Phœa, that is to ſay, ouergrowen with age: ſhe was not a beaſt to be made light account of, but was very fierce, and terrible to kill. Theſeus notwithſtanding taryed for her, and killed her in his iourney, to the ende it ſhould not appeare to the worlde, that all the valiant deedes hee did, were done by compulſion, and of neceſſitie: adding thereto his opinion alſo, that a valiant man ſhould not onely fight with men, to defende him ſelfe from the wicked: but that he ſhould be the firſt, to aſſault and ſlay wilde hurtfull beaſtes. Neuertheleſſe others haue written, that this Phœa was a woman robber, a murderer, and naught of her bodie, which ſpoyled thoſe that paſſed by the place called CROMMYGNIA, where ſhe dwelt: and that ſhe was ſurnamed a Sow, for her beaſtly brutiſh behauiour, and wicked life, for the which in the end ſhe was alſo ſlayne by Theſeus. After her he killed Sciron, entring into the territories of MEGARA, becauſe he robbed all trauellers by the way, as the common report goeth: or as others ſay, for that of a cruell, wicked, and ſauage pleaſure, he put forth his feete to thoſe that paſſed by the ſea ſide, and compelled them to waſh them. And then when they thought to ſtowpe to doe it, hee ſtill ſpurned them with his feete, till he thruſt them headlong into the ſea: ſo Theſeus threw him headlong downe the rockes. Howbeit the writers of MEGARA impugning this common report, and deſirous (as Simonides ſayth) to ouerthrowe it that had continued by preſcription of time: did maintayne that this Sciron was neuer any robber, nor wicked perſon, but rather a purſuer and puniſher of the wicked, and a friend and a kinſeman of the moſt honeſt, and iuſteſt men of GREECE. For there is no man but will confeſſe, that Æacus was the moſt vertuous man among the GRECIANS in his time, and that Cychreus the SALAMINIAN is honoured and reuerenced as a god at ATHENS: and there is no man alſo but knoweth, that Peleus and Telamon were men of a ſingular vertue. Nowe it is certaine, that this Sciron was the ſonne in lawe of Cychreus, father in law of Æacus, and grandfather of Peleus and of Telamon, the which two were the children of Endeida, the daughter of the ſayde Sciron, and of his wife Chariclo. Alſo it is not very likely, that ſo many good men would haue had affinitie with ſo naughtie and wicked a man: in taking of him, and giuing him that, which men loue beſt of all things in the worlde. And therefore the Hiſtoriographers ſay, that it was not the firſt time, when Theſeus went vnto ATHENS, that he killed Sciron: but that it was many dayes after, when he tooke the citie of ELEVSIN, which the MEGARIANS helde at that time, where hee deceiued the gouernour of the citie called Dioçles, and there he ſlewe Sciron. And theſe be the obiections the MEGARIANS alledged touching this matter. He ſlewe alſo Cercyon the ARCADIAN, in the citie of ELEVSIN, wreſtling with him. And going a little further, he ſlewe Damaſtes, otherwiſe ſurnamed Procruſtes, in the citie of HERMIONIA: and that by ſtretching on him out, to make him euen with the length and meaſure of his beddes, as he was wont to doe vnto ſtraungers that paſſed by. Theſeus did that after the imitation of Hercules, who puniſhed tyrants with the ſelfe ſame payne and torment, which they had made others ſuffer. For euen ſo did Hercules ſacrifice Buſiris. So he ſtifled Antheus in wreſtling. So he put Cycrus to death, fighting with him man to man. So he brake Termerus head, from whom this prouerbe of Termerus euill came, which continueth yet vnto this daye: for this Termerus did vſe to put them to death in this ſort whom he met: to iolle his head againſt theirs. Thus proceeded Theſeus after this ſelfe manner, puniſhing the wicked in like ſort, iuſtly compelling them to abide the ſame paine and torments, which they before had vniuſtly made others abide. And ſo he helde on his iourney vntill he came to the riuer of CEPHISVS, where certaine perſons of the houſe of the Phytalides were the firſt which went to meete him, to honour him, and at his requeſt they purified him according to the ceremonies vſed at that time: and afterwardes hauing made a ſacrifice of propitiation vnto their goddes, they made him great cheare in their houſes: and this was the firſt notable entertainement he found in all his iourney. It is ſuppoſed he arriued in the citie of ATHENS, the eight day of the moneth of Iune, which then they called Cronius. Hee found the common wealth turmoyled with ſeditions, factions, and diuiſions, and particularly the houſe of AEgeus in very ill termes alſo, becauſe that Medea (being baniſhed out of the citie of CORINTHE) was come to dwell in ATHENS, and remayned with AEgeus, whom ſhe had promiſed by vertue of certaine medicines to make him to get children. But when ſhe heard tell that Theſeus was come, before that the good king AEgeus (who was now become old, ſuſpitious, and affrayde of ſedition, by reaſon of the great factions within the citie at that time) knewe what he was, ſhe perſwaded him to poyſon him at a feaſt which they would make him as a ſtraunger that paſſed by. Theſeus fayled not to goe to this prepared feaſt whereunto hee was bidden, but yet thought it not good to diſcloſe him ſelfe. And the rather to giue AEgeus occaſion and meane to know him: when they brought the meate to the borde, he drewe out his ſworde, as though he would haue cut with all, and ſhewed it vnto him. AEgeus ſeeing it, knewe it ſtraight, and foorthwith ouerthrewe the cuppe with poyſon which was prepared for him: and after he had enquired of him, and asked things, he embraced him as his ſonne. Afterwardes in the common aſſembly of the inhabitants of the citie, he declared, how he auowed him for his ſonne. Then all the people receiued him with exceeding ioy, for the renowne of his valiantneſſe and manhoode. And ſome ſay, that when AEgeus ouerthrew the cuppe, the poyſon which was in it, fell in that place, where there is at this preſent a certaine compaſſe incloſed all about within the temple, which is called Delphinium. For euen there in that place, in the olde time, ſtoode the houſe of AEgeus: in witneſſe whereof, they call yet at this preſent time the image of Mercurie (which is on the ſide of the temple looking towardes the riſing of the ſunne) the Mercury gate of AEgeus. But the PALLANTIDES, which before ſtoode alwaies in hope to recouer the Realme of ATHENS, at the leaſt after AEgeus death, becauſe he had no children: when they ſaw that Theſeus was knowen, and openly declared for his ſonne and heire, and ſucceſſour to the Realme, they were not able any longer to beare it, ſeeing ing that not onely AEgeus (who was but the adopted ſonne of Pandion, and nothing at all of the bloud royall of the Erictheides) had vſurped the kingdome ouer them, but that Theſeus alſo ſhould enioy it after his death. Whereupon they determined to make warre with them both, and deuiding them ſelues into two partes, the one came openly in armes with their father, marching directly towardes the citie: the other lay cloſe in ambuſhe in the village GARGETTVS, meaning to giue charge vppon them in two places at one inſtant. Now they brought with them an Herauld borne in the towne of AGNVS, called Leos, who bewrayed vnto Theſeus the ſecrete and deuiſe of all their enterpriſe. Theſeus vppon this intelligence went forth, and did ſet on thoſe that lay in ambuſhe, and put them all to the ſword. The other which were in Pallas company vnderſtanding thereof, did breake and diſperſe them ſelues incontinently. And this is the cauſe (as ſome ſay) why thoſe of Pallena doe neuer make affinity nor marriage with thoſe of AGNVS at this day. And that in their towne when any proclamation is made, they neuer ſpeake theſe wordes which are cried euery where elſe through out the whole countrey of ATTICA, Acouete Leos, (which is as much to ſay, as Hearken, O people) they doe ſo extreamely hate this word Leos, for that it was the Heraulds name which wrought them that treaſon. This done, Theſeus who would not liue idlely at home and doe nothing, but deſirous therewithall to gratifie the people, went his way to fight with the bull of Marathon, the which did great miſchiefes to the inhabitants of the countrey of TETRAPOLIS. And hauing taken him aliue, brought him through the city of ATHENS to be ſeene of all the inhabitants. Afterwardes he did ſacrifice him vnto Apollo Delphias. Now concerning Hecale, who was reported to haue lodged him, and to haue giuen him good entertainement, it is not altogether vntrue. For in the old time, thoſe townes and villages there aboutes did aſſemble together, and made a common ſacrifice which they called Hecaleſion, in the honour of Iupiter Hecalian, where they honoured this old woman, calling her by a diminutiue name, Hecalena: becauſe that when ſhee receiued Theſeus into her houſe, being then but very yong, ſhee made much of him, and called him by many prety made names, as old folkes are wont to call young children. And foraſmuch as ſhee had made a vow to Iupiter to make him a ſolemne ſacrifice, if Theſeus returned ſafe from the enterpriſe he went about, and that ſhe died before his returne: in recompence of the good cheare ſhe had made him, ſhee had that honour done vnto her by Theſeus commaundement, as Philochorus hath written of it. Shortly after this exploite, there came certaine of King Minos ambaſſadours out of CRETA, to aske tribute, being now the third time it was demaunded, which the ATHENIANS payed for this cauſe. Androgeus, the eldeſt ſonne of king Minos, was ſlaine by treaſon within the countrey of ATTICA: for which cauſe Minos purſuing the reuenge of his death, made very hot and ſharpe warres vppon the ATHENIANS, and did them great hurt. But beſides all this, the goddes did ſharpely puniſh and ſcourge all the countrey, aſwell with barrenneſſe and famine, as alſo with plague and other miſchieues, euen to the drying vp of their riuers. The ATHENIANS perceyuing theſe ſore troubles and plagues, ranne to the oracle of Apollo, who aunſwered them that they ſhould appeaſe Minos, and when they had made their peace with him, that then the wrath of the goddes would ceaſe againſt them, and their troubles ſhould haue an end. Whereuppon the ATHENIANS ſent immediatly vnto him, and intreated him for peace: which he graunted them, with condition that they ſhould be bound to ſend him yearely into CRETA, ſeuen young boyes, and as many young girles. Now thus farre, all the Hiſtoriographers doe very well agree: but in the reſt not. And they which ſeeme furtheſt off from the troth, doe declare, that when theſe young boyes were deliuered in CRETA, they cauſed them to be deuoured by the Minotaure within the Laberinth: or elſe that they were ſhut within this Laberinth, wandring vp and downe, and could finde no place to get out, vntill ſuch time as they dyed, euen famiſhed for hunger. And this Minotaure, as Euripides the Poet ſayeth, was

The Laberinth a prison in Creta.

But Philochorus writeth, that the CRETANS doe not confesse that, but say that this Laberinth was a gayle or prison, in the which they had no other hurt, saving that they which were kept there vnder locke and key, could not flie nor start away: and that Minos had, in the memory of his sonne Androgeus, instituted games and playes of prise, where he gaue vnto them that wanne the victorie, those young children of ATHENS, the which in the meane time notwithstanding were carefully kept and looked vnto in the prison of the Laberinth: and that at the first games that were kept, one of the Kings captaines called Taurus, who was in best credite with his maister, wanne the prise. This Taurus was a churlishe, and naughty natured man of condition, and very hard and cruell to these children of ATHENS. And to verifie the same, the Philosopher Aristotle him selfe, speaking of the common wealth of the BOTTIEIANS, declareth verie well, that he neuer thought that Minos did at any time cause the children of ATHENS to be put to death: but sayeth, that they poorely toyled in CRETA, euen to crooked age, earning their liuing by true and painefull seruice. For it is written, that the CRETANS (to satisfie an old vow of theirs which they had made of auncient time) sent sometimes the first borne of their children vnto Apollo in the city of DELPHES: and that amongest them they also mingled those which were descended of the auncient prisoners of ATHENS, and they went with them. But because they could not liue there, they directed their iourney first into ITALIE, where for a time they remained in the realme of PVGLIA, and afterwardes from thence went into the confines of THRACIA, where they had this name of BOTTIEIANS. In memory whereof, the daughters of the BOTTIEIANS in a solemne sacrifice they make, doe vse to sing the foote of this song: Let vs to ATHENS goe. But thereby we may see how perillous a thing it is, to fall in displeasure and enmity with a city, which can speake well, and where learning and eloquence doth florish. For euer since that time, Minos was alwayes blased and disgraced throughout all the Theaters of ATHENS. The testimony of Hesiodus, who calleth him the most worthy King, doth nothing helpe him at all, nor the praise of Homer, who nameth him Iupiters familiar friend: because the tragicall Poets got the vpper hand in disgracing him, notwithstanding all these. And vppon their stages where all the tragedies were played, they still gaue forth many ill fauored words, and fowle speaches of him: as against a man that had beene most cruell and vnnaturall. Yet most men thinke, that Minos was the King which established the lawes: and Rudamanthus the iudge and preseruer of them, who caused the same also to be kept and obserued. The time now being come about for payment of the third tribute, when they came to compell the fathers which had children not yet married, to giue them to be put forth to take their chaunce and lot: the citizens of ATHENS beganne to murmur against AEgeus, alledging for their grieues, that he who onely was the cause of all this euill, was onely alone exempted from this griefe. And that to bring the gouernment of the Realme, to fall into the hands of a straunger his bastard: he cared not though they were bereft of all their naturall children, and were vnnaturally compelled to leaue and forsake them. These iust sorrowes and complaintes of the fathers, whose children were taken from them, did pearce the heart of Theseus, who willing to yeelde to reason, and to runne the selfe same fortune as the citizens did: willingly offered himselfe to be sent thither, without regard taking to his happe or aduenture. For which, the citizens greatly esteemed of his courage and honourable disposition, and dearely loued him for the good affection he seemed to beare vnto the communalty. But AEgeus hauing vsed many reasons and perswasions to cause him to turne, and stay from his purpose, and perceiuing in the end there was no remedy but he would go: he then drue lots for the children which should goe with him. Hellanicus notwithstanding doth write, that they were not those of the city which drew lots for the children they should send, but that Minos him selfe went thither in person and did choose them, as he chose Theseus the first, vpon conditions agreed betweene them: that is to wit, that the ATHENIANS should furnish them with a shippe, and that the children should shippe and imbarke with him, carrying no weapons of warre: and that after the death of the Minotaure, this tribute should cease. Now before that time, there was neuer any hope of returne, nor of safety of their children, therefore the ATHENIANS alwayes sent a shippe to conuay their children with a blacke sayle, in token of assured losse. Neuertheless Theseus putting his father in good hope of him, being of a good courage, and promising boldly that he would set vppon this Minotaure: AEgeus gaue vnto the maister of the shippe a white sayle, commaunding him that at his returne he should put out the white sayle if his sonne had escaped, if not, that then he should set vp the blacke sayle, to shew him a farre off his vnlucky and vnfortunate chaunce. Simonides notwithstanding doeth say, that this sayle which AEgeus gaue to the maister, was not white, but redd, pyed in graine, and of the colour of Scarlet: and that he gaue it him to signifie a farre off, their deliuerie and safety. This maister was called Phereclus Amarsiadas; as Simonides sayeth. But Philochorus writeth, that Scirus the SALAMANIAN gaue to Theseus a maister called Nausitheus, and another marriner to tackle the sayles, who was called Phæas: because the ATHENIANS at that time were not greatly practised to the sea, And this did Scirus, for that one of the children on whom the lot fell was his nephew: and thus much the chappels doe testifie, which Theseus built afterwardes in honour of Nausitheus, and of Phæas, in the village of Phalerus, ioyning to the temple of Scirus. And it is sayd moreouer, that the feast which they call Cybernesia, that is to say, the feast of Patrons of the shippes, is celebrated in honour of them. Now after the lots were drawen, Theseus taking with him the children allotted for the tribute, went from the pallace to the temple called Delphinion, to offer vp to Apollo for him and for them, an offering of supplication which they call Hiceteria: which was an oliue bough hallowed, wreathed about with white wolle. After he had made his prayer, he went downe to the sea side to imbarke, the sixt day of the moneth of March: on which day at this present time they doe send their young girles to the same temple of Delphinion, there to make their prayers and petitions to the goddes. But some say, that the oracle of Apollo in the citie of DELPHES had aunswered him, that he should take Venus for his guide, and that he should call vppon her to conduct him in his voyage: for which cause he did sacrifice a goat vnto her vppon the sea side, which was found sodainely turned into a ramme, and that herefore they surnamed this goddesse Epitragia, as one would say, the goddesse of the ramme. Furthermore, after he was arriued in CRETA, he slew there the Minotaure (as the most part of auncient authors doe write) by the meanes and helpe of Ariadne: who being fallen in fansie with him, did giue him a clue of threede, by the helpe whereof she taught him, how he might easely winde out of the turnings and cranckes of the Labyrinth. And they say, that hauing killed this Minotaure, he returned backe againe the same way he went, bringing with him those other young children of ATHENS, whom with Ariadne also he carried afterwardes away. Pherecides sayth moreouer, that he brake the keeles or bottomes of all the shippes of CRETA, because they should not sodainely set out after them. And Demon writeth, that Taurus (the captaine of Minos) was killed in a fight by Theseus, euen in the very hauen mouth as they were ready to shippe away, and hoise vp saile. Yet Philoehorus reporteth, that king Minos hauing set vp the games, as he was wont to doe yearely in the honour and memory of his sonne, euery one began to enuy captaine Taurus, because they euer looked that he should carry away the game and victory, as he had done other yeares before: ouer and about that, his authority got him much ill will and enuy, because he was proud and stately, and had in suspicion that he was great with Queene Pasiphaë. Wherefore when Theseus required he might encounter with Taurus, Minos easily graunted it. And being a solemne custome in CRETA that the women should be present, to see these open sports and fights, Ariadne being at these games amongest the rest, fell further in loue with Theseus, seeing him so goodly a person, so strong, and inuincible in wrestling, that he farre exceeded all that wrestled there that day. King Minos was so glad that he had taken away the honour from captaine Taurus, that he sent him home francke and free into his countrey, rendring to him all the other prisoners of ATHENS: and for his sake, clearely released and forgaue the city of ATHENS the tribute, which they should haue payed him yearely. Howbeit Clidemus searching out the beginning of these things to the vtmost, reciteth them very particularly and after another sort. For he sayeth, about that time there was a generall restraint through out all

About this time, Dædalus being fled from CRETA to ATHENS in a little Barke: Minos contrarie to this restraint, would needes follow him with a fleete of diuers vessels with owers, who being by force of weather driuen with the coast of SICILE, fortuned to die there. Afterwards his sonne Deucalion, being marmeilously offended with the ATHENIANS, sent to summon them to deliuer Dædalus vnto him, or else he would put the children to death, which were deliuered to his father for hostages. But Theseus excused himselfe, and sayd he could not forsake Dædalus, considering he was his neare kinseman, being his cosin germaine, for he was the sonne of Merope, the daughter of Erichtheus. Howbeit by and by he caused many vessels secretly to be made, part of them within ATTICA selfe in the village of Thymetades, farre from any high wayes: and part of them in the cittie of TROEZEN, by the sufferance of Pitheus his grandfather, to the end his purpose should be kept the secretlyer. Afterwards when all his shippes were ready, and rigged out, he tooke sea before the CRETANS had any knowledge of it: in so much as when they saw them a farre off, they did take them for the barkes of their friends. Theseus landed without resistaunce, and tooke the hauen. Then hauing Dædalus, and other banished CRETANS for guydes, he entred the cittie selfe of GNOSVS, where he slew Deucalion in a fight before the gates of the Labyrinthe, with all his guard and officers about him. By this meanes the kingdome of CRETA fell by inheritance into the hands of his sister Ariadne. Theseus made league with her, and carried away the young children of ATHENS, which were kept as hostages, and concluded peace and amity betweene the ATHENIANS and the CRETANS: who promised, and sware, they would neuer make warres against them. They report many other things also touching this matter, and specially of Ariadne: but there is no troth not certaintie in it. For some say, that Ariadne hung her selfe for sorrow, when she saw that Theseus had cast her off. Other write, that she was transported by mariners into the Ile of NAXOS, where she was married vnto OEnarus, the priest of Bacchus: and they thinke that Theseus left her, because he was in loue with another, as by these verses should appeare.

Diuers opinions of Ariadne.

Ægles the Nymphe, was loued of Theseus, who was the daughter of Panopeus.

Hereas the Megarian sayth, that these two verses in old time were among the verses of the Poet Hesiodus, howbeit Pisistratus tooke them away: as he did in like manner adde these other here in the description of the helles in Homer, to gratifie the ATHENIANS.

Bold Theseus, and Pirithous stowte, descended both, from gods immortall race, Triumphing still, this wearie world about in feats of armes, and many a comely grace.

Other hold opinion, that Ariadne had two children by Theseus: the one of them was named OEnopion, and the other Staphylus. Thus amongst others the Poet Ion writeth it, who was borne in the Ile of CHIO, and speaking of his cittie, he sayth thus:

OEnopion, & Staphylus Theseus sonnes.

OEnopion which was the sonne of worthy Theseus, did cause men build this statelie towne, which now triumpheth thus.

Now what things are found seemely in Poets fables, there is none but doth in manner sing them. But one Paenon borne in the cittie of AMATHVNTA, reciteth this cleane after another sort, and contrarie to all other: saying, that Theseus by tempest was driuen with the Ile of CYPRVS, hauing with him Ariadne, which was great with childe, and so sore sea sicke, that she was not able to abide it. In so much as he was forced to put her a land, and himselfe afterwards returning abourd hoping to saue his shippe against the storme, was forthwith compelled to loose into the sea. The women of the countrey did curteously receiue and intreat Ariadne: and to comfort her againe, (for she was marueilously out of heart, to ſee ſhee was thus forſaken) they counterfaited letters, as if Theſeus had written them to her. And when her groning time was come, and ſhee to be layed, they did their beſt by all poſſible meanes to ſaue her: but ſhe dyed notwithſtanding in labour, and could neuer be deliuered. So ſhe was honorably buried by the Ladyes of CYPRVS. Theſeus not long after returned thither againe, who tooke her death marueilous heauily, and left money with the inhabitants of the Countrie, to ſacrifice vnto her yearely: and for memory of her, he cauſed two litle images to be molten, the one of copper, and the other of ſiluer, which he dedicated vnto her. This ſacrifice is done the ſecond day of September, on which they doe yet obſerue this ceremonie: they doe laye a young childe vpon a bed, which pittifully cryeth and lamenteth, as women trauelling with childe. They ſay alſo, that the AMATHVSIANS doe yet call the groue where her Tombe is ſet vp, the woode of Venus Ariadne. And yet there are of the NAXIANS, that report this otherwiſe: ſaying, there were two Minoes, and two Ariadnees, whereof the one was married to Bacchus in the Ile of NAXOS, of whom Staphylus was borne: and the other the youngeſt, was rauiſhed and caryed away by Theſeus, who afterwardes forſooke her, and ſhe came into the Ile of NAXOS with her nurce, called Corcyna, whoſe graue they doe ſhewe yet to this day. The ſecond Ariadne dyed there alſo, but ſhe had no ſuch honour done to her after her death, as to the firſt was giuen. For they celebrate the feaſt of the firſt with all ioy and myrth: where the ſacrifices done in memorie of the ſeconde, be mingled with mourning and ſorrow. Theſeus then departing from the Ile of CRETA, arriued in the Ile of DELOS, where he did ſacrifice in the temple of Apollo, and gaue there a litle image of Venus, the which he had gotten of Ariadne. Then with the other young boyes that he had deliuered, hee daunced a kinde of daunce, which the DELIANS keepe to this day, as they ſay: in which there are many turnes and returnes, much after the turnings of the Labyrinth. And the DELIANS call this manner of daunce, the crane, as Dicæarcus ſaith. And Theſeus daunced it firſt about the altar, which is called Ceraton, that is to ſay, horne-ſtaffe: becauſe it is made and builded of hornes onely, all on the left hande well and curiouſly ſet together without any other binding. It is ſaide alſo that hee made a game in this Ile of DELOS, in which at the firſt was giuen to him that ouercame, a braunch of palme for rewarde of victorie. But when they drue neere the coaſt of ATTICA, they were ſo ioyfull, he and his maſter, that they forgate to ſet vp their white ſayle, by which they ſhoulde haue giuen knowledge of their health and ſafety vnto AEgeus. Who ſeeing the blacke ſayle a farre off, being out of all hope euer more to ſee his ſonne againe, tooke ſuch a griefe at his heart, that he threw him ſelfe headlong from the toppe of a clyffe, and killed himſelfe. So ſoone as Theſeus was arriued at the port named Phalerus, he performed the ſacrifices which he had vowed to the goddes at his departure: and ſent an Heraulde of his before vnto the citie, to carie newes of his ſafe arriuall. The Herauld found manie of the citie mourning the death of King AEgeus. Many other receiued him with great ioy, as may be ſuppoſed. They would haue crowned him alſo with a garlande of flowers, for that he had brought ſo good tidings, that the children of the citie were returned in ſafetie. The Herauld was content to take the garland, yet would he not in any wiſe put it on his head, but did wind it about his Heraulds rodde he bare in his hand, and ſo returneth forthwith to the ſea, where Theſeus made his ſacrifices. Who perceiuing they were not yet done, did refuſe to enter into the temple, and ſtayed without for troubling of the ſacrifices. Afterwardes all ceremonies finiſhed, he went in and tolde him the newes of his fathers death. Then he and his company mourning for ſorrow, haſted with ſpeede towards the citie. And this is the cauſe, why to this day, at the feaſt called Oſcophoria (as who would ſay the feaſt of boughes) the Herauld hath not his head but his rod onely crowned with flowers, and why the aſſiſtants alſo after the ſacrifice done, doe make ſuch cryes and exclamations: Ele, leuſ, iou, iou: whereof the firſt, is the cry and voyce they commonly vſe one to another to make haſte, or elſe it is the foote of ſome ſong of triumph: and the other is the cry and voyce of men as it were in feare and trouble. After he had ended the obſequies aud funeralles for his father, he performed alſo his ſacrifices vnto Apollo, which he had vowed the ſeuenth day of the moneth of October, on which they arriued at their returne into the citie of ATHENS. Howbeit there are some which wil say, that these verses were made for the Heraclides, that

ATHENIANS, were entertained & much made of by them for a time. But the most part hold Theseus went into Creta with the tribute children, in the galliot of 30. owers. opinion, they were made vpon the occasion aforesaid. The vessel in which Theseus went and returned, was a galliot of thirtie owers, which the ATHENIANS kept vntill the time of Demetrius the Phalerian, alwayes taking away the old peeces of wood that were rotten, and euer renewing them with new in their places. So that euer since, in the disputations of the Philoso-

Disputation about increase. The galliot alledged for a doubt. that it was still one vessell: others to the contrarie defended it was not so. And they hold opinion also, that the feast of boughes which is celebrated at Athens at this time, was then first of all instituted by Theseus. It is sayd moreouer, that he did not carie all the wenches vpon whom the lots did fall, but chose two faire yong boyes, whose faces were sweete and delicate as maydens be, that otherwise were hardie, and quicke spirited. But he made them so oft bath them selues in hote bathes, and keepe them in from the heate of the sunne, and so manie time to wash, annoint, and rubbe them selues with oyles which serue to supple and smooth their skinnes, to keepe fresh and faire their culler, to make yellow and bright their haires: and with all did teach them so to counterfet the speech, countenance and fashion of yong maides, that they seemed to be like them, rather then yong boyes. For there was no manner of difference to be perceiued outwardly, and he mingled them with the girles, without the knowledge of any man. Afterwards when he was returned, he made a procession, in which both he & the other yong boyes were apparelled then, as they be now, which carie boughes on the day of the feast in their hands. They carie them in the honour of Bacchus and Ariadne, following the fable that is told of them: or rather because they returned home iust at the time and season, when they gather the fruite of those trees. There are women which they call Deipnophores, that is to say, supper cariers, which are assistants to the sacrifice done that day, in representing the mothers of those, vpon whom the lots did fall, because they in like sort brought them both meate and drinke. There they tell tales, for so did their mothers tattle to their children, to comfort and encourage them. All these particularities were written by Demon the historiographer. There was moreouer a place chosen out, to build him a temple in, & he himselfe ordained, that those houses which had payed tribute before vnto the king of CRETA, should now yerely thence forth become contributories towards the charges of a solemne sacrifice, which should be done

Theseus brought the inhabitants of the countrie of Attica into one cittie. terprise. For he brought all the inhabitants of the whole prouince of ATTICA, to be within the cittie of ATHENS, and made them all one corporation, which were before disparsed into diuers villages, and by reason thereof were very hard to be assembled together, when occasion was offered to establish anie order concerning the common state. Many times also they were at variance together, and by the eares, making warres one vpon another. But Theseus took the paines to go from village to village, and from familie to familie, to let them vnderstand the reasons why they should consent vnto it. So he found the poore people and priuate men, readie to obey and follow his will, but the rich, and such as had authoritie in euerie village, all against

it. Neuertheles he wanne them, promising that it should be a common wealth, and not subiect to the power of any sole prince, but rather a popular state. In which he would only reserue to himselfe the charge of the warres, and the preseruation of the lawes: for the rest, he was content that euery citizen in all and for all should beare a like sway and authority. So there were some that willingly graunted thereto. Other who had no liking thereof, yeelded notwithstanding for feare of his displeasure and power which then was very great. So they thought it better to consent with good will, vnto that he required: then to tarry his forcible compulsion. Then he caused all the places where iustice was ministred, and all their halles of assembly to be ouerthrowne and pulled downe. He remoued straight all iudges and officers, and built a towne house, & a counsaile hall, in the place where the citie now standeth, which the ATHENIANS call ASTY, but he called the whole corporation of them, ATHENS. Afterwardes he instituted the great feast and common sacrifice for all of the countrie of ATTICA, which they call Panathenæa. Then he ordeined another feast also vpon the sixteenth day of the moneth of Iune, for all strangers which should come to dwell in ATHENS, which was called Metœcia, and is kept euen to this day. That done, he gaue ouer his regall power according to his promise, and beganne to set vp an estate or pollicie of a common wealth, beginning first with the seruice of the goddes. To know the good successe of his enterprise, he sent at the very beginning to the oracle of Apollo in DELPHES, to enquire of the fortune of this citie: from whence this answere was brought vnto him.

For why? thou shalt, nor perish nor decay,

It is found written also that Sibylla afterwardes gaue out such a like oracle ouer the citie of ATHENS.

The bladder blowne may fleete vpon the fludde, but cannot sinke, nor sticke in filthy mudde.

Moreouer, because he would further yet augment his people, and enlarge his citie, he entised many to come and dwell there, by offering them the selfe same freedome and priuiledges, which the naturall borne citizens had. So that many iudge, that these words which are in vse at this day in ATHENS, when any open proclamation is made, All people, Come ye hither: be the selfe same which Theseus then caused to be proclaimed, when he in that sort did gather a people together of all nations. Yet for all that, he suffered not the great multitude that came thither tagge and ragge, to be without distinction of degrees & orders. For he first diuided the noble men, from husbandmen & artificers, appointing the noble men as iudges & magistrates to iudge vpon matters of Religion, and touching the seruice of the goddes: and of them also he did chuse rulers, to beare ciuill office in the common weale, to determine the law, and to tell all holy and diuine things. By this meanes he made the noble men and the two other estates equall in voyce. And as the noblemen did passe the other in honour: euen so the artificers exceeded them in number, and the husbandmen them in profit. Now that Theseus was the first who of all others yeelded to haue a common weale or popular estate (as Aristotle sayth) & did giue ouer his regall power: Homer selfe seemeth to testifie it, in numbring the shippes which were in the Græcians armie before the citie of TROIA. For amongest all the GRÆCIANS, he onely calleth the ATHENIANS people. Moreouer Theseus coyned money, which he marked with the stampe of an oxe, in memorie of the bull of Marathon, or of Taurus the captaine of Minos, or else to prouoke his citizens to giue themselues to labour. They say also that of this money they were since called Hecatombœon, and Decabœon, which signifieth woorth a hundred oxen, and worth tenne oxen. Furthermore hauing ioyned all the territorie of the citie of MEGARA, vnto the countrie of ATTICA, he caused that notable foure square piller to be set vp for their confines within the straight of PELOPONNESVS, and engraued there-

Olympia. It was he also which made the games called Isthmia, after the imitation of Hercules, to the ende that as the GRECIANS did celebrate the feast of games called Olympia, in the honour of Iupiter, by Hercules ordinance: so, that they should also celebrate the games called Isthmia, by his order and institution, in the honor of Neptune. For those that were done in the straights in the honour of Melicerta, were done in the night, & had rather forme of sacrifice or of a mysterie, then of games & open feast. Yet some will say, that these games of Isthmia were instituted in the honour & memorie of Sciron, & that Theseus ordained them in satisfaction of his death: because he was his cosin germaine, being the sonne of Canethus, and of Heniocha the daughter of Pitheus. Other say that it was Sinnis and not Sciron, and that for him Theseus made these games, & not for the memory of the other. How soeuer it was, he specially willed the CORINTHIANS, that they should giue vnto those that came from ATHENS to see their games of Isthmia, so much place to sit downe before them (in the most honorable part of the feast place) as the saile of their ship should couer, in the which they came from ATHENS: thus do Hellanicus and Andron Halicarnasseus write hereof. Touching the voyage he made by the sea Maior, Philochorus, and some other holde opinion, that he went thither with Hercules against the AMAZONES: and that to honor his valiantnes, Hercules gaue him ANTIOPA the AMAZONE. But the more part of the other Historiographers, namely Hellanicus, Pherecides, & Herodotus, doe write, that Theseus went thither alone, after Hercules voyage, & that he tooke this AMAZONE prisoner, which is likeliest to be true: For we do not find that any other who went this iorney with him, had taken any AMAZONE prisoner besides him selfe. Bion also the Historiographer, this notwithstanding sayth, that he brought her away by deceit and stealth. For the AMAZONES (sayth he) naturally louing men, did not flie at all when they saw them land in their countrie, but sent them presents, & that Theseus entised her to come into his ship, who brought him a present: and so soone as she was abord, he hoysed his sayle, and so caried her away. Another Historiographer Menecrates, who wrote the historie of the citie of NICEA, in the countrie of BYTHINIA, sayth: that Theseus hauing this AMAZONE ANTIOPA with him, remained a certain time vpon those coasts, & that amongst other he had in his company three yonger brethren of ATHENS, Euneus, Thoas, & Solois. This last, Solois, was marueilously in loue with ANTIOPA, and neuer bewrayed it to any of his other companions, sauing vnto one with whom he was most familiar, and whom he trusted best: so that he reported this matter vnto ANTIOPA. But she vtterly reiected his suite, though otherwise she handled it wisely and courteously, and did not complaine to Theseus of him. Howbeit the young man despairing to enioy his loue, tooke it so inwardly, that desperately he leapt into the riuer, and drowned him selfe. Which when Theseus vnderstoode, and the cause also that brought him to this desperation and end: he was very sory, and angry also. Whereupon he remembred a certaine oracle of Pythia, by whom he was commaunded to build a citie in that place in a straunge countrie, where he should be most sorie, and that he should leaue some that were about him at that time, to gouerne the same. For this cause therefore he built a citie in that place, which he named PYTHOPOLIS, because he had built it onely by the commandement of the Nunne Pythia. He called the riuer in the which the young man was drowned, Solois, in memorie of him: and left his two brethren for his deputies and as gouernours of this new citie, with another gentleman of ATHENS, called Hermus. Hereof it commeth, that at this day the PYTHOPOLITANS call a certaine place of their citie, Hermus house. But they fayle in the accent, by putting it vpon the last syllabe: for in pronouncing it so, Hermus signifieth Mercury. By this meanes they doe transferre the honour due to the memorie of Hermus, vnto the god Mercury. Now heare what was the occasion of the warres of the AMAZONES, which me thinkes was not a matter of small moment, nor an enterprise of a woman. For they had not placed their campe campe within the very citie of ATHENS, nor had not fought in the very place it selfe (called PNYCE) adioyning to the tẽple of the Muses, if they had not first conquered or subdued all the countrie thereabouts: neither had they all come at the first, so valiantly to assayle the citie of ATHENS. Now, whether they came by land from so farre a countrie, or that they passed ouer an arme of the sea, which is called Bosphorus Cimmericus, being frosen as Hellanicus sayth: it is hardly to be credited. But that they camped within the precinct of the very citie it selfe, the names of the places which continue yet to this present day doe witnesse it, and the graues also of the women which died there. But so it is, that both armies lay a great time one in the face of the other, ere they came to battell. Howbeit at the length Theseus hauing first made sacrifice vnto Feare the goddesse, according to the counsaile of a prophecy he had receiued, he gaue them battell in the moneth of August, on the same day, in the which the ATHENIANS doe euen at this present solemnise the feast, which they call Boedromia. But Clidemus the Historiographer, desirous particularly to write all the circumstances of this encounter, sayeth that the left point of their battell bent towards the place which they call AMAZONION: and that the right point marched by the side of CHRYSA, euen to the place which is called PNYCE, vpon which, the ATHENIANS cõming towards the temple of the Muses, did first giue their charge. And for proofe that this is true, the graues of the women which died in the first encounter, are found yet in the great streete, which goeth towards the gate Piraica, neere vnto the chappell of the little god Chalcodus. And the ATHENIANS (sayth he) were in this place repulsed by the AMAZONES, euen to the place where the images of Eumenides are, that is to say of the furies. But on thother side also, the ATHENIANS cõming towards the quarters of Palladiũ, Ardettus, & Lucium, draue backe their right point euen to within their campe, and slew a great number of them. Afterwards, at the end of foure moneths, peace was taken betweene them by meanes of one of the women called Hyppolita. For this Historiographer calleth the AMAZONE which Theseus maried, Hyppolita, and not Antiopa. Neuertheles, some say that she was slaine (fighting on Theseus side) with a dart, by another called Molpadia. In memory wherof, the pillet which is ioyning to the temple of the Olympian ground, was set vp in her honour. We are not to maruaile, if the history of things so auncient, be found so diuersely written. For there are also that write, that Queene Antiopa sent those secretly which were hurt then into the citie of CALCIDE, where some of them recouered, & were healed: & others also dyed, which were buried neere to the place called AMAZONION. Howsoeuer it was, it is most certain that this war was ended by agreement. For a place adioyning to the temple of Theseus, doth beare recorde of it, being called Orcomosium: because the peace was there by solemne oath concluded. And the sacrifice also doth truely verifie it, which they haue made to the AMAZONES, before the feast of Theseus, long time out of minde. They of MEGARA also do shew a tumbe of the AMAZONES in their citie, which is as they go frõ the market place, to the place they call Rhus: where they finde an auncient tumbe, cut in fashion & forme of a losenge. They say that there dyed other of the AMAZONES also, neere vnto the citie of CHÆRONEA, which were buried all along st the litle broke passing by the same, which in the old time, (in mine opiniõ) was called Thermodon, and is now named Hæmon, as we haue other places written in the life of Demosthenes. And it seemeth also, that they did not passe through THESSALY, without fighting: for there are seene yet of their tombs all about the citie of SCOTVSA, hard by the rocks, which be called the dogs head. And this is that which is worthy memorie (in mine opinion) touching the wars of these AMAZONES. How the Poet telleth that the AMAZONES made wars with Theseus to reuẽge the iniurie he did to their Queene Antiopa, refusing her, to marrie with Phædra: & for the murder which he telleth that Hercules did, that me thinkes is altogether but deuise of Poets. It is very true, that after the death of Antiopa, Theseus maried Phædra, hauing had before of Antiopa a sonne called Hippolytus, or as the Poet Pindarus writeth, Demophon. And for that the Historiographers do not in any thing speake against the tragicall Poets: in that which concerneth the ill happe that chaunced to him, in the persons of this his wife and of his sonne: we must needes take it to be so, as we find it written in the tragedies. And yet we finde manie other reportes touching the mariages of Theseus, whose beginnings had no great good honest grosid, neither fell out their endes verie fortunate: & yet for all that they haue made no tragedies of them, neither haue they bene played in the Theaters. For we read that he tooke away Anaxo the TROEZENIAN, & that after he had killed Sinnis and Cercyon, he tooke their daughters perforce: and that he did also marie Peribæa, the mother of Aiax, & afterwards Pherebæa, & Ioppa the daughter of Iphicles. And they blame him much also, for that he so lightly forsooke his wife Ariadne, for the loue of AEgles the daughter of Panopæus, as we haue recited before. Lastly, he tooke away Hellen: which rauishment filled all the Realme of ATTICA with warres, & finally was the very occasion that forced him to forsake his countrie, & brought him at the length to his end, as we will tell you hereafter. Albeit in his time other princes of GREECE had done many goodly and notable exploits in the warres, yet Herodotus is of opinion, that Theseus was neuer in any one of them: sauing that he was at the battell of the Lapithæ against the Centauri. Others say to the contrary, that he was at the iorney of Cholchide with Iason, & that he did helpe Meleager to kill the wild Bore of Calydonia: from whence (as they say) this prouerbe came: Not without Theseus. Meaning that such a thing was not done without great helpe of another. Howbeit it is certaine that Theseus selfe did many famous acts, without aide of any man, and that for his valiantnes this prouerbe came in vse, which is spoken: This is another Theseus. Also he did helpe Adrastus king of the ARGIVES, to recouer the bodies of those that were slaine in the battell, before the citie of THEBES. Howbeit it was not, as the Poet Euripides sayth, by force of armes, after he had ouercome the THEBANS in battell: but it was by cõposition. And thus the greatest number of the most auncient writers do declare it. Furthermore, Philochorus writeth, that this was the first treatie that euer was made to recouer the dead bodies slayne in battell: neuertheles we doe read in the histories and gestes of Hercules, that he was the first that euer suffered his enemies to carrie away their dead bodies, after they had beene put to the sword. But whosoeuer he was, at this day in the village of ELEVTHERES, they doe show the place where the people were buried, and where princes tombes are seene about the citie of ELEVSIN, which he made at the request of Adrastus. And for testimonie hereof, the tragedie AEschilus made of the ELEVSINIANS, where he causeth it to be spoken euen thus to Theseus himselfe, doth clearely ouerthrow the petitioners in Euripides. Touching the friendshippe betwixt Pirithous and him, it is sayd it beganne thus. The renowne of his valiancy was marueilously blowen abroad through all GREECE, & Pirithous desirous to knowe it by experience, went euen of purpose to inuade his countrie, and brought away a certaine bootie of oxen of his taken out of the countrie of MARATHON. Theseus being aduertised therof, armed straight, and went to the rescue. Pirithous hearing of his comming, fled not at all, but returned backe sodainly to meete him. And so soone as they came to see one another, they both wondred at ech others beawtie and courage, and so had they no desire to fight. But Pirithous reaching out his hand first to Theseus, said vnto him; I make your selfe iudge of the damage you haue susteined by my inuasion, and with all my hearte I will make such satisfaction, as it shall please you to assesse it at. Theseus then did not only release him, of all the damages he had done, but also requested him he would become his friend, and brother in armes. Hereupon they were presently sworne brethren in the field: after which othe betwixt them, Pirithous maried Deidamia, & sent to pray Theseus to come to his mariage, to visite his countrie, and to make mery with the Lapithæ. He had bidden also the Centauri to the feast: who being druncke, committed many lewde parts, euen to the forcing of women. Howbeit the Lapithæ chasticed them so well, that they slew some of them presently in the place, & draue the rest afterwards out of all the countrie by the helpe of Theseus, who armed himselfe, and fought on their side. Yet Herodotus writeth the matter somewhat contrarie, saying that Theseus went not at all vntill the warre was well begun: and that it was the first time that he saw Hercules, and spake with him neere vnto the citie of TRACHINA, when he was then quiet, hauing ended all his farre voyages, and greatest troubles. They reporte that this meeting together was full of great cheere, much kindnes, and honourable entertainement betweene them, and great courtesie was offred to eache other. Neuertheless me thinkes we should giue better credit to those writers that say they met many times together, and that Hercules was accepted and receiued into the brotherhood of the mysteries of ELEVSIN, by the meanes of the countenaunce and fauour which Theseus showed vnto him: and that his purification also was thereby allowed of, who was to be purged ged of neceſſitie of all his ill deedes and cruelties, before he could enter into the company of thoſe holy myſteries. Furthermore, Theſeus was fifty yeares old when he tooke away Helen and rauiſhed her, which was very young, and not of age to be maried, as Hellanicus ſayth. By reaſon whereof, ſome ſeeking to hide the rauiſhment of her as a haynous fact, doe report it was not he, but one Idas and Lynceus that carried her away, who left her in his cuſtodie and keeping: and that Theſeus would haue kept her from them, and would not haue deliuered her to her brethren Caſtor and Pollux, which afterwardes did demaund her againe of him. Others againe ſay it was her owne father Tyndarus, who gaue her him to keepe, for that he was afrayde of Enarſphorus the ſonne of Hippocoon, who would haue had her away by force. But that which commeth neareſt to the troth in this caſe, and which in deede by many authors is teſtified, was in this ſort. Theſeus & Pirithous went together to the citie of LACEDÆMON, where they tooke away Hellen (being yet very young) euen as ſhe was dauncing in the tẽple of Diana ſurnamed Orthia: & they fled for life. They of LACEDÆMON ſent after her, but thoſe that followed went no further thẽ the citie of TEGEA. Now when they were eſcaped out of the coũtrie of PELOPONNESVS, they agreed to draw lots together, which of them two ſhould haue her, with condition that whoſe lot it were to haue her, he ſhould take her to his wife, & ſhould be bound alſo to helpe his companion to get him another It was Theſeus happe to light vpon her, who caried her to the citie of APHIDNES, becauſe ſhe was yet too young to be maried. Whither he cauſed his mother to come to bring her vp, & gaue his friend called Aphidnus the charge of them both, recõmending her to his good care, & to keepe it ſo ſecretly, that no body ſhould know what was become of her. Becauſe he would do the like for Pirithous (according to th'agremẽt made betwixt thẽ) he went into EPIRVS with him to ſteale the daughter of Aidoneus, king of the MOLOSSIANS, who had ſurnamed his wife Proſerpina, his daughter Proſerpina, & his dogge Cerberus: with whõ he made thẽ fight which came to aske his daughther in mariage, promiſing to giue her to him that ſhould ouercome his Cerberus. But the king vnderſtãding that Pirithous was come, not to requeſt his daughter in mariage, but to ſteale her away, he tooke him priſoner with Theſeus: & as for Pirithous, he cauſed him preſẽtly to be torn in peeces with his dogge, & ſhut Theſeus vp in cloſe priſon. In this meane time there was one at ATHENS called Meneſtheus, the ſonne of Peteus: which Peteus was the ſonne of Orneus, and Orneus was the ſonne of Erichtheus. This Meneſtheus was the firſt that began to flatter the people, and did ſeeke to winne the fauour of the communaltie, by ſweete entiſing wordes: by which deuiſe he ſtirred vp the chiefeſt of the citie againſt Theſeus (who indeede long before began to be wearie of him) by declaring vnto them how Theſeus had taken from them their royalties and ſignories, & had ſhut them vp in ſuch ſort within the walles of a citie, that he might the better keepe them in ſubiection & obedience in all things, after his will. The poore inferiour ſort of people, he did ſtirre vp alſo to rebellion, perſwading them that it was no other then a dreame of libertie which was promiſed them: and how contrariwiſe they were clearely diſpoſſeſt & throwen out of their own houſes, of their tẽples, & from their natural places where they were borne, to thend only, that in liew of many good & louing lordes which they were wont to haue before, they ſhould now be compelled to ſerue one only head, & a ſtrange lord. Euen as Meneſtheus was very hot about this practiſe, the war of the Tyndarides fell out at that inſtant, which greatly furthered his pretence. For theſe Tyndarides (to wit the children of Tyndarus) Caſtor & Pollux, came downe with a great armie, againſt the citie of ATHENS: & ſome ſuſpect ſore that Meneſtheus was cauſe of their comming thither. Howbeit at the firſt entrie they did no hurt at all in the country, but only demaunded reſtitution of their ſiſter. To whom the citizens made aunſwer, that they knew not where ſhe was left: & then the brethren began to make ſpoile, & offer warre in deed. Howbeit there was one called Academus, who hauing knowledge (I cannot tell by what meane) that ſhe was ſecretly hidden in the citie of APHIDNES, reuealed it vnto them. By reaſon whereof the Tyndarides did alwaies honour him very much, ſo long as he liued, & afterwards the LACEDÆMONIANS, hauing oft burnt & deſtroyed the whole countrie of ATTICA throughout, they would yet neuer touch the Academy of ATHENS for Academus ſake. Yet Dicearchus ſayth, that in the armie of the Tyndarides there were two Arcadians, Echedemus, and Marathus, and how of the name of one of them, it was then called the place of Echedemie, which ſithence hath beene called Academia: and after the name of the other, there was a village called MARATHON, becauſe he willingly offered him ſelfe to be ſacrificed before the battell, as obeying the order & commaundement of a prophecie. So they went and pitched their campe before the citie of APHIDNES, and hauing wonne the battell, and taken the citie by aſſault, they raced the place. They ſay that Alycus, the ſonne of Sciron was ſlaine at this field, who was in the hoaſt of the Tyndarides, & that after his name, a certaine quarter of the territorie of MEGARA was called Alycus, in the which his bodie was buried. Howbeit Hereas writeth that Theſeus ſelfe did kill him before APHIDNES: In witneſſe whereof he alledgeth certaine verſes which ſpeake of Alycus.

Howbeit it is not likely to be true, that Theſeus being there, the citie of APHIDNES, & his mother alſo were taken. But when it was wonne they of ATHENS began to quake for feare, & Meneſtheus counſelled them to receiue the Tyndarides into the citie, and to make them good chere, ſo they would make no wars but vpon Theſeus, which was the firſt that had done them the wrong & iniury: & that to all other els they ſhould ſhew fauour & good will. And ſo it fell out. For when the Tyndarides had all in their power to do as they liſted, they demaunded nothing els but that they might be receiued into their corporatiõ, & not to be reckoned for ſtrangers, no more thẽ Hercules was: the which was granted the Tyndarides, & Aphidnus did adopt them for his children, as Pylius had adopted Hercules. Moreouer they did honour thẽ as if they had bene goddes, calling them Anaces. Either becauſe they ceaſed the wars, or for that they ordered themſelues ſo well, that their whole armie being lodged within the citie, there was not any hurt or diſpleaſure done to any perſon: but as it became thoſe that haue the charge of any thing, they did carefully watch to preſerue the good quiet thereof. All which this Greke word Anacos doth ſignifie, whereof perchance it comes that they call the kings Anactes. There are others alſo who hold opinion that they were called Anaces, becauſe of their ſtarres which appeared in the aire. For the Attican tongue ſaith, Anacas, & Anecathen: where the cõmon people ſay Ano, and Anothen, that is to ſay, aboue. Yet there are other who aſwel reiect theſe two verſes, & maintaine they are not Homers: as alſo they reproue all that is reported of Munychus. To wit, that Laocide being priuily cõceiued of him by Demophõ, he was brought vp ſecretly by Æthra within TROIA. But Heſter the hiſtorien in his thirteenth of his hiſtories of ATTICA, maketh a recitall far cõtrary to other, ſaying: that ſome hold opiniõ, that Paris Alexander was ſlaine in battel by Achilles, & Patroclus in the coũtrie of THESSALY, neere to the riuer of Sperchius, & that his brother Hector tooke the citie of TROEZEN, from whence he brought away AEthra: in which there is no manner of apparance or likelihood. But AEdoneus king of the MOLOSSIANS, feaſting Hercules one day as he paſſed through his realme, deſcended by chaunce into talke of Theſeus & of Pirithous, how they came to ſteale away his daughter ſecretly: & after told how they were alſo puniſhed. Hercules was maruelous ſory to vnderſtand that one of them was now dead, & the other in daunger to die; & thought with himſelf that to make his mone to AEdoneus, it would not helpe the matter: he beſought him only that he would deliuer Theſeus for his ſake. And he granted him. Thus Theſeus being deliuered of his captiuitie, returned to ATHENS, where his friends were not altogether kept vnder by his enemies: and at his returne he did dedicate to Hercules all the temples, which the citie had before cauſed to be built in his owne honour. And where firſt of all they were called Theſea, he did now ſurname thẽ all Herculea, excepting foure, as Philochorus writeth. Now when he was arriued at ATHENS, he would immediately haue cõmanded and ordered things as he was wont to do: but he found him ſelfe troubled much with ſedition, be-

cauſe thoſe who had hated him of a long time, had added alſo to their old canckred hate, a diſdain & contẽpt to fear him any more. And the cõmõ people now were become ſo ſtubborn, that where before they would haue done all that they were cõmanded, & haue ſpokẽ nothing to the contrary: now they looked to be borne with, & flattered. Whereupon Theſeus thought at the firſt to haue vſed force, but he was forced by the faction & contẽtion of his enemies to let all alone, & in the end, deſpairing he ſhould euer bring his matters to paſſe to his deſire, he ſecretly ſent away his children vnto the Ile of EVBOEA, to Elphenor the ſonne of Chalcodus. And himſelf, after he had made many wiſhes & curſes againſt the Athenians, in the village of GARGETTVS, in a place which for that cauſe to this day is called Arateriod: (that is to ſay, the place of curſings) he did take the ſeas, & wẽt into the Ile of SCIROS, where he had goods, & thought alſo to haue found friends. Lycomedes raigned at that time, and was king of the Ile, vnto whom Theſeus made requeſt for ſome land, as intending to dwell there: albeit ſome ſay that he required him to giue him aide againſt the Athenias. Lycomedes, were it that he doubted to entertain ſo great a perſonage, or that he did it to gratifie Mepeſtheus: caried him vp to the high rockes, fayning as though he would from thence haue ſhewed him all his countrey round about. But when he had him there, he threw him downe headlong from the top of the rocks to the bottome, & put him thus vnfortunatly to death. Yet other write, that he fell downe of himſelf by an vnfortunate chaunce, walking one day after ſupper as he was wont to doe. There was no man at that time that did follow or purſue his death, but Meneſtheus quietly remained king of ATHENS: and the children of Theſeus, as priuate ſouldiers followed Elphinor in the warres of TROIA. But after the death of Meneſtheus, who died in the iourney to TROY, Theſeus ſonnes returned vnto ATHENS, where they recouered their ſtate. Sithence there were many occaſiõs which moued the Athenians to reuerence & honor him as a demy God. For in the battell of Marathon, many thought they ſaw his ſhadow and image in armes, fighting againſt the barbarous people. And after the warres of the Medes (the yeare wherein Phedon was gouernor of ATHENS) the Nun Pithia anſwered the Athenias, who had ſent to the oracle of Apollo: that they ſhould bring backe the bones of Theſeus, & putting thẽ in ſome honorable place, they ſhould preſerue and honor them deuoutly. But it was a hard matter to find his graue: and if they had found it, yet had it beene a harder thing to haue brought his bones away, for the malice of thoſe barbarous people which inhabited that Ile: which were ſo wild and fierce, that none could trade or liue with thẽ. Notwithſtãding Cimon hauing taken the Iland (as we haue written in his life) & ſeeking his graue: perceiuing by good hap an eagle pecking with her beake, & ſcraping with her clawes in a place of ſome prety height. Straight it came into his mind (as by diuine inſpiration) to ſearch and digge the place: where was found the tombe of a great body, with the head of a ſpear which was of braſſe, & a ſword with it. Al which things were brought to ATHENS by Cimon in the admirall gally. The Athenias receiued them with great ioy, with proceſſions & goodly ſacrifices, as if Theſeus him ſelfe had bene a liue, & had returned into the city againe. At this day all theſe relicks lye yet in the middeſt of the city, neare to the place where the young men doe vſe all their exerciſes of body. There is free liberty of acceſſe for all ſlaues & poore men, (that are afflicted & purſued, by any mightier then themſelues) to pray & ſacrifice in remembrance of Theſeus: who while he liued was protectour of the oppreſſed, & did curteouſly receiue their requeſts & petitions that prayed to haue aide of him. The greateſt and moſt ſolemne ſacrifice they doe vnto him, is on the eight day of October, in which he returned from CRETA, with the other young children of ATHENS. Howbeit they do not leaue to honor him euery eight day of all other moneths, either becauſe he arriued frõ TROEZEN at ATHENS the eight day of Iune, as Diodorus the Coſmographer writeth: or for that they thought that number to be meeteſt for him, becauſe the bruite ranne he was begotten of Neptune. They do ſacrifice alſo to Neptune, the eight day of euery moneth, becauſe the number of eight is the firſt cube made of euen number, & the double of the firſt ſquare: which doth repreſent a ſtedfaſtnes immoueable, properly attributed to the might of Neptune, whom for this cauſe we ſurname Aſphalius, and Gaiochus, which by interpretation doth ſignifie: the ſafe keeper, and the ſtayer of the earth.

THE LIFE OF Romulus.

Diuers opinions about the name of Rome.

THE Hiſtoriographers doe not agree in their writings, by whom, nor for what cauſe the great name of the citie of ROME (the glory whereof is blowen abroad through all the world) was firſt giuen vnto it. For ſome thinke that the Pelaſgians, after they had ouercome the greateſt part of the world, and had inhabited and ſubdued many nations, in the end did ſtay themſelues in that place where it was new builded: and for their great ſtrength and power in armes, they gaue the name of ROME vnto the city, as ſignifying power in the Greeke tong. Other ſay, that after the taking and deſtruction of TROIA, there were certaine TROIANS which ſauing themſelues from the ſword, tooke ſuch veſſels as they found at aduenture in the hauen, and were by windes put to the THVSCANE ſhore, where they anckred neare vnto the riuer of Tyber. There their wiues being ſo ſore ſea-ſicke, that poſſibly they could not any more endure the boiſtrous ſurges of the ſeas: it happened one of them among the reſt (the nobleſt and wiſeſt of the company) called ROMA, to counſaile the other women of her companions to ſet their ſhips a fire, which they did accordingly. Wherewith their husbands at the firſt were marueilouſly offended. But afterwards, being compelled of neceſſity to plant them ſelues neare vnto the city of PALLANTIVM, they were appeaſed when they ſaw things proſper better then they hoped for, finding the ſoyle there fertile, and the people their neighbours ciuill and gentle in entertayning them. Wherefore amongeſt other honours they did to requite this lady Roma, they called their city after her name, as from whom came the originall cauſe of the building and foundation thereof. They ſay that from thence came this cuſtome continuing yet to this day at ROME, that the women ſaluting their kinſefolkes and husbands doe kiſſe them in the mouth, for ſo did theſe TROIAN Ladyes to pleaſe their husbands, and to winne them againe, after they had loſt their fauours, and procured their diſpleaſures with burning of their ſhippes. Other ſay that Roma was the daughter of Italus, and of Lucaria, or elſe of Telephus the ſonne of Hercules, and of the wife of AEneas: other ſay of Aſcanius, the ſonne of AEneas, who named the city after her name. Other hold opinion, that it was Romanus (the ſonne of Vlyſſes and of Circe) that firſt founded ROME: other wil ſay that it was Romus the ſonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes ſent thither frō TROIA. Other write that it was one Romis a tyranne of the LATINES, who draue the THVSCANS out of thoſe parts parts: which departing out of THESSALY went firſt of all into LYDIA, and afterwards from LYDIA into ITALIE. And furthermore, they who thinke that Romulus (as in deede it carieth beſt likelyhood) was he that gaue the name to the city, doe not agree about his auncеſters. For ſome of them write, that he was the ſonne of AEneas and of Dexithea the daughter of Phorbus, and that he was brought into ITALIE of a litle childe with his brother Remus: and that at that time the riuer of Tyber being ouerflowne, all other ſhippes were caſt away, ſauing the ſhippe in which the two litle boyes were, which by great good happe came to a ſtay vppon a very plaine euen ground on the bancke, and becauſe the children beyond all hope were ſaued by this meanes, therefore the place was afterwards called ROMA. Other ſay that Roma the daughter of the firſt Troian lady was maried vnto Latinus the ſonne of Telemachus, by whom ſhe had Romulus. Other write, that it was AEmilia, the daughter of AEneas and of Lauinia, which was gotten with childe by the god Mars. Other tell a tale of Romulus birth, nothing true nor likely. For it is ſaide that there was ſometime a king of ALBA named Tarchetius, a very wicked and cruell man, in whoſe houſe through the permiſſion of the goddes, appeared ſuch a like viſion: that there roſe vp in the harth of his chimney the forme and faſhion of a mans priuy member, which continued there many dayes. And they ſay, that at that time there was in THVSCANE an oracle of Thetis, from whom they brought vnto this wicked king Tarchetius ſuch an aunſwer: that he ſhould cauſe his daughter yet vnmaried to haue carnall company with the ſtraunge thing, for ſhe ſhould beare a ſonne, that ſhould be famous for his valiancie, for ſtrength of body, and his happie ſucceſſe, wherein he ſhould exceede all men of his time. Tarchetius told this oracle vnto one of his daughters, and willed her to entertaine this ſtraunge thing: but ſhe diſdaining to doe it, ſent one of her waiting women to vndertake the entertainement. But Tarchetius was ſo mad at this, that he cauſed them both to be taken to put them to death: howbeit the goddeſſe Veſta appeared to him in his ſleepe in the night, and charged him he ſhould not doe it. Whereupon he did commaund them to make him a peece of cloth in the priſon, with promiſe that they ſhould be maried when they had finiſhed it. Theſe poore maides toyled at it all the liue long day, but in the night there came other (by Tarchetius commaundement) that did vndoe all they had done the day before. In the meane time, this wayting woman that was got with childe by this ſtrange thing, was deliuered of two goodly boyes or twins: whom Tarchetius gaue vnto one Teratius, with expreſſe commaundement he ſhould caſt them away. This Teratius caried them vnto the bancke of the riuer: thither came a ſhee Wolfe and gaue them ſucke, and certaine birdes that brought litle crummes and put them in their mouthes, vntill a ſwine-heard perceyuing them, and wondring at the ſight, did boldly goe to the children, and tooke them away with him. Theſe infants being thus preſerued after they were come to mans ſtate, did ſet vppon Tarchetius and ſlew him. One Promathion an Italian writer, deliuereth this ſtorie thus. But the report that carrieth beſt credite of all, and is allowed of by many writers: commeth from Diocles Peparethian, (whom Fabius Pictor followeth (in many thinges) who was the firſt that put forth this ſtorie among the GRECIANS, and ſpecially the chiefeſt pointes of it. Though this matter be ſomewhat diuerſely taken, yet in effect the ſtorie is thus. The right line and bloud of the kings of ALBA deſcended from AEneas, by the ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne, and the Kingdome fell in the ende betweene two brethren, Numitor and Amulius. They agreed by lotte to make diuiſion betweene them, whereof the one to haue the Kingdome, and the other all the golde, ſyluer, readie money, goods, and iewels brought from TROIA. Numitor by his lotte choſe the Realme for his portion: Amulius hauing all the golde and treaſure in his hands, did finde him ſelfe thereby the ſtronger, and ſo did eaſely take his Realme from him. And fearing leaſt his brothers daughter might haue children which one day might thruſt him out againe, he made her a Nunne of the goddeſſe Veſta, there to paſſe her dayes in virginitie, and neuer to be maried: (ſome call her Rhea, other Syluia, and other Ilia) neuertheleſſe not long after ſhe was found with childe, againſt the rule and profeſſion of the Veſtall Nunnes. So nothing had ſaued her from preſent death, but the petition of Antho the daughter of king Amulius, who intreated her father for her life: yet notwithſtãding ſhe was ſtraightly locked vp, that no body could ſee her, nor ſpeake with her, leaſt ſhe ſhould be brought to bedde without Amulius knowledge. In the end ſhe was deliuered of two faire boyes and marueilous great twinnes: which made Amulius more affraid then before. So he commaunded one of his men to take the two children, and to throw them away, and deſtroy them. Some ſay that this ſeruants name was Fauſtulus: other thinke it was he that brought them vp. But whoſoeuer he was, he that had the charge to throw them away put them in a trough, and went towards the riuer with intention to throw them in. Howbeit he found it riſen ſo high, and running ſo ſwiftly, that he durſt not come neare the waters ſide, and ſo they being in the trough, he laid them on the banke. In the meane time the riuer ſwelling ſtill, and ouerflowing the banke, in ſuch ſort that it came vnder the trough: did gently lift vp the trough, and caried it vnto a great plaine, called at this preſent Cermanum, and in the old time Germanum (as I take it) becauſe the Romaines called the brothers of father & mother, Germani. Now there was neare vnto this place a wilde figge tree which they called Ruminalis, of the name of Romulus as the moſt part thought: or elſe becauſe the beaſts feeding there, were wont to come vnder the ſame in the extreame heate of the day, and there did Ruminate, that is, chew their cudde in the ſhadow: or perhappes becauſe that the two children did ſucke the teate of the Wolfe, which the auncient LATINES call RVMA, and they at this day doe yet call the goddeſſe on whom they cry out to giue their children ſucke, RVMILIA. And in their ſacrifices to her they vſe no wine, but offer vp milke and water mingled with hony. To theſe two children lying there in this ſort, they write, there came a ſhe Wolfe & gaue them ſucke, and a hitwaw alſo which did helpe to nouriſh and keepe them. Theſe two beaſts are thought to be conſecrated to the god Mars, and the LATINES do ſingularly honour and reuerence the hitwaw. This did much helpe to giue credit to the words of the mother, who affirmed ſhe was conceiued of thoſe two children, by the god Mars. Howbeit ſome thinke ſhe was deceyued in her opinion: for Amulius that had her maidenhead, went to her all armed, and perforce did rauiſhe her. Other hold opinion that the name of the nurſe which gaue the two children ſucke with her breaſts, gaue occaſion to common report to erre much in this tale, by reaſon of the double ſignification thereof. For the LATINES do call with one ſelfe name ſhee Wolfes Lupas, & women that giue their bodies to all cõmers: as this nurſe the wife of Fauſtulus (that brought theſe children home to her houſe) did vſe to doe. By her right name ſhe was called Acca Laurentia, vnto whom the ROMAINES do ſacrifice yet vnto this day: and the prieſt of Mars doth offer vnto her, in the moneth of Aprill, the ſhedding of wine and milke accuſtomed at burials, and the feaſt it ſelfe is called Laurentia. It is true that they honour alſo another Larentia, for like occaſion. The clerke or ſexten of Hercules temple, not knowing one day how to driue away the time as it ſhould ſeeme: of a certaine liuelines and boldneſſe, did deſire the god Hercules to play at dice with him, with condition that if he did winne, Hercules ſhould be bound to ſend him ſome good fortune: and if it were his lucke to loſe, then he promiſed Hercules he would prouide him a very good ſupper, and would beſides bring him a faire gentlewoman to lie withall. The conditions of the play thus rehearſed, the ſexten firſt caſt the dice for Hercules, and afterwards for him ſelfe. It fell out that Hercules wanne, and the ſexten meaning good faith, and thinking it very meete to performe the bargaine that him ſelfe had made, prepared a good ſupper, and hyred this Laurentia the courtiſan, which was very faire, but as yet of no great fame to come to it. Thus hauing feaſted her within the temple, and prepared a bed readie there, after ſupper he locked her into the temple, as if Hercules ſhould haue come in deed and layen with her. And it is ſayd for troth, that Hercules came thither: and commanded her in the morning ſhe ſhould go into the market place, & ſalute the firſt man ſhe met, & keepe him euer for her friend. Which thing ſhe performed, & the firſt man ſhe met was called Tarrutius, a man of great yeares, & one that had gathered together marueilous wealth & riches. He had no children at all, neither was he euer maried. He fel acquainted with this Laurentia, & loued her ſo dearely, that ſhortly after chauncing to die, he made her heire of all he had: wherof ſhe diſpoſed afterwards by her laſt will and teſtament, the beſt and greateſt part vnto the people of Rome. Moreouer it is reported alſo, that ſhe now being growen to be famous and of great honor (as thought to be the lemman of a god) did vaniſh away ſodainly in the ſelf ſame place, where the firſt Laurentia was buried. The place at this day is called Velabrũ: becauſe becauſe the riuer being ouerflowen, they were oftentimes compelled to paſſe by bote to go to the market place, and they called this manner of ferrying ouer, Velatura. Other ſay, that thoſe tomblers and common players, which ſhewed ſundry games and paſtimes to winne the fauor of the people, were wont to couer that paſſage ouer with canuas clothes and veyles, by which they goe from the market place to the liſtes or ſhew place where they runne their horſes, beginning their race euen at the place: and they call a veyle in their tongue, Velum. This is the cauſe why the ſecond Laurentia is honoured at Rome. Fauſtulus chiefe neat-heard to Amulius, tooke vp the two children and no body knew it, as ſome ſay: or as other report, (and likeſt to be true) with the priuity and knowledge of Numitor, Amulius brother, who ſecretly furniſhed them with money that brought vp the two young children. It is ſaid alſo they were both conueyed vnto the city of the GABIANS, where they were brought vp at ſchoole, and taught all other honeſt things, which they vſe to teach the ſonnes and children of good and noble men. Further they ſay they were named Remus and Romulus, becauſe they were foũd ſucking on the teates of a Wolfe. Now the beauty of their bodies did preſently ſhew, beholding onely but their ſtature and manner of their countenaunces, of what nature and linage they were: and as they grew in yeares, their manly courage increaſed marueilouſly, ſo as they became ſtout and hardy men, in ſo much as they were neuer troubled or aſtonied at any danger that was offered them. Howbeit it appeared plainly that Romulus had more wit & vnderſtanding then his brother Remus. For in all things wherein they were to deale with their neighbours, either concerning hunting, or the bounds and limites of their paſtures: it was eaſily diſcerned in him, that he was borne to command, and not to obey. For this cauſe they were both exceedingly beloued of their companions, and of thoſe which were their inferiors. As for the kings heardmen, they paſſed not much for them, ſaying that they were euen like them ſelues, and ſo ſeemed not to care a Pinne for their anger or diſpleaſure, but wholly gaue them ſelues to all gentlemanly exerciſes and trades, thinking to liue idlely and at eaſe without trauell, was neither comely nor cõuenient: but to exerciſe, and harden their bodies with hunting, running, purſuing murderers and theeues, and to helpe thoſe which were oppreſſed with wrong and violence, ſhould be credite and commendation to them. By reaſon whereof, in very ſhort time they grew to great fame and renowne. And it fell out by chaunce there roſe ſome ſtrife and variance between the heardmen of Amulius, and the heardmen of Numitor: in ſo much as thoſe that were Numitors, carried away by force ſome cattell of the others. Thother ſide would not beare that, but purſued faſt after, and beating them well fauoredly, they made them take their legges, and brought backe againe the greateſt part of the cattell they had caried away with them. Wherat Numitor ſtormed marueilouſly, but yet his men ſeemed to make but little account of it, and purpoſing reuenge, they gathered about them a good company of vacabounds (that had neither home nor reſting place) and certaine fugitiue bond men which they intiſed ill fauoredly, incouraging them to ſteale away from their maſters. Thus one day whileſt Romulus was buſie about ſome ſacrifice, (being a deuout man and religious, and well giuen to ſerue the goddes, and to learne to diuine and tell before hand what things ſhould happen and come to paſſe) it happened the heard men of Numitor to meete Remus very ſlenderly accompanied: ſo they fell vpon him ſodainely, blowes were dealt roundly on both ſides, and men were hurt on either part. Howbeit Numitors men in the end proued the ſtronger part, and did take Remus by force, and carried him ſtraight before Numitor, alledging many complaintes and matters againſt him. Numitor durſt not puniſh him of his owne authority, becauſe he feared his brother Amulius, who was ſomewhat terrible: but went vnto him, and earneſtly beſought him to doe him iuſtice, and not to ſuffer him being his owne brother, to receiue ſuch iniury of his men. There was not a man in the city of ALBA, but did greatly miſlike the iniury done to Numitor: and ſpake it openly, that he was no perſon to be offered ſuch a wrong. In ſo much as Amulius moued herewith, did deliuer Remus into his handes, to puniſhe him as he thought good. Whereupon Numitor caried him home with him. But when he had him in his houſe, he began to conſider better of him, with admiration how goodly a young man he was, how in height and ſtrength of bodie he paſſed all the reſt of his people: and perceiuing in his face an aſſured conſtancy, and bold ſtedfaſt courage that yeelded not, nor was abaſhed for any daunger he ſaw toward him: and hearing alſo the report of his actes and manhood to be aunſwerable to that he ſaw: (being chiefly moued in mine opinion by ſome ſecret inſpiration of the goddes, which ordaine the depth of great matters) beganne partly by coniecture, and partly by chaunce to take a conceit of him. So he asked him what he was, and who was his father and mother: ſpeaking to him in a more gentle wiſe, and with a friendlier countenance then before, to make him the bolder to aunſwer, and be of better hope. Remus boldly anſwered him; Truely I will not hide the troth from thee, for thou ſeemeſt to me more worthy to be King, then thy brother Amulius. For thou enquireſt, and heareſt firſt before thou condemneſt: and he condemneth before he examine or heare the parties. Vntill now, we thought we had beene the children of two of the Kings ſeruants, to wit of Fauſtulus and of Laurentia: I ſay we, becauſe my brother and I are two twinnes. But ſeeing we are now falſely accuſed vnto thee, and by malicious ſurmiſed tales are wrongfully brought in daunger of our liues: we intend to diſcouer our ſelues, and to declare ſtraunge things vnto thee, whereof the preſent perill we ſtand now in, ſhall plainely prooue the troth. Men ſay that we haue beene begotten miraculouſly, foſtered and giuen ſucke more ſtraungely, and in our tender yeares were fed by birds and wild beaſts, to whom we were caſt out as a pray. For a Wolfe gaue vs ſucke with her teates, and an hitwaw (they ſay) brought vs little crummes, and put them in our mouthes, as we lay vppon the bancke by the riuer, where we were put in a trough that at this day remaineth whole, bound about with plates of copper, vppon the which are ſome letters engrauen halfe worne out, which peraduenture one day will ſerue for ſome tokens of knowledge (vnprofitable for our parents) when it ſhall be too late, and after we are dead and gone. Numitor then comparing theſe words, with the age the young man ſeemed to be of, and conſidering well his face: did not reiect the hope of his imagination that ſmiled on him, but handled the matter ſo, that he found means to ſpeake ſecretly with his daughter, notwithſtanding at that time ſhe was kept very ſtraightly. Fauſtulus in the meane time hearing that Remus was priſoner, and that the King had deliuered him already into the hands of his brother Numitor to do iuſtice, went to pray Romulus to helpe him, and told him then whoſe children they were for before he had neuer opened it to them but in darke ſpeeches, and glawncing wiſe, and ſo much as ſufficed to put them in ſome hope. So Fauſtulus taking the trough with him at that time, went vnto Numitor in great haſt, as marueilouſly affraide for the preſent daunger he thought Remus in. The Kings ſouldiers which warded at the gates of the city, beganne to gather ſome ſuſpition of Fauſtulus manner of comming: and he made him ſelfe to be the more ſuſpected, being queſtioned with about the cauſe of his repaire thither, that he faltred in his words: beſides, they eſpied his trough which he carried vnder his cloke. Now amongſt the warders, there was by chaunce one that was the man to whom the children were committed to be caſt away, and was preſent when they were left on the banke of the riuer to the mercy of fortune. This man knew the trough by and by, as well by the faſhion, as by the letters grauen vpon it: who miſtruſted ſtraight that which was true in deed. So he did not neglect the thing, but went forthwith to the King to tell him the matter, and led Fauſtulus with him to haue him confeſſe the troth. Fauſtulus being in this perplexity, could not keepe all cloſe vpon examination, but did vtter out ſomewhat of the matter, and yet he told not all. For he plainely iuſtified the children were aliue: yet he ſaid they were farre from the city of Alba, where they kept beaſtes in the fields. And as for the troughe, he was going to carry it to Ilia, becauſe ſhe had diuers times prayed him to let her ſee and feele it: to the end ſhe might be more aſſured of her hope, who promiſed her that one day ſhe ſhould ſee her children againe. So it chaunced vnto Amulius at that time, as it commonly doth vnto thoſe that are troubled, and doe any thing in feare or anger, as a man amazed thereat, to ſend one preſently (who in all other things was a very honeſt man, but a great friend of his brother Numitors) to aske him if he had heard any thing that his daughters children were aliue. This perſon being come to Numitor's houſe, found him ready to embrace Remus, who fell to be witneſſe thereof, and of the good happe diſcouered vnto Numitor: whereupon he perſwaded him how to ſet vpon his brother, and to diſpatch the matter with ſpeede. So from that time forwards, he tooke their part. On the other ſide alſo the matter gaue them no leiſure to deferre their enterpriſe, although they had beene willing:

willing: for the whole caſe was ſomewhat blowne abroade. So Romulus then got ſtraight a power, and drew very neere the citie, & many of the citizens of ALBA went out to ioyne with him, who either feared or hated Amulius. Now Romulus power which he brought (ouer and beſides thoſe citizens) was a good number of fighting men, and they were diuided by hundreds, and euery hundred had his captaine who marched before his band, carying litle bundels of graſſe or of boughes tyed to the end of their poles. The LATINES call theſe bundels Manipulos, whereof it commeth that yet at this day in an armie of the Romaines, the ſouldiers which are all vnder one enſigne, are called Manipulares. So Remus ſturring vp thoſe that were within the citie, and Romulus bringing in men from without, the tyraunt Amulius fell in ſuch feare and agonie, that without prouiding any thing for his ſafetie, they came vpon him ſodainly in his palace, and ſlew him. Thus you heare how neere Fabius Pictor and Diocles Peparethian do agree in reciting the ſtorie, who was the firſt in mine opinion that wrote the foundation of the citie of ROME: howbeit there are that thinke they are all but fables and tales deuiſed of pleaſure. But me thinkes for all that, they are not altogether to be reiected or diſcredited, if we will conſider fortunes ſtrange effects vpon times, and of the greatneſſe alſo of the Romaine empire: which had neuer atchieued to her preſent poſſeſſed power and authoritie, if the gods had not from the beginning bene workers of the ſame, and if there had not alſo bene ſome ſtrange cauſe, and wonderfull foundation. Amulius being now ſlaine as before, and after that all things were appeaſed, and reduced to good order againe: Remus and Romulus would not dwell in the citie of ALBA, being no lords thereof, nor alſo would be lords of it, ſo long as their grandfather by the mothers ſide was aliue. Wherefore after they had reſtored him to his eſtate, and had done the honour and dutie they ought vnto their mother: they purpoſed to go and build a citie in thoſe places where they had beene firſt brought vp, for this was the honeſteſt culler they could pretend for their departing from ALBA. Peraduenture they were enforced ſo to doe whether they would or not, for the great nnmber of baniſhed men, and fugitiue ſlaues which were gathered together by them for their ſtrength, who had bene vtterly loſt and caſt away, if they had bene once diſcharged by them. Therefore it was of neceſſity that they ſhould dwell by themſelues, ſeparated in ſome place, to keepe this number together and in ſome order. For it is true that the inhabitants of the citie of ALBA would not ſuffer ſuch baniſhed perſons and runnagates to be mingled amongeſt them, nor would receiue them into their citie to be free among them. All which appeareth ſufficiently: firſt, becauſe they tooke away women by force: and ſo not of inſolencie, but of neceſſitie, when they founde no man that would beſtow any of them. It is manifeſt alſo they did greatly honour and make much of the women they had taken away before. Furthermore, when their citie beganne a litle to be ſetled, they made a temple of refuge for all fugitiues and afflicted perſons, which they called the temple of the god Aſylæus. Where there was ſanctuarie and ſafetie for all ſorts of people that repaired thither, and could get into the temple, for whom it was alledged they could not deliuer any bond mã to his maſter, nor detter to his creditor, nor murtherer to the iuſtice that was fled thither for ſuccour, becauſe the oracle of Apollo the Delphian had expreſſely enioyned them to graunt ſanctuarie to all thoſe that would come thither for it. So by this meanes in ſhort ſpace their citie flouriſhed, and was repleniſhed, where at the firſt foundation of it, they ſay there was not aboue one thouſande houſes, as more at large hereafter ſhall be declared. When they came now to the building of their citie, Romulus and Remus the two brethren fell ſodainely at a ſtrife together about the place where the citie ſhould be builded. For Romulus built ROME, which is called foure ſquare, and would needes it ſhould remaine in the place which he had choſen. Remus his brother choſe another place very ſtrong of ſituation, vpon mount Auentine, which was called after his name Remonium, and now is called Rignarium. Notwithſtanding, in the end they agreed betweene themſelues, this controuerſie ſhould be decided by the flying of birds, which do giue a happie diuination of things to come. So being ſet in diuers places by themſelues to make obſeruation, ſome ſay that there appeared vnto Remus ſixe, and to Romulus twelue vulters. Other ſay that Remus truely ſaw ſixe, and Romulus feigned from the beginning that he ſawe twiſe as many: but when Remus came to him, then there appeared twelue in deede vnto Romulus, and this is the cauſe why the Romaines at this day in their diuinations and soothsayings of the flying of birds, doe maruellously obserue the flying of the vulters. It is true which the historiographer Herodotus Ponticus writeth; that Hercules reioyced much when there appeared a vulter to him, being readie to begin any enterprise. For it is the foule of the world that doth least hurt, and neuer marreth nor destroieth any thing that man doth sowe, plante, or set: considering that she feedeth on carion only, and doth neuer hurt nor kill any liuing thing. Also she doth not pray vpon dead fowle, for the likenesse that is betweene them: where the eagles, the dukes and the sakers, doe murther, kill, and eate those which are of their owne kinde. And yet as AEschylus sayeth, Needes must that fowle accompted be most vile,

Most rauening, and full of filthie minde,
Which doth himselfe, continually defile, by praying still vpon his proper kinde.

Moreouer, other birdes are alwaies (as a man would say) before our eyes, and do dayly shewe them selues vnto vs: where the vulter is a very rare birde, and hardly to be seene, and men doe not easely finde their ayries. Which hath giuen some occasion to holde a false opinion, that the vulters are passagers, and come into these partes out of straunge countryes. The prognosticators also thinke, that such things which are not ordinarie, and but seldome seene, be not naturall, but miraculously sent by the gods to prognosticate something. When Remus knew how his brother had mocked him, he was very angry with him. And when Romulus had cast a ditche, as it were for the wall about his citie, Remus did not onely scorne it, but hindered also his worke, and in the end for a mockerie lept ouer his wall. To conclude, he did so much, that at the last he was slaine there by Romulus owne handes as some saye: or as other holde opinion, by the hands of one of his men which was called Celer. In this fight they slew Faustulus, and Plistinus also his brother, who had holpen him to bring vp Romulus. Howsoeuer the matter fell out, this Celer absented him selfe from ROME, and went into the countrie of THVSCANE. And they say, that men which are quicke, and ready vpon a sodaine, tooke their names euer after vpon him, and were called Celeres. As amongest other, Quintus Metellus, after the death of his father, hauing in very fewe dayes made the people of ROME to see a combate of fensers (called Gladiatores) fighting at the sharpe, they surnamed him Celer, for that the ROMAINES maruelled how he could prepare his things in so shorte a time. Furthermore, Romulus hauing now buried his brother, and his other two bringers vp (called foster fathers) in the place they call Remonia: beganne then to builde and laye the foundation of his citie, sending for men out of THVSCANE, who did name and teache him particularly all the ceremonies he had to obserue there, according to their lawes and ordinances as a great holy mysterie. And first of all they made a rounde ditche in the place called at this day Comitium, into which they did cast their chiefest and best things, which men vse lawfully for good, and naturally as most necessarie. After that they did throwe also into it, a litle of the earth, from whence euery man came, and mingled these all together. This ditche in their ceremonies is called the worlde, in Latine Mundus, euen the selfe same name the Latines call the Vniuersall. About this ditche they did trace the compasse of the citie they would builde, euen as one would draw a circle about a center. This done, the founder of the citie taketh a plough, to which he fastened a culter or ploughe share of brasse, and so yoaked in the ploughe an oxe and a cowe, he himselfe houlding the ploughe did make rounde about the compasse of the citie a deepe furrowe. Those which followed him, had the charge to throwe the turues of earth inwarde into the citie, which the plough share raised vp, and not to leaue any of them turned outward. The furrowe thus cast vp was the whole compasse of their walle, which they call in Latine Pomerium, by shortning of the syllables, for post murum: to wit, after wall. But in the place where they determined to make a gate, they did take off the ploughe share, and draw the ploughe, with leauing a certaine space of earthe vnbroken vp: whereupon the ROMAINES thinke all the compasse of their walles holy and sacred, except their gates. For if their gates had bene hallowed and sanctified, they would haue had a conscience through them to haue brought in, or caried out of the citie, any things necessarie for the life of man, that had not bene pure and cleane. Nowe they beleeue certainely, that this ceremonie of the foundation of their citie, was made the one and twentie of Aprill: becauſe the ROMAINES do yet keepe that day holy day, and call it the feaſt the natiuitie of their countrie. On which day they did not in olde time ſacrifice any thing that had life, as eſteeming that day (which was the natiuitie of their citie) to be moſt meete to be kept cleane and pure from being polluted or defiled with any bloud. Notwithſtanding before ROME was builded, they had another feaſt called the ſheapeheards or heardmens holy day, which they did celebrate vpon the ſame daye, and called it Palilia. Nowe at this day the beginnings of the moneths with the ROMAINES is cleane contrarie to the GRECIANS: yet for all this, they holde opinion for certaintie that the day on which Romulus founded his citie, was aſſuredly that which the GRECIANS call Triacada; that is to ſay, the thirtie day. On which there was ſeene an eclypſe of the moone, which they ſuppoſe was obſerued by the Poet Antimachus (borne in the citie of TEOS) in the thirteenth yeare of the ſixt Olympiade. Likewiſe in the time of Marcus Varro (as a man learned, and one that had redde as much of auncient ſtories as any ROMAINE) there was a friend of his called Tarutius, a great philoſopher and mathematician, who being giuen to the calculation of aſtronomie for the delight of ſpeculation only, wherein he was thought moſt excellent; it did fall out that Varro gaue him this queſtion, to ſearche out what hower and daye the natiuitie of Romulus was, who gathered it out by certaine accidents, as they doe in the reſolutions of certaine geometricall queſtions. For they ſay, that by the ſelfe ſame ſcience, one may tell before of things to come, and to happen to a man in his life, knowing certainely the hower of his natiuitie: and how one may tell alſo the hower of his natiuitie, when by accidents they know what hath happened to him all his life. Tarutius did the queſtion that Varro gaue him. And hauing throughly conſidered the aduentures, deedes, and geſtes of Romulus, howe long he liued, and how he dyed: all which being gathered and conferred together, he did boldly iudge for a certaintie, that he was conceiued in his mothers wombe, in the firſt yeare of the ſecond Olympiade, the three and twentie day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Choeac, and now is called December, about three of the clocke in the morning, in which hower there was a whole eclypſe of the ſunne: And that he was borne into the world, the one and twentith of the moneth of Thoth, which is the moneth of September, about the riſing of the ſunne. And that ROME was begonne by him on the ninth day of the moneth which the ÆGYPTIANS call Pharmuthi, and aunſwereth now to the moneth of Aprill, betweene two and three of the clocke in the morning. For they will ſay that a cittie hath his reuolution and his time of continuance appointed, as well as the life of a man: and that they knew by the ſituation of the ſtarres, the day of her beginning and foundation. Theſe things and ſuch other like, peradventure will pleaſe the readers better, for their ſtrangeneſſe and curioſitie, then offend or miſlike them for their falſehood. Now after that he had founded his citie, he firſt and formoſt did diuide in two companies, all thoſe that were of age to carie armour. In euery one of theſe companies there were three thouſand footmen, and three hundred horſemen: and they were called Legions, becauſe they were ſorted of the choſen men that were pyckt out amongeſt all the reſt for to fight. The remaine after theſe was called Populus, which ſignifieth the people. After this, he made a hundred counſellers of the beſt and honeſteſt men of the citie, which he called Patricians: and the whole company of them together he called Senatus, as one would ſay, the counſell of the auncients. So they were called Patricians, as ſome will ſaye, the counſaile of the fathers lawfull children, which few of the firſt inhabitants could ſhewe. It may be, ſome will ſay this name was giuen them of Patrocinium, as growing of the protection they had by the ſanctuarie of their citie, which word they vſe at this day in the ſelfe ſame ſignification: as one that followed Euander into ITALIE, was called Patron, becauſe he was pitifull, and relieued the poore and litle children, and ſo got himſelfe a name for his pitie and humanitie. But me thinkes it were more like the trothe to ſay, that Romulus did call them ſo, becauſe he thought the chiefeſt men ſhould haue a fatherly care of the meaner ſorte: conſidering alſo it was to teache the meaner ſorte that they ſhould not feare the authoritie of the greater, nor enuie at their honours they had, but rather in all their cauſes ſhould vſe their fauour and good will, by taking them as their fathers. For euen at this preſent, ſtraungers call

What the Patricians and Senate were.

Patres Conscripti.

those of the Senate, lordes or captaines: but the naturall ROMAINES call them, Patres Conscripti, which is a name of fatherhead and dignitie without enuie. It is true, that at the beginning they were only called Patres, but sithence, because they were many ioyned vnto the first, they haue bene named Patres Conscripti, as a man should say, fathers of recorde together: which is the honourablest name he could haue deuised to make a difference betwixt the Senatours, and the people. Furthermore, he made a difference betweene the cheefer citizens, and the baser people, by calling the better sorte Patroni, as much to saye, as defenders: and the meaner sorte Clientes, as you would say, followers, or men protected. This did breede a maruellous great loue and good will among them, making the one much beholding to the other, by many mutuall curtesies and pleasures: for the Patrons did helpe the clients to their right, defended their causes in iudgement, did giue vnto them counsaile, and did take all their matters in hand. The clients againe enterchaungeably humbled themselues to their patrons, not onely in outwarde honour and reuerence towardes them, but otherwise did helpe them with money to marrie and aduaunce their daughters, or els to pay their debts and credit, if they were poore or decayed. There was no lawe nor magistrate that could compell the patron to be a witnesse against his client: not yet the client to witnesse against his patron. So they increased, and continued, all other rights and offices of amitie and friendship together, sauing afterwards they thought it a great shame and reproache for the better, and richer, to take reward of the meaner and poorer. And thus of this matter we haue spoken sufficiently. Moreouer, foure moneths after the foundation of the citie was layed, Fabius writeth, there was a great rauishment of women. There are some which lay it vpon Romulus, who being then of nature warlike, and geuen to prophecies and aunswers of the goddes, foretolde that his citie should become very great and mightie, so as he raised it by warres, and increased it by armes: and he sought out this colour to do mischiefe, and to make war vpon the SABYNES. To proue this true, some say he caused certaine of their maides by force to be taken away, but not past thirtie in number, as one that rather sought cause of warres, then did it for neede of mariages: which me thinkes was not likely to be true, but rather I iudge the contrarie. For seeing his citie was incontinently repleniſhed with people of all sorts, whereof there were very fewe that had wiues, and that they were men gathered out of all countries, and the most parte of them poore and needie, so as their neighbours disdained them much, and did not looke they would long dwell together: Romulus hoping by this violent taking of their maides and rauishing them, to haue an entrie into alliance with the SABYNES, and to entise them further to ioyne with them in mariage, if they did gently intreate these wiues they had gotten, enterprised this violent taking of their maides, and rauishing of them in such a sorte. First he made it to be commonly bruted abroad in euery place, that he had founde the altar of a god hidden in the grounde, and he called the name of the god, Consus: either because he was a god of counsaile, whereupon the ROMAINES at this day in their tongue call Consilium, which we call counsell: and the chiefe magistrates of their citie Consules, as we say counsellers. Other saye it was the altar of the god Neptune, surnamed the patron of horses. For this altar is yet at this day within the great listes of the citie, and euer couered and hidden, but when they vse the running games of their horse race. Other say because counsell euer must be kept close and secret, they had good reason to keepe the altar of this god Consus hidden in the ground. Nowe other write when it was opened, Romulus made a sacrifice of wonderfull ioye, and afterwards proclaimed it openly in diuers places, that at such a day there should be common playes in ROME, and a solemne feast kept of the god Consus, where all that were disposed to come should be welcome Great numbers of people repaired thither from all partes. He himselfe was set in the chiefest seate of the showe place, apparelled faire in purple, and accompanied with the chiefe of his citie about him. And there hauing purposed this rauishment you haue heard of, he had giuen the signe before: that the same should beginne, when he should rise vp and folde a plaite of his gowne, and vnfolde the same againe. Hereupon his men stood attending with their swordes: who so soone as they perceiued the signe was giuen, with their swords drawne in hand, and with great showtes and cryes, ranne violently on the maydes and daughters of the SABYNES to take them awaye and rauishe them, and suffered the men to runne away, away, without doing them any hurt or violence. So some say, there were but thirtie rauished, after whose names were called the thirtie linages of the people of Rome. Howbeit Valerius Antias writeth, that there were fiue hundred and seuen and twentie: and Iuba, sixe hundred foure score & three. In the which is singularly to be noted for the commendation of Romulus, that he him selfe did take then but onely one of the maydes, named Hersilia: that afterwards was the onely cause and mediation of peace betwixt the Sabynes and the Romaines. Which argueth plainely, that it was not to doe the Sabynes any hurt, nor to satisfie any disordinate lust, that they had so forcibly vndertaken this rauishment: but to ioyne two peoples together, with the straighrest bondes that could be betweene men. This Hersilia as some say, was maried vnto one Hostilius, the noblest man at that time amongst the Romaines: or as others write, vnto Romulus himselfe, which had two children by her. The first was a daughter, and her name was Prima, because she was the first: the other was a sonne, whō he named Aollius, because of the multitude of people hee had assembled together in his citie, and afterwards he was surnamed Abillius. Thus Zenodotus the Troezenian writeth, wherein notwithstanding there be diuers that doe contrarie him. Among those which rauished then the daughters of the Sabynes, it is saide there were founde certaine meane men carying away, a marueilous passing faire one. These met by chance on the waye, certaine of the chiefe of the citie, who would haue taken her by force from them, which they had done, but that they beganne to cry, they caried her vnto Talasius, who was a young man marueilously well beloued of euerie body. Which when the others vnderstoode, they were exceeding glad, and they commended them: in so much as there were some which sodainely turned backe againe, and did accompanie them for Talasius sake, crying out alowd, and often on his name. From whence the custome came, which to this day the Romaines sing at their mariages, Talasius, like as the Grecians sing Hymenæus. For it is sayde he was counted very happie that he met with this woman. But Sextius Sylla a Carthaginian borne, a man very wise, and well learned, tolde me once it was the cry and signe which Romulus gaue to his men, to beginne the rauishment: whereupon those which caried them away, went crying this word Talasius, and that from thence the custome hath continued, that they sing it yet at their mariages. Neuertheless the most part of authors, specially Iuba, thinkes it is a warning to remember the new maried women of their worke, which is to spinne, which the Grecians cal Talasia, the Italian word at that time being not mingled with the Greeke. And if it be true the Romaines vsed this terme of Talasia, as we of Grece do vse: we might by coniecture yeeld another reason for it, which should carrie a better likelihoode and proofe. For when the Sabynes after the battell, had made peace with the Romaines, they put in an article in fauour of the women in the treatie, that they should not be bound to serue their husbandes in any other worke, but in spinning of wolle. Euer since this custome hath growen, that those which giue their daughter in mariage, and those who leade the bride, and such as are present at the wedding, speake in sport to the newe maried wife, laughing, Talasius: in token that they doe not leade the bride for any other worke or seruice, but to spinne wolle. Thereof this hath bene the vse to this day, that the bride doth not of her selfe come ouer the threshold of her husbandes doore, but she is hoysed pretily into the house: because the Sabyne women at that time were so lift vp, and caried away by force. They say also, that the manner of making the shed of the new wedded wiues haire, with the Iron head of a Iaueling, came vp then likewise: this storie being a manifest token that these first mariages were made by force of armes, and as it were at the swords point: as we haue written more at large in the booke, wherein we render and shew the causes of the Romaines fashions and customes. This rauishment was put in execution about the eighteenth day of the moneth then called Sextilis, and now named August: on which day they yet celebrate the feast they call Consalia. Now the Sabynes were good men of warre, and had great numbers of people, but they dwelt in villages, and not within inclosed walles: being a thing fit for their noble courages that did feare nothing, and as those who were descended from the Lacedæmonians. Neuertheles, they seeing themselues bound and tyed to peace by pledges & hōstages, that were very neere allyed vnto them, and fearing their daughters should be ill intreated: sent ambassadours to Romulus, by whom they made reasonable offers and perswasions, that their daughters might be deliuered vnto them againe, without any force or violence, and then afterwardes, that he would cause them to be asked in mariage of their parents, as both reason and lawe would require. To the end that with good will and consent of all parties, both peoples might contract amitie and alliance together. Whereunto Romulus made aunswere, he could not restore the maydes which his people had taken away and maried: but most friendly he prayed the SABYNES to be contented with their alliance. This answere being returned, & not liked, whilest the princes and communaltie of the SABYNES were occupied in consultation, and about the arming of themselues: Acron king of the CENINENSES (a man exceeding couragious and skilfull in the warres, and one that from the beginning mistrusted the ouer bold & stout enterprises that Romulus was likely to attempt, cõsidering the late rauishment of the SABYNES daughters, and how he was alreadie greatly dreaded of his neighbours, and somewhat vntolerable, if he were not chasticed and brought lower) first beganne to inuade him with a puissant armie, and to make hotte and violent warres vpon him. Romulus on the other side prepared also, and went foorth to meete him. When they were come so neere together that they might see one another, they sent defiance to ech other, and prayed that they two might fight man to man amiddest their armies, and neither of theirs to sturre a foote. Both of them accepted of it, and Romulus making his prayer vnto Iupiter, did promise, and made a vow: that if he did giue him the victorie to ouercome, he would offer vp to him the armour of his enemie, which he did. For first he slew Acron in the field, and afterwards gaue battell to his men, and ouerthrew thẽ also. Lastly he tooke his citie, where he did no hurt nor yet displeasure to any, sauing that he did commaund them to pull downe their houses, and destroy them, and to goe dwell with him at ROME: where they should haue the selfe same rights & priuiledges which the first inhabitants did enioy. There was nothing more enlarged the citie of ROME, then this manner of pollicie, to ioyne alwayes vnto it those she had ouercome and vanquished. Romulus now to discharge his vow, and in such sort that his offering might be acceptable to Iupiter, and pleasant to his citizens to behold: did cut downe a goodly straight growen young oke, which he lighted on by good fortune, in the place where his campe did lye. The same he trimmed and did set forth after the manner of victorie, hanging and tying all about it in fayre order, the armour and weapons of king Acron. Then he girding his gowne to him, & putting vpon his long bush of hayre, a garland of lawrell, layd the young oke vpon his right shoulder, and he first marched before towards his citie, and sung a royall song of victorie, all his armie following him in armes vnto the citie in order of battell: where his citizens receiued him in all passing wise and triumph. This noble and stately entry euer since hath giuen them mindes in such sort, and in statelier wise to make their triumph. The offering of this triumph was dedicated to Iupiter surnamed Feretrian: because the Latine word Ferire, signifieth to hurt & kill: and the prayer Romulus had made, was, he might hurt & kill his enemie. Such spoyles are called in Latine, Spolia opima: therefore layth Varro, that opes signifie riches. Howbeit me thinks it were more likely to say, that they were so named of this worde Opus, which betokeneth a deede, because he must needes be the chiefe of the armie, that hath slaine with his owne hands the generall of his enemies, and that must offer the spoyles called Spolia opima, as you would say, his principall spoyles and deeds. This neuer happened yet but to three Romaine captaines only: of the which Romulus was the first, who slew Acron, king of the CENINENSES. Cornelius Cossus was the second, who killed Tolumnius, the generall of the THVSCANS. Clodius Marcellus was the third, who slew Britomartus, king of the GAVLES, with his owne hands. And for the two last, Cossus & Marcellus, they made their entry into the citie, carying their triumphes vpon charets triumphant: but Romulus did not so. Therefore in this point Dionysius the historiographer hath erred, writing that Romulus did enter into ROME vpon a charret triumphant. For it was Tarquinius Priscus the sonne of Demaratus, who first did set out triumphs in so stately & magnificent show. Other hold opinion it was Valerius Publicola, who was the first that euer entred vpon triumphant charret. Concerning Romulus, his statues are yet to be seene in Rome, carying his triumph a foote. After this ouerthrow & taking of the CENINENSES, the inhabitants of the cities of FIDENA, CRVSTVMERIVM, and ANTEMNA, rose altogether together against the ROMAINES whiles the other SABYNES also were a preparing themselues. So they fought a battell, in which they tooke the ouerthrow: & left their cities to the spoyle of Romulus, their lands to be giuen where he thought good, & themselues to be caried to ROME. Romulus then did giue their lands among his citizens, except those lands which did belong to the fathers of the maidens that they had taken away & rauished. For he was contented that the fathers of them should keepe still their lands. By & by the other SABYNES stomaking thereat, did chuse them a generall called Tatius, & so went with a puissant armie toward the citie of ROME, whereunto to approch at that time it was very hard, the castle or keepe of their city being seated, where at this day the Capitoll standeth, within which there was a great garrison, whereof Tarpeius was captaine, & not his daughter Tarpeia, as some will say, who set out Romulus as a foole. But Tarpeia the captaines daughter, for the desire she had to haue all the gold bracelets which they did weare about their armes, sold the fort to the SABYNES, and asked for reward of her treason, all they did weare on their left armes. Tatius promised them vnto her: and she opened them a gate in the night, by the which she did let all the SABYNES into the castle. Antigonus then was not alone, who sayd, he loued those which did betray, & hated them that had betrayed: nor yet Cæsar Augustus, who told Rymitalces the THRACIAN, that he loued treason, but he hated traytors. And it is a common affection which we beare to wicked persons, whilest we stand in neede of them: not vnlike for all the worlde to those which haue neede of the gall and poyson of venemous beasts. For when they finde it, they are glad, & take it to serue their turne: but after their turne is serued, & they haue that they sought, they hate the crueltie of such beasts. So played Tatius at that time. For when he was gotten into the castle, he commanded the SABYNES (for performance of his promise he had made to Tarpeia) they should not sticke to giue her all they weare on their left armes, & to do as he did: who taking from his owne arme first, the bracelets which he ware, did cast it to her, and his target after. And so did all the rest in like sort, in so much as being borne down to the ground by the weight of bracelets & targets, she died as pressed to death vnder her burden. Neuertheles Tarpeius selfe was atteinted, and condemned also of treason, by Romulus order, as Iuba saith, it is set forth by Sulpitius Galba. They that write now otherwise of Tarpeia, saying she was the daughter of Tatius, generall of the SABYNES, & was forced by Romulus to lie with him, & how she was punished in this sort by her owne father after her said treason committed: those I say, amongst whom Antigonus is one, are not to be credited. And the Poet Simylus also doth dote most, who sayth Tarpeia sold the Capitoll not to the SABYNES, but to the king of GAVLES, with whom she was in loue: as in these verses doth appeare.

The Sabynes led by Tatius, went to besiege the citie of Rome.

Tarpeia prest to death.

Tarpeia, that mayde of foolish minde, which neere vnto the Capitoll did dwell (Inferuent flames, of beastly loue beblinde, wherewith the king of Gaules did make her swell) Caused stately ROME surprised for to be by enemies, as euery man may see.
And so through hope of his fidelitie betrayed her Syre, with all his familie.

And a litle after, in speaking of the manner of her death, he sayth also:

Yet lo: the Gaules, those worthy men of might threw her not downe, into the waues of Po, But from their armes, wherewith they wont to fight they cast their shields vpon her bodie so,
That she surprest with such an heauy waight, (Ah wofull mayde) to death was smoothred straight.

This mayden therefore being buried in the same place, the whole hill was called afterwards Tarpeius after her name, which continued vntill Tarquinius the King did dedicate all the place to Iupiter: for then they caried her bones into some other place, and so it lost her name. Onles it be that rocke of the Capitoll, which at this present time they call Rupes Tarpeia, from the toppe whereof they were wont in old time to throwe downe headlong all wicked offenders.

When the SABYNES now had gotten this holde, Romulus being exceeding wrath, ſent them a defiance, and bad them battell if they durſt. Tatius ſtraight refuſed not, conſidering if by miſchaunce they were diſtreſſed, they had a ſure refuge to retire vnto. The place betweene the two armies where the fight ſhould be, was all round about enuironed with litle hilles. So as it was plaine, the fight could not be but ſharpe and daungerous, for the diſcõmodiouſnes of the place, where was neither ground for any to flie, nor yet any ſpace for any long chaſe, it was of ſo ſmall a compaſſe. Now it fortuned by chaunce, the riuer of Tyber had ouerflowen the bankes a few dayes before, and there remained in it a deeper mudde then men would haue iudged, becauſe the ground was ſo plaine, and was euen where the great market place of ROME ſtandeth at this day. They could diſcerne nothing thereof by the eye, becauſe the vpper part of it was cruſted, whereby it was the more readie for them to venter vpon, and the worſe to get out, for that it did ſinke vnderneath. So the SABYNES had gone vpon it, had not Curtius daunger bene, which by good fortune ſtayed them. He was one of the nobleſt and valianteſt men of the SABYNES, who being mounted vpon a courſer, went on a good way before the armie. This courſer entring vpon the cruſted mudde, & ſincking with all, began to plunge and ſtruggle in the myre: whereat Curtius proued a while with the ſpurre to ſturre him, and get him out, but in the end ſeeing it would not be, he left his backe, and ſaued him ſelfe. The ſame very place to this day is called after his name, Lacus Curtius. The SABYNES then ſcaping thus this daunger, beganne the battell. The fight did grow very cruell, and endured ſo a great while, the victorie leaning no more to the one ſide then to the other. There dyed in a ſmall ſpace a great number of men, amongeſt whom Hoſtilius was one, who as they ſay was the husband of Herſilia, and grandfather to Hoſtilius that was king of ROMAINES after Numa Pompilius. Afterwards there were (as we may thinke) many other encounters and battels betweene them: howbeit they make mention of the laſt aboue all the reſt, wherein Romulus had ſo ſore a blow on his head with a ſtone, that he was almoſt felled to the ground, in ſo much as he was driuen to retire a little out of the battel. Vpon which occaſion the ROMAINES gaue backe alſo, and drew towards mount Palatine, being driuen out of the plaine by force. Romulus beganne now to recouer of the blow he had receiued, and ſo returned to giue a new onſet, and cryed out all he might to his ſouldiers to tarie, and ſhew their face againe to their enemie. But for all his lowd crying, they left no flying ſtill for life, and there was not one that durſt returne againe. Whereupon Romulus lifting vp his handes ſtraight to heauen, did moſt feruently pray vnto Iupiter, that it would pleaſe him to ſtay the flying of his people, and not ſuffer the ROMAINES glorie thus to fall to their vtter deſtruction, but to repaire it by his fauour againe. He had no ſooner ended his prayer, but diuers of his men that fled, beganne to be aſhamed to flie before their King, and a ſodaine boldnes came vpon them, and their feare therewithall vaniſhed away. The place they firſt ſtayed in was, whereas now is the temple of Iupiter Stator, which is as much to ſay, as Iupiter the ſtayer. Afterwards gathering themſelues together againe, they repulſed the SABYNES euen to the place they call now Regia, and vnto the temple of the goddeſſe Veſta: where both the battels being prepared to giue a new charge, there did fall out before them, a ſtraunge and vncredible thing to ſee, which ſtayed them they fought not. For of the SABYNE women whom the ROMAINES had rauiſhed, ſome ranne of the one ſide, other of the other ſide of the battels, with lamentations, cryes, & ſhowts, ſtepping betweene their weapons, and among the ſlaine bodies on the ground, in ſuch ſort that they ſeemed out of their wits, and caried as it were with ſome ſpirites. In this manner they went to find out their fathers and their husbandes, ſome carying their ſucking babes in their armes, other hauing their hayre looſe about their eyes, and all of them calling, now vpon the SABYNES, now vpon the ROMAINES, with the genteleſt names that could be deuiſed: which did melt the hearts of both parties in ſuch ſort, that they gaue backe a little, and made them place betweene both the battels. Then were the cryes and lamentations of euery one plainely heard. There was not a man there but it pittied him, aſwell to ſee them in that pitifull caſe, as to heare the lamentable wordes they ſpake: adding to their moſt humble petitions and requeſtes that could be any way imagined, paſſing wiſe perſwaſions and reaſons to induce them to a peace. you, that we ſhould deſerue ſuch an heape of euils, as we haue already ſuffered, and yet you make vs beare? we were as you know violently (and againſt all law) rauiſhed by thoſe, whoſe now we remain. But our fathers, our brethren, our mothers and friends haue left vs with them ſo long, that proceſſe of time, and the ſtraighteſt bonds of the world, haue tyed vs now ſo faſt to them, whom mortally before we hated, that we are conſtrayned now to be flighted thus, to ſee them fight, yea and to lament & die with them, who before vniuſtly tooke vs from you. For then you came not to our reſcue when we were virgins vntouched, nor to recouer vs from them when they wickedly aſſaulted vs, poore ſoules: but now ye come to take the wiues from their husbands, & the mothers from their litle children. So as the helpe ye thinke to giue vs now doth grieue vs more, then the forſaking of vs was ſorrowfull to vs then. Such is the loue they haue borne vnto vs, and ſuch is the kindneſſe we beare againe to them. Now, if ye did fight for any other cauſe then for vs, yet were it reaſon ye ſhould let fall your armes for our ſakes (by whom you are made grandfathers and fathers in law, coſins and brothers in law) euen from thoſe againſt whom you now bend your force. But if all this war beganne for vs, we heartely beſeech you then that you will receiue vs with your ſonnes in law, and your ſonnes by them, and that you will reſtore vnto vs our fathers, our brethren, our kinſefolks and friends, without ſpoyling vs of our husbands, of our children, and of our ioyes, and thereby make vs woefull captiues and priſoners in our mindes. Theſe requeſts and perſwaſions by Herſilia, and other the SABINE women being heard, both the armies ſtaied, and held euery body his hand, and ſtraight the two generalles imparled together. During which parle they brought their husbãds and their children, to their fathers and their brethren. They brought meat and drinke for them that would eate. They dreſſed vp the woundes of them that were hurt. They caried them home with them to their houſes. They ſhewed them how they were miſtreſſes there with their husbands. They made them ſee how greatly they were accoumpted of and eſteemed: yea how with a wedlocke loue and reputation they were honored. So in the end peace was concluded betweene them, wherein it was articled, that the SABINE women which would remaine with their husbands ſhould tarrie ſtill, and be exempted from all work or ſeruice (as aboue recited) ſaue only ſpinning of woll. And that the SABINES & ROMAINES ſhould dwell together in the city, which ſhould be called ROMA, after Romulus name: & the inhabitants ſhould be called Quirites, after the name of the city of Tatius king of the SABINES, & that they ſhould raigne & gouern together by a common conſent. The place where this peace was concluded, is called yet to this day Comitium: becauſe that Coire, in the Latine tongue ſignifieth to aſſemble. So the city being augmented by the one halfe, they did chooſe of the SABINES another hũdred new PATRICIANS, vnto the firſt hũdred of the ROMAINES that were choſen before. Then were the Legions made of ſix thouſand footmen, and ſix hundred horſemẽ. After they deuided their inhabitãts into three Tribes, whereof thoſe that came of Romulus, were called Ramnenſes after his name: thoſe that came of Tatius were called Tatienſes after his name: and thoſe that were of the third ſtock, were called Lucerenſes, as from the Latine word Lucus, called with vs a groue in Engliſh, becauſe thither great number of people of all ſorts did gather, which afterwards were made citizens of ROME. The very word of Tribus (which ſignifieth bands, warres, or hundreds) doth witneſſe this beginning of ROME from wards, or hundreds. For hereupon the ROMAINES call thoſe at this day, their Tribunes, which are the chiefe heades of the people. But euery one of theſe principall wardes had afterwards ten other particular wards vnder them, which ſome thinke were called after the names of the thirtie SABINE women that were rauiſhed: but that ſeemeth falſe, becauſe many of them cary the names of the places they came frõ. Howbeit at that time many things were ſtabliſhed and ordained in honor of women: as to giue them place, the vpper hand in meeting them, the vpper hand in ſtreets: to ſpeake no fowle or diſhoneſt word before them, no man to vnray himſelf, or ſhew naked before them: that they ſhould not be called before criminall iudges ſitting vpõ homicides & murderers: that their children ſhould weare about their necks a kind of a Iuel, called Bulla, faſhioned in mãner like theſe water bubbles that riſe vpõ the water whẽ it beginneth to rain: & that their gowns ſhould be garded with purple. Now the two kings did not ſtraight confer together ſo ſoone as any occaſiõ of buſines was offered them, but either of them did first counsell alone with his hundred Senatours, and afterwards they did all assemble together. Tatius dwelt in the place where now is the temple of Iuno Moneta: Romulus in the place called at this present, the staires of the faire banke, then the descent of mount Palatine, as they go to the show place of great liftes, where they say was sometime the holy cornell tree, whereof they make so great account. Romulus one day desirous to proue his strength, threw (as it is laide) a dart from mount Auentine toward mount Palatine. The staffe whereof was of a cornell tree: and the Iron of it entred so deepe into the ground being a lusty fat soile, that no man could pull it out, although many proued it, & did the best they could. The ground being very good and fit to bring forth trees, did so nourish the end of this staffe, that it tooke roote, and beganne to spread braunches: so that in time it became a faire great cornell tree, which the successors of Romulus did inclose with a wall, and did keepe and worship it as a very holy thing. If by chaunce any went to see it, and found it looked not fresh and greene, but like a tree withered and dried away for lacke of moisture: he went away straight as one affraide, crying to all he met (& they with him went crying still) in euery place, water, water, as it had ben to haue quenched a fire. Then ranne they thither out of all quarters with vessels of water, to water and moist the tree. In the time of Caius Cæsar, who caused the staires about it to be repaired: they say the labourers raysing the place, and digging about this cornell tree, did by negligence hurt the rootes of the same in such sort, as afterwardes it dried vp altogether.

The Sabines vsed the Romaines moneths.

Now the SABINES receiued the moneths after the manner of the ROMAINES, whereof we haue written sufficiently in the life of Numa. Romulus againe vsed the SABINES shields: and both he and his people chaunged the fashion of their armour and weapons they vsed. For the ROMAINES before did cary litle shields after the fashion of the ARGIVES. As for either of their holy daies and sacrifices, they kept them both altogether, and did not take away any of them, which either the one or the other people obserued before, but they added thereunto some other new. As that which they call Matronalia, which was instituted in honour of the women, because by their meanes peace was concluded. And that also of Carmentalia, in the honour of Carmenta, whom some suppose to be the goddesse of fate or destiny, because shee hath rule & power ouer the natiuities of men, by reason whereof, the mothers call vpon her often, & reuerence her very much. Other say she was the wife of Euander the Arcadian, who being a prophetesse inspired by the god Phœbus, gaue the oracles in verse, whereupon she was surnamed Carmenta, because that Carmina in Latine signifie verses: for it is of certainty that her proper name was Nicostrata. Howbeit there are some which giue another manner of deriuation and interpretation of this word Carmenta, which is the liklier to be true: as if they would say, Carens mente: which signifieth wanting wit, for the very furie that taketh the when they are inspired with the prophetical spirite. For in Latine Carere betokeneth to lacke: and Mens, signifieth wit. As for the feast of Palilia, we haue told of it before: but the feast of Lupercalia, considering the time of celebrating thereof, it seemeth it is ordeined for a purification. For it is celebrated on the vnfortunate daies of the moneth of Februarie, which are called the purging daies. The daies in the old time on which they did celebrate the same, were called Februata. But the proper name of the feast, is as much to say, as the feast of Wolues. Wherefore it seemeth to be a feast of great antiquity, and instituted by the ARCADIANS which came in with Euander: albeit the name of Wolues is as common to the females, as the males, and so it might perhaps be called, by reason of the Wolfe that brought vp Romulus. For we see those which runne vp and down the city that day, and they call Luperci, do beginne their course in the very place where they say Romulus was cast out. Howbeit many things are done, whereof the originall cause were hard now to be coniectured. For goates about a certaine time of the yeare, are killed, then they bring two yong boies, noble mens sons, whose foreheads they touch with the knife bebloudied with the bloud of the goates that are sacrificed. By and by they dry their forheads with woll dipped in milke. Then the young boyes must laugh immediatly after they haue dried their forheads. That done, they cut the goates skinnes, & make thongs of the, which they take in their hands, and run with them all about the city starke naked (sauing they haue a cloth before their secrets) and so they strike with these thonges all they meete in their way. The young wiues doe neuer shunne them at all, but are well cotented to be striken with them, beleeuing beleeuing it helpeth them to be with childe, and also to be easily deliuered. There is another thing yet in this feast, that these LVPERCIANS which runne about the city, do also sacrifice a dog. Concerning this feast, the Poet named Butas doth write somewhat in his elegies, where shewing the occasion of the fond customes and ceremonies of the ROMAINES, he doth say that Romulus after that he had slaine Amulius, did runne straight with great ioy to the very place where the Wolfe gaue him & his brother sucke, in memory of which running, he saith this feast of Lupercalia was celebrated: and that the noble mens yonger sons doe run through the city striking and laying on them which they meete in their way with their goate thongs, in token that Remus and Romulus ranne from ALBA vnto that place, with their drawn swords in their hands. And that the touching of their forehead with a blouddy knife, is in remembrance of the daunger they stoode in at that time to haue bene slaine. Last of all, the drying of their foreheads with wolle dipped in milke, is in memory of the milke they sucked of the Wolues. But Caius Acilius writeth, that Remus and Romulus before ROME was built, did happen to lose their beasts on a day, and after they had made certaine prayers vnto Faunus for the finding of them, they ran here and there starke naked as they went a seeking of them, for feare they should haue bene troubled with ouermuch heat and sweating. And this is the cause he saith, why the LVPERCIANS do at this day runne about naked. And if it be true, they make this sacrifice for a purging, a man might say they might offer vp a dog for that purpose, like as the GRECIANS in their sacrifices of purgation, do vse to cary out all their dogs. And in many places they doe obserue this ceremony, to driue out the dogs, which they call Periscylaciſmes. Otherwise, if it be of a thankefulnesse to the Wolfe that gaue Romulus suck, & saued him from perishing, that the ROMAINES do solemnize this feast: it is not impertinent they should sacrifice a dog, because he is an enemy to the Wolues. Vnlesse a man wold say it was to punish this beast, which troubleth and letteth the LVPERCIANS when they runne. Some say also it was Romulus, who first instituted it a religion to keepe holy fire, & that first ordained holy virgins, which are called Vestales: other do ascribe it to Numa Pompilius. Notwithstanding it is most certaine otherwise, that Romulus was a very deuout man, & greatly skilfull in telling of things to come by the flying of birds: for which cause he did ordinarily cary the augurs crooked staffe, called in latin Lituus. It is a rod crooked at the end, wherewith the augurs or soothsaiers whē they sit down to behold the flying of birds, do point out & mark the quarters of the heauen. They carefully kept it within the pallace: howbeit it was lost in the time of wars with the GAVLES, when the city of ROME was taken. Afterwards when these barbarous people were chased and driuen out, it was found againe (as it is said) all whole, within a great hill or heape of ashes, hauing no manner of hurt, where all things else about it had beene consumed & marred with the fire. He is saide to haue made certaine lawes, among which there is one that seemeth somewhat hard, which is: that the man is suffered to put away his wife, and in some case to giue her nothing: and like liberty is not giuen to the wife to put away her husband. As if she may be proued to haue consented to the poysning of her children, or to haue counterfaited her husbands keyes or to haue committed adultery. But if he put her away for any other cause, thē the one halfe of the goods is adiudged to the wife, and the other moity to the goddesse Ceres: and he that putteth away his wife after this sort, is commāded further to sacrifice to the goddes of the earth. This also was notable in Romulus, who hauing ordained no paine nor punishmēt for parricides (that is, for those that kill their parents) called yet all murther parricide, to shew how detestable that murther was, and as for parricides, he thought it vnpossible. And it semed a great while, he had reason to thinke so, that such wickednes would neuer happen in the world. For in sixe hundred yeares together it was not knowen that any man in ROME committed such an offence: and the first parricide with them was Lucius Ostius, after the warres of Hannibal. But enough touching this matter. Furthermore in the first yeare of the raigne of Tatius, some of his kinsemen and friends met by chaunce on the way certaine ambassadours, comming from the city of LAVRENTVM vnto ROME, whom they set vppon, and ment to haue robbed them. The ambassadours resisting them, and not willing to deliuer their money, they made no more a doe, but slew them. This haynous deede being thus commited, Romulus was of opinion they should be executed openly in the high way for example. But Tatius deferred it ſtill from day to day, and did alwayes excuſe the matter vnto him, which was the only cauſe, they fell out one with the other. For in all things els, they caried them ſelues as honeſtly as might be the one to the other, ruling and gouerning together, with a common conſent and good accord. But the parents and kinſefolks of thoſe who were murdered, when they ſaw they could haue no iuſtice becauſe of Tatius: watched him one day as he ſacrificed with Romulus, in the city of Lauinium, and ſtabbed him in, without offering Romulus any violence, but rather prayſed him for a good and righteous prince. Romulus cauſed the body of Tatius to be ſtraight taken vp, and buried him very honorably in mount Auentine, about the place now called Armiluſtrium. Futther he neuer ſhewed any countenaunce to reuenge his death. There are ſome Hiſtoriographers that write, that thoſe of the city of Laurentum being afeard at this murder, did deliuer forthwith to Romulus the murderers of the ambaſſadours. He notwithſtanding did let them goe againe, ſaying: one murder was requited by another. This gaue ſome occaſion of ſpeach to thinke, he was glad he was ridde of his companion: yet the Sabines neither ſtirred nor rebelled for all this, but ſome of them were affraid of him for the great loue they bare him, other for his power he was of, & other for the honour they gaue him as a god, continuing ſtill in dutie & obedience towards him. Diuers ſtrangers alſo had Romulus valiancie in great honour: as amongſt other, thoſe who then were called the auncient Latines, which ſent ambaſſadours to him to make league and amitie with him. He deuiſed to take the citie of Fidena which was nere neighbour to Rome. Some ſay he tooke it vpon a ſodaine, hauing ſent before certain horſmen to breake downe the hookes and hinges with force, which the gates hang by: & himſelfe came after with the reſt of his armie, & ſtale vpon them, before the citie miſtruſted any thing. Other write that the Fidenates firſt inuaded his countrie, & foraged vnto the very ſuburbes of Rome, where they did great harme: and how Romulus layed an ambuſh in their way as they returned home, and ſlew a great number of them. When he tooke their citie, he did not raſe it, but made a colony of it, (as a place to ſend the ouerincreaſe of Rome vnto) whither he ſent afterwards two thouſand fiue hundred Romaines to inhabite there: & it was on the thirteenth day of April, which the Romains call the Ides of the ſame moneth. Not long after there roſe ſuch a great plague in Rome, that men died ſodainly, & were not ſick: the earth brought forth no fruite: bruite beaſts deliuered no increaſe of their kind: there rained alſo drops of bloud in Rome, as they ſay. In ſo much as beſides the euils men felt in this extremitie, they fell in a marueilous feare of the wrath of the gods. Afterwards perceiuing the like happened to the inhabitants of Lavrentvm, then euery man iudged it was the very vengeance and heauie hand of the goddes, who plagued and puniſhed theſe two cities for the murder commited vpon Tatius, and the ambaſſadours that were killed. Whereupon the murderers of both ſides were appehended and executed: and theſe plagues by and by ceaſed both in the one and the other city. Romulus beſides, did purifie the cities with certaine ſacrifices that he deuiſed, which they keepe ſtill at this day, at the gate called Ferentina. But before the plague ceaſed, the Camerines came to aſſault the Romaines, and had ouercome all the countrey, ſuppoſing they ſhould not be able to withſtand them, becauſe they had bene ſo ſore troubled with the plague. Yet notwithſtanding, Romulus ſet vpon them with his army, & wan the field of them, in which conflict there were ſlaine about ſixe thouſand men. After the battell done, he tooke their city, & conueied to Rome the one halfe of the inhabitants that remained. After this, he ſent twiſe as many Romaines as there were naturall Camerians left at Camerine, to dwell there among them. This was done the 1. day of Auguſt: ſo great was the multitude of the inhabitants of Rome that had encreaſed in 16. years frō the firſt foūdation of the city. Among other ſpoils he got there, he carried away a charret of braſſe with four horſes, which he cauſed to be ſet vp in the temple of Vulcan, and his owne ſtatue vpon it, and victory crowning him with a garland triūphāt. His power being growē thus great, his weake neighbours did ſubmit themſelues vnto him, being contented to liue in peace by him. His ſtronger neighbours were affraid of him, and enuied much his greatnes, and did take it no good policy to ſuffer him thus to riſe in the face of the world, and thought it meete ſpeedily to daunt his glory, and clip his wings. The firſt of the Thvscanes that bent their power againſt him, were the Veians, who had a great countrey, & dwelled in a ſtrong & mighty city. To picke a quarrell

a quarrell to him, they sent to haue redeliuered to them the citie of FIDENA, which they saide belonged vnto thē. This was thought not only vnreasonable, but a thing worthy laughing at, considering that al the while the FIDENATES were in war, & danger, the THVSCANS neuer came to their aide, but had suffered them to be slaine, and then came to demaunde their lands and tenements, when other had possession of them. Therefore Romulus hauing giuen them an answere full of mockerie, and derision, they diuided their power into two armies, and sent the one against them of FIDENA, & with the other they marched towards ROME. That which went against the citie of FIDENA, preuayled, and killed there two thousand ROMAINES: the other was ouerthrowen and discomfited by Romulus, in which there died eight thousande VEIANS. Afterwards, they met againe somewhat neere the citie of the FIDENATES, where they fought a battell: and all did confesse, the chiefest exployt was done by Romulus owne hands that day, who shewed all the skill and valiantnes that was to be looked for in a worthy captaine. It seemed that day, he farre exceeded the common sort of men, in strength of bodie & feats of armes. Neuertheles that which some say, is hardly to be credited: and to be plaine, is out of all compasse of beliefe and possibilitie. For they write, there were fourteene thousand men slaine at that battell, & that more then halfe of them were slaine by Romulus owne hands: & the rather, for that euery man iudgeth it a vaine bragge and ostentation which the MESSENIANS report of Aristomenes, who offered in sacrifice to the goddes three hundred beastes of victorie, as for so many LACEDÆMONIANS himselfe had slaine in the battell. Their armie being thus broken, Romulus suffered them to flie who by swiftnesse could saue themselues, and marched with all his power in good array towards their citie. The citizens then considering their late great losse and ouerthrowe, would not hazard the danger of withstanding him, but went out all together, & made their humble petition and sute for peace. All was granted them for a hundred yeres, saue they should forgo their territorie called Septemagium, that was the seuenth part of their countries & yeeld to the ROMAINES all their salt houses by the riuers side, and deliuer fiftie of their chiefest citizens for their pledges. Romulus made his entrie and triumphe into ROME for them, the day of the Ides of October, which is the fifteenth day of the same moneth, leading in his triumphe many prisoners taken in those wars: and among other, the generall of the VEIANS, a very auncient man who fondly behaued himselfe in his charge, and shewed by his doings, that his experience was farre short for his yeares in the warres. And from thence it commeth, when they offer to the goddes to giue thankes for this victorie, that euen at this day, they bring to the capitoll through the market place, an olde man apparelled in a purple robe, & with a Iuell called Bulla about his neck, which the gentlemens young children weare about their neckes: & a herauld goeth hard by him, crying, who buieth who, the SARDIANIANS, bicause they hold opinio the THVSCANES are come of the SARDIANIANS, and the very citie of VEIES standeth in the countrie of THVSCANE. This was the last warre that Romulus had offered him: after which he could not beware of that which is wont to happen almost to all those, who by sodaine prosperity, and fortunes speciall fauour, are raised to high and great estate. For trusting to prosperity and good successe of his actes, he beganne to grow more straunge and stately, and to carry a sowrer countenaunce then he was wont to doe before: leaning to be after his old manner, a curteous and gracious prince, and gaue him selfe in fashions to be somwhat like a tyrant, both for his apparell, and stately port and maiesty that he caried. For he ware euer a coate of purple in graine, and vppon that, a long robe of purple colour: and gaue audience, sitting in a wide chaire of estate, hauing euer about him young men called Celeres, as we would say, flights for their swiftnes & speed in executing of his commandements. Other there were that went before him, who caried as it were tipstaues in their hands, to make the people giue roome, and had leather thongs about their middle to bind fast streight, all the prince should commaund. Now in old time the LATINES said, Ligare was to bind: but at this present they say Alligare, from whence it commeth that the vshers and sergeants are called Lictores. Howbeit me thinkes it were more likely to say, they had put to a c, & that before they were called Litores, without a c. For they be the very same which the GRECIANS call Liturgos, and be in English, ministers or officers: and at this day, Leitos, or Leos, in the GREEKE tong signifieth the people. Romulus now after his grandfather Numitor was dead at the citie of ALBA, and that the Realme by inheritance fell to him: to winne the fauour of the people there, turned the Kingdome to a Common weale, and euery yeare did chuſe a new magiſtrate to miniſter iuſtice to the SABYNES. This preſident taught the noble men of ROME to ſeeke and deſire to haue a free eſtate, where no ſubiect ſhould be at the commaundement of a King alone, and where euery man ſhould command & obey as ſhould be his courſe. Thoſe which were called Patricians in ROME, did medle with nothing, but had only an honorable name and robe, and were called to counſaile rather for a faſhion, then to haue their aduiſe or counſaile. For when they were aſſembled together, they did onely heare the Kings pleaſure and commaundement, but they might not ſpeake one word, and ſo departed: hauing no other preheminence ouer the common wealth, ſauing they were the firſt that did know what was done. All other things therby did grieue them leſſe. But when of his owne meere authority, & as it were of himſelfe, he would as pleaſed him, beſtow the conquered lands of his enemies to his ſouldiers, and reſtore againe to the VEIANS their hoſtages as he did: therein plainely appeared, how great iniurie he did to the Senate. Whereupon the Senators were ſuſpected afterwards that they killed him, when within few dayes after it was ſayde, he vaniſhed away ſo ſtraungely, that no man euer knew what became of him. This was on the ſeuenth day of the moneth now called Iuly, which then was named Quintilis, leauing no maner of certaintie els of his death that is knowen, ſaue onely of the day and the time when he vaniſhed, as we haue ſaid before. For on that day, the ROMAINES doe at this preſent many things, in remembrance of the misfortune which happened to them then. It is no maruell, the certaintie of his death was not knowne: ſeeing Scipio Africanus was found after ſupper dead in his houſe, and no man could tell, nor yet did know how he dyed. For ſome ſay that he fainted, and dyed ſodainly being of weake complexion. Other ſay he poiſoned himſelfe: other thinke his enemies did get ſecretly in the night into his houſe, and ſmoothered him in his bed. Yet they found his body laide on the ground, that euery body might at leiſure conſider, if they could finde or coniecture the manner of his death. Howbeit Romulus vaniſhed away ſodainely, there was neither ſeene peece of his garments, nor yet was there found any part of his body. Therefore ſome haue thought that the whole Senatours fell vpon him together in the temple of Vulcan, and how after they had cut him in peeces, euery one caried away a peece of him, folded cloſe in the skirt of his robe. Other thinke alſo, this vaniſhing away was not in the temple of Vulcan, nor in the preſence of the Senatours only: but they ſay that Romulus was at that time without the citie, neere the place called the goates marſhe, where he made an oration to the people, and that ſodainely the weather changed, and ouercaſt ſo terribly, as it is not to be tolde nor credited. For firſt, the ſunne was darkened as if it had bene very night: this darkeneſſe was not in a calme or ſtill, but there fell horrible thunders, boiſterous windes, and flaſhing lightnings on euery ſide, which made the people runne away, and ſcatter heere and there, but the Senatours kept ſtill cloſe together. Afterwardes when the lightning was paſt and gone, the day cleared vp, & the element waxed faire as before. Then the people gathered together againe, & ſought for the King: asking what was become of him. But the noble men would not ſuffer thē to enquire any further after him, but counſelled them to honour and reuerence him as one taken vp into heauen: and that thenceforth in ſteade of a good King, he would be vnto them a mercifull & gracious god. The meaner ſort of people (for the moſt part of them) tooke it well, and were very glad to heare thereof & went their way worſhipping Romulus in their hearts, with good hope they ſhould proſper by him. Howbeit ſome ſeeking out the troth more egerly did cūber ſore, & troubled the PATRICIANS: accuſing them, that they abuſed the common people with vaine & fond perſwaſions, whileſt themſelues in the meane time had murdered the king with their own hāds. While things were thus in hurly burly, ſome ſay there was one Iulius Proculus, the nobleſt of al the PATRICIANS, being eſteemed for a maruelous honeſt mā, & knowne to haue bene very familiar with Romulus, & came with him from the city of ALBA: that ſtepped forth before all the people, and affirmed (by the greateſt and holieſt othes a man might ſweare) that he had met Romulus on the way, farre greater and fayrer, then he had ſeene him euer before, and armed all in white armour, ſhining bright like fire: whereat being affraid in that ſort to ſee him, he asked him yet: O King, why haſt thou thus left and forſaken vs, that are so falsely accused and charged to our vtter discredite and shame, by thy vanishing. To whom Romulus gaue this aunswere. Proculus, it hath pleased the goddes from whom I came, that I should remaine amongest men so long as I did: and now hauing built a citie, which in glorie and greatnesse of empire shall be the chiefest of the worlde, that I shoulde returne againe to dwell with them, as before, in heauen. Therfore be of good comfort, and tell the ROMAINES, that they exercising prowesse and temperancie, shalbe the mightiest and greatest people of the worlde. As for me, tell them I will henceforth be their god, protector, and patron, and they shall call me Quirinus. These words seemed credible to the ROMAINES, aswell for the honestie of the man that spake them, as for the solemne othes he made before the all. Yet I wote not how, some celestiall motion, or diuine inspiration helped it much: for no man said a word against it. And so all suspition and accusation layde aside, euery man began to call vpon Quirinus, to pray vnto him, and to worshippe him. Truely this tale is much like the tales that the GRECIANS tell of Aristeas the proconnesian, & of Cleomedes the Astypalæian. For they say, that Aristeas died in a fullers worke house, & his friends comming to carie away his bodie, it fell out they could not tell what became of it: & at that instant there were some which came out of the fields, and affirmed they met and spake with him, and how he kept his way towards the citie of CROTONA. It is saide also that Cleomedes was more then a man naturally strong and great, and therewithall madde, and furious hastie. For after many desperate partes he had played, he came at the last on a day into a schoole house full of litle children, the roofe whereof was borne with one piller, which he did hit with so terrible a blowe of his fiste, that he brake it in the middest, so as the whole roofe fell and dashed the poore children in peeces. The people ranne straight after him to take him. But he threw himselfe forthwith into a chest, and pulled the lid vpon him. He held it so fast downe, that many striuing together all they could to open it, they were not able once to stirre it. Whereupon they brake the chest all in peeces, but they found the man neither quicke nor dead. Whereat they were maruellously amazed, and sent to Apollo Pythias, where the prophetesse aunswered them in this verse:

Cleomedes the last of the demy goddes.

The reporte goeth also that Alemenes corse did vanish away, as they caried it to buriall, and how in stead thereof they found a stone laide in the beere. To conclude, men tell many other such wonders, that are farre from any apparance of trothe: onely because they would make men to be as goddes, and equall with them in power. It is true, that as to reproue and denie diuine power, it were a lewde and wicked part: euen so to compare earthe and heauen together, it were a meere follie. Therefore we must let such fables goe, being most certaine that as Pindarus saith it is true.

Each liuing corps, must yeeld at last to death, and euery life must leese his vital breath:
The soule of man, that onely liues on hie, and is an image of eternity.

For from heauen it came, and thither againe it doth returne, not with the body, but then soonest, when the soule is furthest off and separated from the body, and that shee is kept holy, and is no more defiled with the flesh. It is that the philosopher Heraclitus ment, when he said. The dry light, is the best soule which flieth out of the body, as lightning doth out of the clowde: but that which is ioyned with the body being full of corporall passions, is a grosse vapour, darke and massie, & cannot flame, rise or shoote out like lightning. We must not beleeue therefore, that the bodies of noble and vertuous men, do goe vp together with their soules into heauen, against the order of nature. But this we are certainely to beleeue, that by the vertues of their soules (according to diuine nature and iustice) they doe of men become saincts, and of saincts halfe goddes, and of halfe goddes, entier and perfect goddes: after that they are perfectly (as it were by sacrifices of purgation) made cleane and pure, being deliuered from all paine & mortality, and not by any ciuill ordinance, but in troth & reason, they receiue a most happy and glorious end. Now touching Romulus surname, which afterwards was called Quirinus: some say that it signifieth as much as warlike: other thinke he was so called because the ROMAINES them selues were called Quirites. call the poynt of a ſpeare, on the dart it ſelfe, Quiris: by reaſon whereof the image of Iuno ſurnamed Quiritides, was ſet vp with an iron ſpeare, and the ſpeare which was conſecrated in the Kings pallace, was called Mars. Furthermore it is an vſe amongſt men, to honour them with a ſpeare or dart, which haue ſhewed themſelues valiant in the warres: and that for this cauſe Romulus was ſurnamed Quirinus, as who would ſay, god of the ſpeares and wars. There was ſince built a temple vnto him, in the hill called Quirinus, and ſo named of him. The day whereon he vaniſhed, is called the flying of the people, or otherwiſe the Nones of the goates. For on that day, they goe out of the citie to doe ſacrifice in the place called the Fenne, or the goates marſhe: and the ROMAINES call a goate, Capra. As they goe thus together, they call with lowd ſhowtes and cryes vpon diuers Romaines names, as Marcus, Cneus, and Gaius, in token of the flying that was then: and that they called one another backe againe, as they ranne away in great feare and diſorder. Howbeit other ſay, that it is not done to ſhewe the running away, but to ſhew their ſpeede and diligence, and referre it to the ſtorie. Now after the GAVLES that had take ROME were expulſed by Camillus, the citie was ſo weakned, that they could ſcant recouer their force and ſtrength againe: wherfore many of the LATINES ioyning together, went with a great mightie armie, vnder the conduct of Liuius Poſthumius, to warre againſt the ROMAINES. This Poſthumius brought his campe as neere the citie of ROME as he could, and ſent to the ROMAINES by a trumpet to let them vnderſtand, how the LATINES were deſirous by new mariages, to reſtore their old ancient amitie and kindred that was neere hand decaied betweene them: and therfore if the ROMAINES would ſend them a conuenient number of their daughters and young widowes to marie with them, they ſhould haue peace, as they had before time with the SABYNES, vpon the like occaſion. The ROMAINES hereat were ſore troubled, thinking that to deliuer their women in ſuch ſorte was no better, then to yeeld and ſubmit them ſelues to their enemies. But as they were thus perplexed, a wayting maide called Philotis (or as other call her, Tutola) gaue them counſell to doe neither the one nor the other, but to vſe a pollicie with them, by meanes whereof they ſhould ſcape the daunger of the warres, and ſhould alſo not be tyed nor bound by any pledges. The deuiſe was, they ſhould ſend to the LATINES her ſelfe, and a certaine number of their faireſt bonde maydes, trimmed vp like gentlewomen and the beſt citizens daughters, and that in the night ſhe would liſte them vp a burning torche in the ayre, at which ſigne they ſhould come armed, and ſet vpon their enemies as they lay a ſleepe. This was brought to paſſe: and the LATINES thought verely they had bene the ROMAINES daughters. Philotis failed not in the night to lift vp her ſigne, and to ſhewe them a burning torche in the toppe of a wilde figge tree: and did hang certaine couerlets and clothes behinde it, that the enemies might not ſee the light, and the ROMAINES cõtrariwiſe might diſcerne it the better. Thereupon ſo ſoone as the ROMAINES ſaw it, they ranne with all ſpeed, calling one another by their names, and iſſued out of the gates of the citty with great haſt: and ſo tooke their enemies vpon a ſodaine, and ſlew them. In memory of which victory, they doe yet ſolemnize the feaſt called the Nones of the goates, becauſe of the wilde figge tree called in Latine Caprificus. And they do feaſt the women without the city, vnder ſhadowes made of the boughs of figge trees. The wayting maides, they runne vp and downe, and play here and there together. Afterwards they ſeeme to fight, and throw ſtones one at another, as then they did when they holpe the ROMAINES in their fight. But few writers doe auow this tale, becauſe it is on the day time that they call ſo ech other by their names, and that they goe to the place which they call the goates marſhe, as vnto a ſacrifice. It ſeemeth this agreeth better with the firſt hiſtory whē they called one another by their names in the night, going againſt the LATINES: vnles peraduenture theſe two thinges after many yeares happened vpon one day. Furthermore, they ſay Romulus was taken out of the world, when he was foure and fifty yeares of age, and had raigned eight and thirty years by accoumpt.

Theſeus with Romulus

THus haue we declared all things of Theſeus and Romulus worthie memorie. But to compare the one with the other, it appeareth firſt that Theſeus of his owne voluntarie will, without compulſion of any (whē he might with ſafetie haue raigned in the citie of TROEZEN, and ſucceeded his grandfather in no ſmall kingdome) did deſire of him ſelfe, and rather ſought meanes to aſpire to great things: and teat Romulus on the other ſide, to deliuer him ſelfe from bondage and ſeruitude that lay ſore vpon him, and to eſcape the threatned puniſhment which ſtill did hang ouer his head, was certainely compelled (as Plato ſayth) to ſhew him ſelfe hardie for feare: who ſeeing how extremely he was like to be handled, was of verie force conſtrained to ſeeke aduenture, and hazard the enterpriſe of attaining high & great things. Moreouer the chiefeſt act that euer he did was, when he ſlue one onely tyrant of the citie of ALBA called Amulius: where Theſeus in his iourney onely, as he trauelled, gaue his minde to greater enterpriſes, and ſlue Sciron, Scinnis, Procruſtes, and Corynetes. And by ridding them out of the world, he deliuered GREECE of all thoſe cruell tyrants, before any of thoſe knew him whō he had deliuered from them. Furthermore, he might haue gone to ATHENS by ſea, & neuer needed to haue trauelled, or put him ſelfe in danger with theſe robbers, conſidering he neuer receiued hurt by anie of them: whereas Romulus could not be in ſafetie whileſt Amulius liued. Hereupon it may be alledged, that Theſeus vnprouoked by any priuate wrong or hurt receiued, did ſet vpon theſe deteſtable theeues and robbers: Remus and Romulus contrariwiſe, ſo long as the tyrant did them no harme, did ſuffer him to oppreſſe and wrong all other. And if they alledge theſe were noble deeds, and worthie memorie: that Romulus was hurt fighting againſt the SABINES, and that he ſlue king Acron with his owne hands, and that he had ouercome and ſubdued many of his enemies. Then for Theſeus on the other ſide may be obiected, the battell of the CENTAVRI, the warres of the AMAZONES, the tribute due to the king of CRETA: and how he ventured to go him ſelfe thither with the other yong boyes and wenches of ATHENS, as willingly offering him ſelfe to be deuoured by a cruell beaſt, or elſe to be ſlaine and ſacrificed vpon the tombe of Androgeus, or to become bondſlaue and tyed in captiuitie to the vile ſeruice of cruell men and enemies, if by his courage and manhood he could not deliuer him ſelf. This was ſuch an act of magnanimitie, iuſtice and glorie, & briefly of ſo great vertue, that it is vnpoſſible truly to be ſet out. Surely me thinkes the philoſophers did not ill define loue, when they ſayd ſhe was a ſeruitour of the gods, to ſaue young folks, whom they thought meete to be preſerued. For, the loue of Ariadne was in mine opinion the worke of ſome god, and a meane purpoſely prepared for Theſeus ſafetie. Therefore the woman is not to be reproched nor blamed for the loue she bare Theseus, but rather it is much to be wondred at, that euery man and woman in like wise did not loue him. And if of her selfe she fell in loue with him, I say (and not without cause) she afterwards deserued to be beloued of a god, as one that of her owne nature loued valiantnes and honour, and entertained men of singular value. But both Theseus & Romulus being naturally giuen to rule and raigne, neither the one nor the other kept the true forme of a King, but both of them did degenerate alike: the one chaunging himselfe into a popular man, the other to a very tyrant. So that by sundry humours, they both fell into one mischiefe and errour. For a prince aboue all things must keepe his estate: which is no lesse preserued by doing nothng vncomely, as by doing al things honorably. But he that is more seuere or remisse thē he should be, remaineth now no more a king or a prince, but becommeth a people-pleaser, or a cruell tyrant: & so causeth his subiects to despise or hate him. Yet me thinkes the one is an errour of too much pittie and basenes: and the other of too much pride and cruelue. But if we may not charge fortune with all mischaunces happening vnto men, but that we ought to consider in them the diuersities of manners and passions, seeing anger is vnreasonable, and wrath rash and passionate: then can we not cleare the one, nor excuse the other of extreme rage and passion, in the fact committed by the one against his brother, and by the other against his naturall sonne. Howbeit the occasion and beginning of anger doth much excuse Theseus, who moued with the greatest cause that might be, was put into such choller and passion. But if Romulus variaunce with his brother had proceeded of any matter of counsell, or cause of the common weales: there is none so simple to thinke, that his wisdome would so sodainely haue set vpon him. Where as Theseus in contrarie manner killed his sonne, prouoked by those passions that few men can auoide: to wit, loue, iealousie, and false reporte of his wife. Moreouer Romulus anger went to the effect, whereof the issue fell out very lamentable: Theseus anger stretched no further, then to roughe words, and olde folkes curses in their heate. For it seemeth, cursed fortune, and nought els, was the cause of his sonnes onely mishap, as foresposken and wished for somewhat by his father. These be the speciall things may be alledged for Theseus. But for Romulus this was a notable thing in him. First his beginning being very lowe and meane, and his brother and he taken for bondemen, and the children of hoggeheards, before they were themselues all free, they set at libertie in manner all the LATINES, winning at one instant many titles of glorie and honour: as destroyers of their enemies, defenders of their parents, Kings of nations, founders of newe cities, and no ouerthrowers of the olde, where as Theseus of many habitations and houses made onely one, and did ouerthrowe and plucke downe diuers states, bearing the names of auncient Kings, princes, and halfe goddes of ATTICA. All these also did Romulus afterwards, and compelled his enemies whom he had ouercome, to destroy their owne houses, and to come and dwell with their conquerours. And in the beginning, he neuer chaunged nor increased any citie that was built before, but build him selfe a new city out of the ground, getting all together, land, countrey, kingdome, kindred and mariages, without losing or killing any man: and to the contrary, rather he did good to many poore vacabonds, who had neither countrey, lands, nor houses, and desired nothing els but to make a people amongst them, and to become citizens of some city. Also Romulus bent not him selfe to follow theeues and robbers, but subdued by force of armes many mighty and puissant people: he tooke cities, and triumphed ouer Kings and Princes which he had vanquished in battell. And touching the murther of Remus, it is not certainely knowen of whose hands he died. The most part of authors do charge other with the death of him. But it is certaine that Romulus deliuered his mother from apparant death, and restored his grandfather to the royall throne of AEneas, who before was depossed and brought from a King to seruile obedience, without any regard of honour or dignity: to whom he did many moe great pleasures and seruices. Besides he neuer offended him willingly, no not so much as ignorantly. Contrarily I thinke of Theseus, who sayling by negligence to put out his white saile at his returne, cannot be cleared of parricide, how eloquent an oration soeuer could be made for his excuse: yea though it were before the most fauorable iudges that could be. Wherefore an ATHENIAN very well perceyuing that it was no hard thing to excuse and defend so fowle a fault, doth faine that the good old man AEgeus hauing hauing newes brought him that his sonnes shippe was at hand, did ronne in so great haste to his castell, to see his sonne arriue a far off, that as hee ranne, his foote hit against some thing, and ouerthrewe him: as though he had none of his people about him, or that neuer a man seeing him ronne so hastely to the sea side, did make haste to attende and wayte vpon him. Furthermore, Theseus faultes touching women and rauishmentes, of the twaine, had the lesse shadowe and colour of honestie. Because Theseus did attempt it very often: for he stole away Ariadne, Antiope, and Anaxo the Troezenian. Againe being stepped in yeares, and at later age, and past mariage: he stole awaye Helen in hir minoritie, being nothing neere to consent to marrye. Then his taking of the daughters of the TROEZENIANS, of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and the AMAZONES (neither contracted to him, nor comparable to the birthe and linage of his owne countrie which were at ATHENS, and descended of the noble race and progenie of Erichtheus, and of Cecrops) did giue men occasion to suspect that his womannishenes was rather to satisfie lust, then of any great loue. Romulus now in a contrarie manner, when his people had taken eight hundred, or thereaboutes, of the Sabine women to rauish them: kept but onely one for himselfe that was called Hersilia, as they say, and deliuered the rest to his best and most honest cittizens. Afterwardes by the honour, loue, and good entertainment that he caused them to haue and receiue of their husbands, he changed this violent force of rauishment, into a most perfect bond and league of amitie: which did so knit & ioyne in one these two nations, that it was the beginning of the great mutuall loue which grew afterwards betwixt those two peoples, and consequently of the ioyning of their powers together. Furthermore, time hath giuen a good testimonie of the loue, reuerence, constancie, kindnesse, and all matrimoniall offices that he established by that meanes, betwixt man and wife. For in two hundred and thirtie yeares afterwards, there was neuer man that durst forsake or put away his wife, nor the wife her husband. And as among the GREGIANS, the best learned men, and most curious obseruers of antiquities do know his name, that was the first murderer of his father or mother: euen so all the ROMAINES knew what he was, which first durst put away his wife. It was one called Spurius Caruilius, because his wife was barren and had no children. The effects also do agree with the testimonie of the time. For the realme was common vnto the Kings of both nations, and through the alliance of these mariages that began first of rauishments, both nations liued peaceably, and in equalitie, vnder one ciuill pollicie, and well gouerned common weale. The ATHENIANS contrariwise, by Theseus mariages, did get neither loue nor kinred of any one person, but rather they procured wars, enmities, & the slaughter of their citizens, with the losse in the end of the citie of APHIDNES: and yet verie hardly, and by the mercie of their enemies (whom they honoured as gods) they escaped for him, the danger which the TROIANS suffered afterwards, for the selfe act done by Alexander Paris. So it fell out at the last, that his mother was not onely in danger, but euen feelingly suffered like miserie and captiuitie, which Hecuba did afterwards, when she was forsaken of her sonne: vnlesse peraduenture those things that they write of the imprisonment and captiuitie of Æthra, be found false, and but fables, as for the fame and memorie of Theseus were behouefull, that both it, and many other things also, were of no more troth nor likelihood. That which they write of Romulus diuiuements, maketh great difference betweene him and Theseus. For Romulus in his birth was preserued by the maruellous fauour of the gods: Theseus to the contrarie, was begotten against the gods will, as appeared plainely by the answer of the oracle to Ægeus, that he should not meddle with any woman in strange and foraine countrey.

THE LIFE OF Lycurgus.

A Man cannot ſpeake any thing at all of Lycurgus, who made the lawes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but he ſhal find great contrariety of him amongſt the hiſtoriographers. For, of his parentage and trauell out of his countrey, of his death and making of lawes, of his forme of gouernement, and order of executing the ſame, they haue written diuerſly. And yet aboue all things, concerning him, they agree worſt about the time he liued in. For ſome of them (and Ariſtotle is of that number) wil needes haue him to haue bene in the time of Iphytus, and that he did helpe him to ſtabliſh the ordinance that all warres ſhould ceaſe during the feaſt of the games olympicall: for a teſtimonie whereof, they alledge the copper coyte which was vſed to be throwen in thoſe games, and had found grauen vpon it, the name of Lycurgus. Other compting the dayes and time of the ſucceſſion of the kings of LACEDÆMON (as Eratoſtenes, and Apollodorus) ſay he was manie yeares before the firſt Olympiades. Timæus alſo thinketh there were two of this name, and in diuers times: howbeit the one hauing more eſtimation then the other, men gaue this Lycurgus the glorie of both their doings. Some ſay the eldeſt of the twaine, was not long after Homer: and ſome write they ſawe him. Xenophon ſheweth vs plainely he was of great antiquitie: ſaying he was in the time of the Heraclides, who were neareſt of bloud by deſcent to Hercules. For it is likely Xenophon meant not thoſe Heraclides, which deſcended from Hercules ſelfe: for the laſt kings of SPARTA were of Hercules progenie, aſwell as the firſt. Therefore he meaneth thoſe Heraclides, which doubtleſſe were the firſt and neareſt before Hercules time. Neuertheles though the hiſtoriographers haue written diuerſly of him, yet we will not leaue to collect that which we finde written of him in auncient hiſtories, and is leaſt to be denied, and by beſt teſtimonies moſt to be proued. And firſt of all, the poet Simonides ſaith, his father was called Prytanis and not Eunomus: and the moſt part do write the pedegree otherwiſe, aſwell of Lycurgus ſelfe, as of Eunomus. For they ſay, that Patrocles the ſonne of Ariſtodemus begate Sous, and Sous begate Eurytion, and Eurytion begat Prytanis, and Prytanis begat Eunomus, and Eunomus begat Polydectes of his firſt wife, and Lycurgus of the ſecond wife, called Dianaſſa: yet Euthychidas another writer, maketh Lycurgus the ſixt of deſcent in the right line from Polydectes, and the eleuenth after Hercules. But of all his anceſters, the nobleſt was Sous, in whoſe time the citie of SPARTA ſubdued the ILOTES,

TES, made them slaues, and did enlarge and increase their dominion, with the landes and possessions they had got by conquest of the Arcadians. And it is sayd that Sous himselfe being on a time straightly besieged by the CLITORIANS, in a hard drye grounde, where no water could be founde: offered them thereupon to restore all their landes againe that he had gotten from them, if he and all his companie did drinke of a fountaine that was there not far off. The CLITORIANS did graunt vnto it, and peace also was sworne betweene them. Then he called all his souldiers before him, and tolde them if there were any one amongest them that would refraine from drinking, he would resigne his kingdome to him: howbeit there was not one in all his companie that could (or would) forbeare to drinke, they were so sore a thirst. So they al dranke hartely except himself, who being the last that came downe, did no more but a litle moyste his mouth without, and so refreshed himself, the enemies selues standing by, and dranke not a droppe. By reason whereof, he refused afterwardes to restore their landes he had promised, alledging they had not all dronke. But that notwithstanding, he was greately esteemed for his actes, and yet his house was not named after his owne name, but after his sonnes name Eurytion, they of his house were called Eurytionides. The reason was, because his sonne Eurytion to please the people, did first let fall and giue ouer, the sole and absolute power of a King. Whereupon there followed afterwardes marnellous disorder and dissolution, which continued a greate time in the citie of SPARTA. For the people finding themselues at libertie, became verye bolde and disobedient: and some of the Kinges that succeeded, were hated euen to death, because they would perforce vse their auncient authoritie ouer the people. Other, either to winne the loue and goodwilles of the people, or because they sawe they were not strong enough to rule them, did giue them selues to dissemble. And this did so much increase the peoples lose and rebellious mindes, that Lycurgus owne father being King, was slayne among them. For one daye, as he was parting a fraye betweene two that were fighting, he had such a wounde with a kitchin knife, that he died: and left his Realme to his eldest sonne Polydectes, who died also soon after, and without heyre of his body as was supposed. Insomuch as euery man thought Lycurgus should be King: and so he tooke it vpon him, vntil it was vnderstood that his brothers wife was young with child. Which thing so soone as he perceiued, he published openly, that the Realme belonged to the childe that should be borne, if it were a sonne. After this he gouerned the Realme, but as the Kinges lieutenante and regent. The LACEDÆMONIANS call the regents of their Kinges that are left within age, Prodicos. Lycurgus brothers widdowe did send, and let him secretly vnderstand, that if he would promise to marrye her when he should be King, that she woulde come before hir time, and either miscarye or destroye that she went with. Lycurgus detestably abhorring this brutish and sauage vnnaturalnesse of the woman, did not reiect her offer made him, but seemed rather to be very glad, then to dislike of it. Neuertheless he sent her worde againe, shee should not neede to try masteryes, with drinkes and medicines to make her come before her time: for in so doing, she might bring her selfe in daunger, and be cast awaye for euer. Howbeit he aduised her to goe her full time, and to be brought a bed in good order, and then he woulde finde meanes enough to make away the childe that should be borne. And so with such perswasions he drewe on this woman to her full time of deliuerie. But so soone as he perceiued she was neere her time, he sent certaine to keepe her, and to be present at her laboure, commaunding them that if she were brought a bed of a daughter they should leaue her with the woman; and if it were a sonne they should forthwith bring it to him, in what place soeuer he was, and what businesse soeuer he had in hand. It chaunced that she came euen about supper time, and was deliuered of a sonne. As he was sitting at the table with the other magistrates of the citie, his seruantes entred the hall, and presented to him the litle babe, which he tenderly tooke in his armes. and sayed openly to them that were present: beholde my lordes of SPARTA, heere is a King borne vnto vs. And speaking these wordes, he layed him downe in the Kinges place, and named him Charilaus, as much to say as the ioye of the people. Thus hee sawe all the lookers on reioycinge much, and might heare them praise and extoll his sincerities, iustice, and vertue. By this meanes he raigned onely es King, but eight moneths. from thencefoorth hee was taken and esteemed so iust and sincere a man among the citizens, that there were moe that willingly obeied him for his vertue, then for that he was the kings regent, or that he had the gouernment of the whole Realme in his handes. Notwithstanding there were some that bare him displeasure and malice, who sought to hinder & disgrace his credit, and cheifly the freinds and kinred of the Kinges mother: whose power and honour were thought much impaired by Lycurgus aucthoritie, in so much, as a brother of hirs called Leonidas, entring boldly into great wordes with him on a day, did not sticke to say to his face. I know for a certaintie one of these dayes thou wilt be king: meaning thereby to bring him in suspition with the citizens. Which thing though Lycurgus neuer ment, yet of a subtile and craftie wit, Leonidas thought by giuing out such words, that if the young King happened to die in his minoritie naturally, it would be mistrusted that Lycurgus had secretly made him away. The Kinges mother also gaue out such like speaches, which in the end did so trouble him, with the feare he had, what euer might fall out thereof: that he determined to depart his countrie, and by his absence to auoyde the suspition that therein might grow vpon him any way. So he trauelled abroade in the worlde as a stranger, vntill his nephew had begotten a sonne who was to succeed him in his kingdome.

He hauing with this determinatiō taken his iorney, went first of all into CRETA, where he diligently obserued and considered the manner of their liuing, the order of the gouernment of their Cōmon weale, and euer kept company with the best, and euer was conferring with the most learned. There he founde very good lawes in his iudgment, which he noted of purpose to carie home to his countrie, to serue when time should come. He found there other lawes also, but of them he made no reckoning. Now there was one man that aboue the rest was reputed wise and skilfull in matters of state & gouernment, who was called Thales: with whom Lycurgus did so much by intreatie, and for familiar frendshippe that he perswaded him to go with him vnto SPARTA. This Thales was called the Poet Harper, whereupon he had that title and name: but in effect he sang all that the best and sufficientest gouernours of the worlde could deuise. For all his songes were goodly ditties, wherein hee did exhort and perswade the people to liue vnder obedience of the law, in peace & concord one with the other. His wordes were set out with such tunes, countenance & accents, that were so full of sweetnes, harmony, and pearcing: that inwardly it melted mens hartes, and drew the hearers of a loue to like the most honest things, and to leaue all hatred, enmitie, sedition, and diuision, which at that time raigned sore among them. So as it may be said, he it was that prepared the way for Lycurgus, whereby he afterwards reformed & brought the LACEDÆMONIANS vnto reason. At his departing out of CRETA, he went into ASIA, with intent (as it is sayd) to compare the māner of life and pollicie of those of CRETA (being then very straight and seuere) with the superfluities and vanities of IONIA: and thereupon to consider the difference betweene their two manners & gouernments, as the physitian doth, who to know the whole & healthfull the better, doth vse to compare them with the sicke & diseased. It is very likely it was there, where he first saw Homers works, in the hands of the heires & successours of Cleophylus & finding in the same, aswell many rules of pollicie, as the greate pleasure of poets fayning, he diligently coppied it out, and made a volume thereof to carie into GREECE. It is true there was much fame abroad of Homers poemes among the GRECIANS, howbeit there were few of them brought together, but were scattred here & there in diuers mes hands, in pamphlets & peeces vnsowed & without any order: but the first that brought the most to light among men, was Lycurgus. The ÆGYPTIANS say, that he was in their countrey also, and that hauing found there one notable ordinance among other, that their souldiers and men of warre were separated from the rest of the people, he brought the practise of it into SPARTA: where setting the marchants, artificers & labourers euerie one a part by themselues, he did establish a noble Common wealth. So the ÆGYPTIAN historiographers, and some others also of GREECE do write. He was also in AFRICKE, and in SPAINE, & as farre as INDIA, to conferre with the wise men there, that were called the philosophers of INDIA. I knowe no man that hath written it, sauing Aristocrates, that was Hipparchus sonne. The LACEDÆMONIANS wished for him often when he was gone, and sent diuers and many a time to call him home: who thought their Kings had but the honour and title of Kings, and not the vertue or maiestie of a prince, wherby they did excell the common people.

people. But as for Lycurgus, they thought of him thus,: that he was a man borne to rule, to cõmaund, and to giue order, as hauing in him a certaine naturall grace and power, to drawe men willingly to obeye him. Moreouer the Kings thẽselues were not vnwilling to haue him to returne home, becauſe they hoped that his preſence would ſomwhat bridle, & reſtraine the people from their inſolencie & diſobediẽce towards them. Wherupon Lycurgus returning home in this opinion and affection of men, it fell out that he was no ſooner arriued, but he began to deuiſe how to alter the whole gouernment of the common weale, & throughout to chaunge the whole courſe and order of the ſtate: thinking that to make only certaine particular lawes were to no purpoſe, but much like, as one ſhould giue ſome eaſie medicine, to purge an ouerthrowen bodye with all humors and diſeaſes. Therfore he thought firſt that all groſſe and ſuperfluous humors, were meete to be diſſolued and purged, and then afterwardes to giue them a new forme and order of gouernment. When he had thus determined with himſelf, before he would take in hãd to do any thing, he went to the citie of DELPHES: where after he had ſacrificed to Apollo, he cõſulted with him about his matters. From whom he returned with this glorious title by the oracle of Pythia: ô beloued of the gods, and rather god then man. Where when he craued grace of Apollo to eſtabliſh good lawes in his countrie, it was anſwered him: that Apollo graunted his petition, and that he ſhould ordaine the beſt and perfecteſt manner of a Common wealth, that euer had or ſhould be in the worlde. This anſwer did comfort him very much, and ſo he began to breake his purpoſe to certaine of the chief of the citie, and ſecretly to pray and exhort them to helpe him, going firſt to thoſe he knew to be his friends and after by litle & litle he wan others to him, who ioyned with him in his enterpriſe. So when he ſaw the time fit for the matter, he cauſed thirtie of the chiefeſt men of the cittie in a morning to come into the market place wel appoynted & furniſhed, to ſuppreſſe thoſe that would attempt to hinder their purpoſe. Hermippus the hiſtoriographer rehearſeth twentie of the chiefeſt: but he that aboue all others did moſt aſſiſt him in his doings, & was the greateſt ayde vnto the ſtabliſhing of his lawes, was called Arithmiadas. The King Charilaus hearing of this aſſẽbly, did feare there had bene ſome conſpiracie or inſurrection againſt his perſon, & for his ſafety he fled into the temple of Iuno, called Chalceæcos, as much to ſay, as Iunos braſen tẽple. Howbeit afterwards when he knew the troth, he waxed bolde & came out of the temple againe, & he himſelf fauored the enterpriſe, being a prince of a noble minde, howbeit very ſoft by nature, as witneſſeth Archelaus (that was thẽ the other king of LACEDÆMON) by telling how Charilaus anſwered one that praiſed him to his face, in ſaying he was a good man. And how ſhould I not (quoth he) be good, when I cannot be euil to the euil? In this change of the ſtate, many things were altered by Lycurgus, but his chiefeſt alteration was, his law of the erection of a Senate, which he made to haue a regal power & equal authoritie with the Kings in matters of weight and importance & was (as Plato ſayeth) to be the healthful counterpeaſe of the whole body of the Cõmon weale. The other ſtate before was euer wauering, ſometime inclining to tirannie, when the Kings were too mightie: & ſometime to cõfuſion, when the people would vſurp authority. Lycurgus therfore placed betwene the kings & the people, a coũſel of Senatours, which was as a ſtrong beame, that held both theſe extreames in an euen ballance, and gaue ſure footing and ground to either part, to make ſtrong the ſtate of the commõ weale. For the eight & twentie Senators (which made the whole body of the Senate) tooke ſometime the Kings part, when it was needfull to pull downe the furie of the people: and contrarily, they held ſometimes with the people againſt the Kings, to bridle their tyrannical gouernment. Ariſtotle ſaith, he ordeined the number of Senatours to be but eight and twentie, becauſe two of thirtie that ioyned with him as afore, did for feare forſake him at his enterpriſe. Howbeit Sphærus writeth, that from the beginning, he neuer purpoſed to haue more then eight and twentie to be the Senate. And perhaps he had great regard to make it a perfect number, conſidering it is compounded of the number of ſeuen, multiplied by foure: and is the firſt perfect number next to ſixe, being equall to all parts gathered together. But as for me, my opinion is, he choſe this number rather then anie other, becauſe he meant the whole bodie of the counſell ſhould be but thirtie perſons, adding to that number, the two Kings. Lycurgus tooke ſo great care to eſtabliſh well this counſell, that he brought an oracle for it, from Apolloes temple in

DELPHES. This oracle is called vnto this day Retra, as who would say, the statute oracles whereof the answer was. Whē thou hast built a temple vnto Iupiter the Syllanian, and to Minerua the Syllanian, and deuided the people into lineages, thou shalt establish a Senate of thirtie counsellers, with the two kinges: & shalt assemble the people at times conuenient, in the place betweene the bridge and the riuer Cnacion. There the Senatours shall propound all matters, and breake vp after their assemblies: and it shal not be lawfull for the people to speake one worde. In those dayes the people were euer assembled betweene two riuers, for there was no hall to assemble a counsaill at large, nor any other place prepared for them. For Lycurgus thought no builded place meete for men to giue good counsell in, or to determine causes, but rather a hindrance: because in such places men be drawen to muse on vaine thinges, and their mindes be caried away with beholdinge the images, tables, and pictures, comonly set vp for ornament in such open places. And if it be in a Theater, then beholding the place where the playes and sportes be made, they thinke more of them, then of any counsail. Againe, if it be in a greate hall, then of the fayer embowed or vawted roofes, or of the fretised seelinges curiously wrought, and sumptuously set forth, and tend not still their busines they come for. When the people were assembled in counsaill, it was not lawfull for any of them to put forth matters to the counsell to be determined, neither might any of them deliuer his opinion what he thought of any thing: but the people had onely authoritie to giue their assent (if they thought good) to the things propounded by the Senatours, or the two Kings. Howbeit afterwards, the two Kings Polydorus and Theopompus, because the people did many times crosse and alter the determination of the Senate, by taking away or adding something to it, they did adde these wordes to the oracle aforesayed. That if the people would not assent to any ordinance of the Senate, then should it be lawfull for the Kinges and Senate to breake vp the counsell, and to frustrate all thinges done in the same: the wise aduise of the Senate being encountered thus, and their meaning to the best, so peruerted to the worse. These two Kings perswaded the people, that at the very first, this addition came with the oracle of Apollo: as the poet Tyrtæus maketh mention in the place, where he sayeth:

Cnacion ß.

The open fields appoynted for place of counsaill.

From Delphos Ile, this oracle is brought of Pythia: into their country soyle.
The Kinges (euen they to whome of right there ought a louing care in princely brestes to boyle, the Spartane wealthe, to gurde from euery spoyle:) Shalbe the chiefe, graue causes to decyde with Senatours: whose sounde aduise is tride.
And next to them, the people shall fulfill asmuch as seemes, to please their princes will.

Lycurgus now hauing thus tempered the forme of his common weale, it seemed notwithstanding to those that came after him, that this small number of thirtie persons that made the Senate, was yet too mighty, & of too great authoritie. Wherfore to bridle thē in a litle, they gaue them (as Plato sayeth) a bitte in their mouths, & that was the authoritie of the Ephores, which signifie as much as controllers: and were erected about a hundred and thirtie yeres after the death of Lycurgus. The first which was chose of these, was Elatus, & it was in the time of King Theopompus, whose wife on a day in her anger sayed: how through his negligence he would leaue lesse to his successours, then he had receiued of his predecessours. To whom he answered againe, not lesse but more, for that it shall continue longer, and with a more suertie. For, in losing thus their too absolute power, that wrought them great enuie & hatred amōg their citizens, they did escape the danger & mischief that their neighbours the ARGIVES, and MESSENIANS did feele: who would not giue ouer the soueraigne authority which they had gotten once. This example maketh Lycurgus great wisdome & foresight manifestly knowen: who so will deeply consider the seditions & ill gouernments of the ARGIVES, & MESSENIANS (their neere neighbours and kinsmen) aswell from the people, as from the Kings. Who from the beginning had all things alike to the SPARTANS: & in deuiding of their lands a far better order then theirs. This notwithstanding, they did not prosper long: but through the pride of their Kings,

Kings, and the disobedience of their people, they entred into ciuill warres one against another, shewing by their disorders and misfortunes the speciall grace the gods did beare to SPARTA, to giue them such a reformer, as did so wisely temper the state of their common weale, as we will shew hereafter. The second lawe that Lycurgus made, and the boldest and hardest he euer tooke in hand, was the making of a new diuision of their lands. For he saw so great a disorder & vnequality among the inhabitants, aswell of the countrie, as of the citie LACEDÆMON, by reason some (and the greatest number of them) were so poore, that they had not a handfull of ground, and other some being least in number were very riche, that had all: he thought with himselfe to banish out of the citie all insolencie, enuie, couetousnesse, & deliciousnesse, and also all riches and pouertie, which he tooke the greatest, and the most continuall plagues of a citie, or common weale. For this purpose, he imagined there was none so ready and necessarie a meane, as to perswade his cittizens to suffer all the lands, possessions, and inheritance of their countrie, to runne in common together: and that they should make a new diuision equally in partition amongst themselues, to liue from thenceforth as it were like brothers together, so that no one were richer then another, & none should seeke to go before each other, any other way then in vertue onely: thinking there should be no difference or vnequalitie among inhabitants of one citie, but the reproches of dishonestie, and the praises of vertue. Thus Lycurgus following his determination, did out of hand make a lawe of the diuision of their lands. For first he did deuide all the countrie of LACONIA, into thirtie thousand equall parts, the which he did set out for those that inhabited about SPARTA: and of those lands that ioyned next to the citie of SPARTA, that was the chiefe metropolitan citie of LACONIA, he made other nine thousand parts, which he deuided to the naturall citizens of SPARTA, who be those that are properly called Spartans. Howbeit some will say, he made but sixe thousand parts, & that king Polydorus afterwards did adde to other three thousand parts. Other say also, that Lycurgus of these nine thousand parts made but the halfe onely, and Polydorus the rest. Euery one of these parts was such, as might yeeld vnto the owner yeerely, three score and ten bushels of barley for a man, and twelue bushels for the woman, and of wine and other liquide fruites, much like in proportion: which quantitie Lycurgus iudged to be sufficient, to keepe the body of a man in health, and to make him strong and lustie, without any further allowance. They say after this, as he returned home one day out of the fields, and came ouer the lands where wheate had bin reaped not long before, and saw the number of sheaues lying in euery shocke together, and no one shocke bigger then another: he fell a laughing, & told them that were with him, me thinks all LACONIA is as it were an inheritance of many bretheren, who had newly made partition together. He gaue an attempt to haue deuided also moueables, & to haue made a cõmon partition betweene them, to thend he would haue vtterly taken away all vnequalitie. But finding the citizens tooke it very impatiently, that openly that which they had, should be taken away; he went about to do it more secretly, and in a cunninger wise to take away that couetousnesse. For first of all he did forbid all coine of golde and siluer to be currant: and then he did set out certaine coines of iron which he commaunded only to be currant, whereof a great weight and quantitie was but little worthe. So as to lay vp thereof the value of ten Minas, it would haue occupied a whole celler in a house, besides it would haue needed a yoke of oxen to carie it any where. Now golde and siluer being thus banished out of the countrie, many lewde parts and faultes must needs cease thereby. For who would robbe, steale, picke, take away, hyde, procure, or whorde vp any thing, that he had no great occasion to desire, nor any profit to possesse, nor would be any pleasure to vse or imploy. For, the iron they occupied for their coyne, they cast vinegar vpon it while it was red hoate out of the fire, to kill the strength and working of it to any other vse, for thereby it was so eger & brickle, that it would bide no hammer, nor could be made, beaten, or forged to any other fashion. By this means he banished also, all superfluous and vnprofitable sciences, which he knew he should not need to do by any proclamation: because they would fall away (or the most part of them) euen of themselues, when the baseneſſe of the money they should take for their worke, should vndo them. For their iron moneys were not currant els where in the cities of GREECE, but euery body made a ieste of it there. By this occasion, the LACEDÆMONIANS could buie no forrein wares nor marchandises, neither came there any ſhip into their hauen to trafficke with them, neither any fine curious Rethorician did repaire into their countrie to teach them eloquence, and the cunning caſt of lying: nor yet came there to them any wiſard to tell them their fortune, nor any Pander to keepe any brothell houſe, nor yet goldſmithe or ieweller, to make or ſell any toyes or trifles of gold or ſiluer to ſet forth women: conſidering all theſe things are vſed to be made to get money, and to hourd vp that they had not. After this ſorte, delicatenes that wanted many things that entertained it, began by litle and litle to vaniſh away, and laſtly, to fall off from themſelues: when the moſt riche men had no more occaſion then the pooreſt, and riches hauing no meane to ſhew her ſelfe openly in the worlde, was faine to remaine ſhut at home idely, as not able to doe her maſter any ſeruice. Thereupon moueables and houſehold ſtuffe (which a man cannot be without, and muſt be dayly occupied) as bedſteads, tables, chaires, and ſuch like neceſſaries for houſe, were excellently well made: and men did greatly praiſe the faſhion of the LACONIAN cup which they called Cothon, and ſpecially for a ſouldier in the warres, as Critias was wont to ſay. For it was made after ſuch a faſhion, that the colour of it did let the eye to diſcerne the fowle & vnwholſome water, which men are driuen oft times to drinke in a campe, and goeth many times againſt ones ſtomack to ſee it: and if by chaunce there was any filth or mudde in the bottome, it would cleaue and ſtick faſt vpon the ribbes of the bellie, and nothing came through the necke, but cleane water to his mouth that dranke it. The reformer of their ſtate was the cauſe of all this: becauſe their artificers tending now to ſuperfluous works, were occupied about the making of their moſt neceſſarie things. Further, now to driue away all ſuperfluitie and deliciouſnes, and to roote out vtterly deſire to get and gathet: he made another third law for eating and drinking, and againſt feaſts and banckets. Firſt he willed and commaunded the citizens, that they ſhould eate together all of one meate, and chieflie of thoſe he had permitted by his ordinance. Then he did expreſſely forbid them to eate alone, or apart, or ſecretly by themſelues, vpon riche tables and ſumptuous beds, abuſing the labour of excellent workemen, and the deuiſes of lickeriſh cookes to cramme themſelues in corners, as they doe fatte vp beaſts and poultrie, which doth not onely breed ill conditions in the minde, but doth marre the complexions of men, and the good ſtates of their bodie, when they giue themſelues ouer to ſuch ſenſualitie and gluttonie. Whereof it followeth in the ende that men muſt needs ſleepe much, to helpe to digeſt the exceſſe of meates they haue taken, and then muſt they goe to the hoate houſes to bathe themſelues, and ſpend long time about the ordinarie attendance of their ſickely bodies. This was a maruellous thing for him to bring to paſſe, but much more, to make riches not to be ſtolen, and leaſt of all to be coueted, as Theophraſtus ſaid of him: which by this meanes of making them eate together with all ſobrietie at their ordinarie dyet, was brought to paſſe. For there was no more meane to the riche, then to the poore, to vſe to play, or ſhew tiches, ſithe both of them were forced to be together in one place, and to eate all of one meate: ſo as that which is commonly ſpoken, that Pluto the god of riches is blinde, was truely verified onely in the citie of SPARTA, aboue all other places of the world. For there riches was laide on the ground like a corſe without a ſoule, that mooueth no whit at all: conſidering it was not lawfull for any man to eate at home ſecretly in his houſe, before he came to their open halles, nor might not come thither for a countenance onely to his meales, being already fed and full fraught. For euery mans eye was vpon thoſe ſpecially which did not eate and drinke with a good ſtomach amongſt them: and it was the vſe to reproche them as gluttons, and daintie mouthed men, which refuſed to eate as it were in common together. So as this was the ordinance they ſay, that grieued moſt the riche aboue all that Lycurgus made, and whereat they were moſt mad and angrie with him: in ſo much, as on a day, they all ſetting vpon him to alter it, he was compelled to runne out of the market place, and getting ground of them, he recouered the liberties of a church, before any could ouertake him: ſauing one young man called Alcander, who otherwiſe had no ill nature in him, but that he was ſomewhat quick of his hand, and cholericke with all. Who following Lycurgus neerer then any other, did giue him a blowe ouerthwart the face with a ſtaffe, and ſtrake out one of his eyes, as Lycurgus turned toward him. Yet for all this, Lycurgus neuer baſhed or made worde at the matter, but did liſte vp his head to thoſe that followed him, and ſhewed ſhewed them his face all a gore bloud, and his eye put out cleane: whereof they were all ſo ſore aſhamed, that there was not a man that durſt once open his mouth againſt him, but to the contrarie, they ſeemed to pitie him, and did deliuer Alcander into his handes that had done the deed, to puniſh him as him ſelfe pleaſed. And ſo they all brought him to his houſe, and ſhewed they were right hartely ſorie for his hurt. Lycurgus thanking them, returned them all backe againe, ſaue that he made Alcander to goe with him into his houſe, where he neuer hurte him, nor gaue him fowle worde: but commaunded him onely to waite vpon him, and made his other ordinary ſeruants to withdraw their waiting. This young man who now began to ſpie his owne faulte, did moſt willingly attend vpon him, and neuer ſpake worde to the contrarie. When he had ſerued him a certaine time, being very nere continually about him, he began to feele and taſte of his naturall liberalitie, and ſaw of what affection and intention Lycurgus was moued to do all he did: he perceiued what was the ſeueritie of his ordinarie life, and what his conſtancie was to endure labour without wearineſſe. Alcander then began to loue and honour Lycurgus from his heart, and tolde his parents and friends, howe he was no ſuch ſeuere man as he ſeemed, but was of ſo kinde and gentle a nature to all men as might be. See I pray you how Alcander was transformed by Lycurgus, and his puniſhment alſo, which he ſhould haue receiued: for of a fierce, raſhe, and a lewde conditioned youth he was before, he became now a very graue and wiſe man. But for memorie of this his misfortune, Lycurgus built a temple to Minerua, which he ſurnamed Optiletide, becauſe the DORIANS which dwell in thoſe parts of PELOPONNESVS, doe call the eyes, optiles. There are other writers (as Dioſcorides for one) which ſay Lycurgus had a blowe with a ſtaffe, but he had not his eye ſtriken out with it: and how contrariwiſe, he founded this temple to Minerua, to giue her thankes for healing of his eye. Hereof it came, that euer ſince the SPARTANS haue bene reſtrained to carie ſtaues in any aſſemblie of counſell. But to returne to their common repaſtes, which the CRETANS called Andria, and the LACEDÆMONIANS Phiditia, either becauſe they were places wherein they learned to liue ſoberly and ſtraightly (for in the GREKE tongue Phido, is to ſaue and ſpare) or elſe becauſe their amitie and friendſhip grewe there towards one another, as if they would haue called them Philitia, feaſts of loue, by changing d. into L: It may be alſo they added the firſt letter as ſuperfluous, and meant to call the places Editia, becauſe they did eate and drinke there. They ſat in their halles by fifteene in a companie, litle more or leſſe, and at the beginning of euery moneth, euery one brought a buſhell of meale, eight gallons of wine, fiue pound of cheeſe, and two pound and a halfe of figges for a man, beſides ſome little portion of their money to buie certaine freſh cates. And ouer and aboue all this, euery man when he did ſacrifice in his houſe, was bound to ſend the beſt and chiefeſt things of his ſacrifice to the halles to be eaten. Likewiſe if any man went on hunting, and killed any veniſon: it was an order, he ſhould ſend a peece of the fleſh thither. Hauing theſe two lawfull cauſes, they might eate and drinke by themſelues at home, either when they ſacrificed any beaſt to the goddes, or when they came late home from hunting: otherwiſe they were bounde of neceſſitie to meete in their halles at meales, if they would eate any thing. This order they kept very ſtraightly a great time: in ſo much as king Agis on a daye, returning from the warres, where he had ouerthrowne the ATHENIANS, and being deſirous to ſuppe at home priuately with the Queene his wife, he ſent to the halles for his portion. But the Polemarchi, that be certaine officers aſſiſting the Kings in the warres, did denie him. The next daye Agis left of for ſpight, to doe the accuſtomed ſacrifice they were wonte to celebrate in the ende of euery warre: whereupon they ſet a fine on his head, and condemned him to paye it. The young children alſo went to theſe repaſts, euen as they ſhould goe to ſchooles to learne grauitie and temperance, where they heard wiſe and graue diſcourſes touching the gouernment of a common weale, but not of maſters that were as hirelings. There they learned pretily to playe vpon wordes, and pleaſauntly to ſporte one with another, without any broade ſpeeches, or vncomely ieſtes, and at others handes to beare the ſame againe, without choller or anger. For this property haue the LACEDÆMONIANS aboue all other, to take and giue a mocke without any offence: neuertheles, if any mans nature could not beare it, he needed but pray the partie to forbeare his ieſting, and ſo he leſte it ſtraight.

And it was euer an ordinarie among them, that the eldeſt of the companie tolde the reſt that were come into the hall to meale, with ſhewing them of the dore: Sirs, remember, there goeth not a worde here out of this doore. Euen ſo he that would be receiued to meale there in their companie, muſt firſt of neceſſitie be allowed and receiued in this ſort, by all the reſt. Euery one of them tooke a litle ball of branne or dowe to waſhe their hands with, and without euer a word ſpeaking, they threw it into a baſen, which the ſeruant that waited on them at the table did carie vpon his head: he that was contented the other ſhould be receiued in companie, did caſt in his balle as he did receiue it, but if he miſliked him, then he preſſed it flat betweene his fingers, and threw it in. This ball of branne thus preſſed flat, was as much as a beane bored thorough, and was to them a ſigne of condemnation. If any one ball were found of this ſorte, the ſuter was reiected: for they would not haue any enter into their companie, that was not liked of all the reſt. He that thus was reiected, they ſay he was diſcadded: for the baſin wherein the litle balles were caried, was called Caddos. The beſt diſh they ſerued at theſe meales, was that they call their blacke brothe: ſo that when they had that, the olde men did eate no fleſh, but left it all to the young men, and they by them ſelues did eate the brothe. There was a king of PONTVS, that being deſirous to taſte of this blacke broth, did buie of purpoſe a LACEDÆMONIAN cooke: but after he had once taſted therof, he was very angry ſtraight. The cooke then ſaid vnto him: and it pleaſe your grace, ere one ſhall finde this brothe good, he muſt be waſhed firſt in the riuer of Eurotas. After they had eate and drunke thus ſoberly together, euery one repaired home without any light: for it was not lawfull for them to go thither, nor any where els with light, becauſe they ſhould accuſtome themſelues boldly to goe vp and downe the darke, and all about in the night. This was the order and manner of their meales. But here is ſpecially to be noted, that Lycurgus would in no wiſe haue any of his lawes put in writing. For it is expreſſely ſet downe in his lawes they call Retra, that none of his lawes ſhould be written. For he thought that which ſhould chiefly make a citie happie, and vertuous, ought throughly by education to be printed in mens hearts and manners, as to haue continuance for euer: which he tooke to be loue and good will, as a farre ſtronger knot to tie men with, then any other compulſarie lawe. Which when men by vſe and cuſtome through good education doe take in their childhood, it maketh euery man to be a lawe to him ſelfe. Furthermore, concerning buying and bargaining one with another, which are but trifles, and ſometime are changed into one ſort, and ſometime in another, as occaſion ſerueth: he thought it beſt not to conſtraine them to doe it by writing, nor to eſtabliſh cuſtomes that might not be altered, but rather to leaue them to the libertie and diſcretion of men which had bene brought vp in the ſame, bothe to take away, and to adde therein, as the caſe and time ſhould require. But to conclude, he thought the chiefeſt point of a good lawe maker or reformer of the common weale was, to cauſe men to be well brought vp and inſtructed. One of his ordinances therefore was expreſſely, that not one of his lawes ſhould be written. Another of his deuiſes was, againſt ſuperfluous charges and expences: which to auoide, he made a lawe that all rooſes of houſes ſhould be made onely with the axe, and all gates and dores with the ſawe, and that without any other toole of occupation. Wherein he had the like imagination as afterwards Epaminondas had, when he ſaid, ſpeaking of his table: Such a borde neuer receiueth any treaſon. Euen ſo thought Lycurgus, that ſuch a builte houſe would neuer receiue curioſitie or daintineſſe. For no man is ſo madly diſpoſed or ſimple witted, as to bring into ſo poore and meane houſes, bedſteads with ſiluer feete, imbrodered couerlets, or counterpointes of purple ſilke, neither yet plate of golde nor of ſiluer, nor ſuch other like coſtly furniture and fineneſſe, as thoſe things require to waite vpon them: becauſe the beds muſt be aunſwerable to the meaneſſe of the houſe, the furnitures of the beddes muſt be ſutelike to the ſame, and all other houſeholde ſtuffe, dyet, meate, and drinke agreeable to the reſt. Hereof proceeded that, which Leontychidas the firſt King of that name, ſaied once: who ſupping on a time in the citie of CORINTH, and ſeeing the rooſe of the hall where he ſate, ſumptuouſly embowed and carued, he asked ſtraight if the trees did growe carued ſo in that countrie. The third lawe was, he did forbid them to make warre often with one enemie, leaſt the enemie forced to take often armes in hand, might in the ende growe experter and valianter then they.

For by making often warres with the countrie of BOEOTIA, he made the THEBANS in the end as expert and valiant ſouldiers, as the LACEDÆMONIANS. Whereupon Antalcidas ſeeing him hurt one daye, ſayde vnto him: The THEBANS haue nobly rewarded thee for their learning, ſith thou haſt made them expert ſouldiers vnwilling to learne the diſcipline of warre. Theſe be the lawes Lycurgus ſelfe called Retra, and ſignifie as much as Oracles, that the god Apollo had diſcouered to him. Nowe the education of children, hee eſteemed the chiefeſt and greateſt matter, that a reformer of lawes ſhould eſtabliſh. Therefore beginning a farre off, he firſt conſidered the ſtate of mariage, and the generation of children. For Ariſtotle ſayeth, that Lycurgus did attempt to reforme women, and did ſoone giue it ouer againe: becauſe he could doe no good therein, by reaſon of the great libertie they had taken by the abſence of their husbandes in the warres, compelled often ſo to be abroad, and that they did leaue them miſtreſſes of their houſe, and at their returne did honour them ſo much, and make of them ſo beyonde meaſure, with calling them ladyes and miſtreſſes. Howbeit this is true, that he had an eye to the rule and order of their life, aſwell as he had of mens: and ſo reaſon did require. Firſt of all, he willed that the maydens ſhould harden their bodies with exerciſe of running, wreſtling, throwe the barre, and caſting the dart, to the ende that the frute wherewith they might be afterwardes conceiued, taking nouriſhment of a ſtrong and luſtie bodie, ſhould ſhoote out and ſpread the better: and that they by gathering ſtrength thus by exerciſes, ſhould more eaſely away with the paynes of child bearing. And to take away from them their womaniſh daintineſſe, and fineneſſe, he brought vppe a cuſtome, for younge maydes and boyes to goe as it were a preceſſion, and to daunce naked at ſolemne feaſtes and ſacrifices, and to ſing certaine ſonges of their owne making, in the preſence and ſight of younge men. To whom by the way they gaue manie times pretie mockes of purpoſe, as pleaſantly hitting them home, for things wherein before they had forgotten their duties: and ſometimes alſo in their ſong for their vertues, wittes, or manners, they prayſed them which had deſerued it. By this meanes, they did ſet young mens hearts a fire, to ſtriue to winne moſt prayſe and honour. For who ſo was prayſed of them for a valiant man, or whoſe worthy actes were ſung by them, he thereby was incouraged to doe the better another time: and the pretie girdes and quippes they gaue to others, was of no leſſe force, then the ſharpeſt wordes and admonitions that otherwiſe could be giuen them. This tooke place the rather, becauſe it was done in the preſence of the kings, the Senatours, and all the reſt of the citizens which came thither to ſee theſe ſportes. And though the maydes did ſhewe themſelues thus naked openly, yet was there no diſhoneſtie ſeene nor offered, but all this ſport was full of play and toyes, without any youthfull part or wantonneſſe: and rather caried a ſhew of demureneſſe, and a deſire to haue their beſt made bodies ſeene and ſpied. Moreouer, it ſomewhat lifted vp their hearts, and made them noblier minded, by giuing them to vnderſtand, that it was no leſſe comely for them, in their kinde and exerciſes to carie the bell, then it was for men in their games and exerciſes to carie the price. Hereof it came, that the women of LACEDÆMON were ſo bolde to ſay, and thinke of themſelues that, which Gorgona the wife of king Leonidas one day aunſwered: being in talke with a ſtraunge woman that ſayde to her. There be no women in the world that commaund their husbandes, but you wiues of LACEDÆMON. Whereto the Queene ſtraight replyed: ſo be there no women but we, which bring foorth men. Furthermore, theſe playes, ſports, and daunces, the maydes did naked before young men, were prouocations to drawe and allure the young men to mary: not as perſwaded by geometricall reaſons, as ſayth Plato, but brought to it by liking, and of very loue. Thoſe which would not marrie, he made infamous by law. For it was not lawfull for ſuch to be preſent, where theſe open games and paſtimes were ſhewed naked. Furthermore, the officers of the citie compelled ſuch as woulde not marie, euen in the hardeſt time of the winter, to enuirone the place of theſe ſportes, and to goe vp and downe ſtarcke naked, and to ſing a certaine ſong made for the purpoſe againſt them, which was: that iuſtly were they puniſhed, becauſe that lawe they diſobeyed. Moreouer, when ſuch were olde, they had not the honour and reuerence done them, which old maried men vſually receiued. Therefore there was no man that miſliked, or reproued that, which was ſpoken to Dercillidas: albeit otherwiſe he was a noble captaine. For, comming into a preſence, there was a young man which would not vouchſafe to riſe and do him reuerence, nor to giue him place for to ſit downe: and worthily, quoth he, becauſe thou haſt not gotten a ſonne, who may doe ſo much for me in time to come. Thoſe which were deſirous to marie any, were driuen to take them away by force, whom they would marie, not little young wenches I meane, which were not of age to be maried: but luſtie and ſtrong maydes of age to beare children. And when one of them was ſtolne away in this ſort, ſhe that was priuie thereto, and meane to make the mariage, came and ſhaued the hayres of her head that was maried: then ſhe put her into mans apparell, and gaue her all thinges ſute like to the ſame, and layde her vpon a mattereſſe all alone, without light or candle. After this was done, the bridegrome, being neither drunke nor finelier apparelled then he was wont to be, but hauing ſupped ſoberly at his ordinarie, came home ſecretly to the houſe where the bride was: and there vntyed his wiues girdle, tooke her in his armes, layde her vpon a bed, and talked together a while, and afterwardes fayre and ſoftly ſtole away to the place, where he was wont to ſleepe with other young men. And ſo from thenceforth, he continued alwayes to doe the like, being all the day time with his companions, and ſleeping moſt of the night, vnleſſe hee ſometime ſtale to ſee his wife, being affrayd, and aſhamed euer to be ſeene, by any of the houſe where ſhe was. And hereunto his young wife did helpe for her part, to ſpie meanes and occaſions howe they might meete together, and not be ſeene. This manner endured a great while and vntill ſome of them had children, before they boldly met together, and ſawe each other on the day time. This ſecret meeting in this ſort did ſerue to good purpoſes, not onely becauſe it was ſome meane of continencie, and ſhamefaſtneſſe, but alſo it kept their bodies in ſtrength and better ſtate, to bring foorth children. It continued alſo in both parties, a ſtill burning loue, and a new deſire of the one to the other, not as it were luke warme, nor wearie, as theirs commonly be which haue their bellies full of loue, and as much as they luſt: but they euer parted with an appetite one from another, keeping ſtill a longing deſire to deuiſe howe to meete againe. Nowe when hee had ſtabliſhed ſuch a continencie, and ſo kinde a framed honeſtie in mariage, he tooke no leſſe care to driue away all fooliſh iealouſie therein, thinking it very good reaſon to beware there ſhould be no violence, nor confuſion in mariage: and yet as reaſon would, they ſhould ſuffer thoſe which were woorthie to get children as it were in common, laughing at the madde follie of them which reuenge ſuch thinges with warre and bloudſhed, as though in that caſe men in no wiſe ſhoulde haue no fellowſhippe together. Therefore a man was not to be blamed, being ſtepped in yeares, and hauing a young wife, if ſeeing a faire young man that liked him, and knowen with all to bee of a gentle nature, he brought him home to get his wife with childe, and afterwardes would auow it for his, as if him ſelfe had gotten it. It was lawfull alſo for an honeſt man that loued another mans wife, for that he ſawe her wife, ſhamefaſt, and bringing forth goodly children, to intreat her husband to ſuffer him to lie with her, and that he might alſo plow in that luſty ground, and caſt abroad the ſeede of well fauoured children: which by this meanes came to be common in bloud and parentage, with the moſt honourable and honeſteſt perſons. For firſt of all, Lycurgus did not like that children ſhould be priuate to any men, but that they ſhould be common to the common weale: by which reaſon he would alſo, that ſuch as ſhould become citizens, ſhould not be begotten of euery man, but of the moſt honeſteſt men onely. So Lycurgus thought alſo there were many fooliſh vaine toyes and fanſies, in the lawes and orders of ther Nations, touching mariage: ſeeing they cauſed their bitches and mares to bee limed and couered with the fayreſt dogges and goodlieſt ſtalons that might be gotten, praying or paying the maſters and owners of the ſame: and kept their wiues notwithſtanding ſhut vp ſafe vnder locke and key, for feare leaſt other then them ſelues might get them with child, although they were ſickly, feeble brayned, and extreame olde. As if it were not firſt of all, and chiefely a diſcommoditie to the fathers and mothers, and likewiſe to thoſe that bring them vp, to haue vnperfect and feeble children borne, as it were begotten of drye and withered men: and then to the contrarie, what pleaſure and benefite is it to thoſe that haue fayre and good children, borne, as gotten of like ſeede and men. Theſe thinges were done then by naturall and ciuill reaſon, neuertheleſſe they ſay women were ſo farre off then from intreatie, as euer they were before: ſo as in old time, in SPARTA, men knew not what adulterie ment. For proofe whereof, the anſwere made by Geradas (one of the firſt auncient SPARTANS) vnto a ſtranger, may be alledged: that asked him, what puniſhment they had for adulterers. My friend, quoth he, there be none here. But if there were? replied the ſtranger againe. Marie ſayd he, then he muſt pay as great a bull, as ſtanding vpon the toppe of the mountaine Taygetus, may drinke in the riuer of Eurotas. Yea marie: but how is it poſſible (quoth the ſtranger) to finde ſuch a bull? Geradas laughing, anſwered him againe. And how were it poſſible alſo to finde an adulterer in SPARTA? And this is that which is found of Lycurgus lawes touching mariages. Furthermore, after the birth of euery boy, the father was no more maſter of him, to cocker and bring him vp after his will: but he himſelfe caried him to a certaine place called Leſché, where the eldeſt men of his kinred being ſet, did view the childe. And if they found him fayre, and well proportioned of all his limmes, and ſtrong: they gaue order he ſhould be brought vp, and appointed him one of the nine thouſand partes of inheritance for his education. Contrariwiſe, if they found him deformed, miſhapen, or leane, or pale, they ſent him to be throwen in a deepe pit of water, which they commonly called Apothetes, and as a man would ſay, the common houſe of office: holding opinion it was neyther good for the childe, nor yet for the common weale, that it ſhould liue, conſidering from his birth he was not well made, nor giuen to be ſtrong, healthfull, nor luſtie of bodie all his life long. For this cauſe therefore, the nurſe after their birth did not waſh them with water ſimply (as they doe euery where at that time) but with water mingled with wine: and thereby did they prooue, whether the complexion or temperature of their bodies were good or ill. For they ſuppoſe, that children which are giuen to haue the falling ſickneſſe, or otherwiſe to be full of rewmes and ſicknеſſes, cannot abide waſhing with wine, but rather dry and pine away: as contrarily the other which are healthfull, become thereby the ſtronger and the luſtier. The nurces alſo of SPARTA vſe a certaine manner to bring vp their children, without ſwadling, or binding them vp in clothes with ſwadling bandes, or hauing on their heads any croſſe clothes: ſo as they made them nimbler of their limmes, better ſhaped and goodlier of bodie. Beſides that, they acquainted their children to all kinde of meates, and brought them vp without much tendance, ſo as they were neither fine nor licorous, nor fearefull to be left alone in the darke, neither were they cryers, wrallers, or vnhappy children, which be all tokens of baſe and cowardly natures. So that there were ſtraungers, that of purpoſe bought nources out of LACONIA, to bring vp their children: as they ſay Amycla was one of them, which nourced Alcibiades. But Pericles his tutor, gaue him afterwardes a bondman called Zopyrus, to be his maſter and gouernour: who had no better propertie in him, then other common ſlaues. This did not Lycurgus. For he did not put the education and gouernement of the children of SPARTA, into the hands of hyred maſters or ſlaues bought with money: neyther was it lawfull for the father him ſelfe to bring vp his owne childe after his owne maner and liking. For ſo ſoone as they came to ſeuen yeares of age, hee tooke and diuided them by companies, to make them to be brought vp together, and to accuſtome them to play, to learne, and to ſtudie one with another. Then he choſe out of euery companie one, whom he thought to haue the beſt wit, and had moſt courage in him to fight: to whom he gaue the charge and ouerſight of his owne companie. The reſt had their eyes waiting alwayes on him, they did obey his commaundementes willingly, they did abide patiently all corrections hee gaue them, they did ſuch taskes and workes as he appointed them: ſo that all their ſtudie was moſt to learne to obey. Furthermore, the olde gray headed men were preſent manie times to ſee them playe, and for the moſt part they gaue them occaſions to fall out, and to fight one with another, that they might thereby the better knowe and diſcerne the naturall diſpoſition of euery one of them, and whether they gaue any ſignes or tokens in time to come, to become cowardes or valiant men. Touching learning, they had as much as ſerued their turne: for the reſt of their time they ſpent in learning howe to obey, to away with paine, to endure labour, to ouercome ſtill in fight. According to their groweth and yeares, they did chaunge the exercises of their bodies: they did shaue their heads, they went barelegged, they were constrayned to play naked together the most part of their time. After they were past twelue yeres of age, they ware no longer coates: and they gaue them yearely but one seely gowne. This was the cause they were alwayes so nasty & sluttish, & they neuer vsed to bath or noynt themselues, sauing only at certaine dayes in the yeare, when they were suffered to taste of this refreshing. They lay and slept together vpon beds of strawe, which they themselues did make, of the toppes of reedes or canes that grewe in the riuer of Eurotas: which they were forced to goe gather and breake them selues with their handes, without any toole or iron at all. In the winter, they did mingle thistle down with these, which is called Lycophonas, because that stuffe seemeth somewhat warme of it selfe. About this time, the fauourers & likers of this pretie youth, which were commonly the lustiest and best disposed youthes of the citie, beganne to be ofter in their companie: and then the olde men tooke the better regard vnto them, and frequented more commonly the places of their daily exercises, & where their vse was to fight together, helping them when they played, how one should mocke another. This did their old men, not by way of pastime onely, but with such care and hearty loue towards them, as if they had bene altogether their fathers, masters, & gouernours, while they were boyes: in so much as there was neuer time nor place, where they had not alwayes some to admonish, reproue, or correct them, if they did a fault. Notwithstanding all this, there was euer one of the honestest men of the citie, who had expressely the charge and gouernance of these boyes. He did diuide them in companies, and afterwards gaue the ouersight of them, to such a one of the boyes as was discreetest, the manliest, the most hardie, and of the best courage amongst them. They called the children that were past infancie two yeres, Irenes: and the greatest boyes Melirenes: as who would say, readie to go out of boyerie. This boye who was made ouerseer of them, was commonly twentie yeres of age. He was their captaine when they fought, and did commaunde them as his seruantes when they were in the house: and willed them which were strongest, and the most growen, to carie woode when they should prepare dinner or supper, and those which were least and weakest, to goe gather herbes, which they must steale or lack them. So they went out to steale some in gardens, some at the markets, other in the halles where the feasts were kept, and men did eate together, into the which they conueyed them selues as closely and cunningly as they could deuise: for if they were taken with the manner, they were scourged terribly, because they were so grosse & negligent, and not fine and cunning in their facultie. They stole also all other kind of meate, whatsoeuer they could get or lay hands on. They pried and sought all occasions how to take and steale meate handsomely, both when men were a sleepe, or els that they were careless, or did not giue good heede vnto them. But he that was taken with the manner, had his payment roundly, and was punished with fasting besides: for they had but a slender pittance, because necessitie should driue them to venter boldly, and wit should finde out all the deuises to steale finely. This was the chiefest cause, why they gaue them so small a diet. The seconde cause was, that their bodies might grow vp higher in height. For the vitall spirites not being occupied to concoct and digest much meate, nor yet kept downe, or spread abroad by the quantitie or ouerburden thereof, doe enlarge themselues into length, and shoote vp for their lightnes: and for this reason they thought the bodie did growe in height and length, hauing nothing to let, or hinder the rising of the same. It seemeth, that the selfe same cause made them fayrer also. For the bodies that are leane and slender, doe better and more easely yeelde to nature, which bringeth a better proportion and forme to euery member: and contrariewise it seemeth these grosse, corpulent, and ouerfedde bodies doe encounter nature, and be not so nimble and pliant to her, by reason of their heauy substance. As we see it by experience, the children which women bring a little before their time, & be somwhat cast before they should haue bene borne, be smaller and fayrer also, and more pure commonly then other that goe their time: because the matter whereof the bodie is formed, being more supple and pliant, is the easilier weilded by nature, which giueth them their shape and forme. Touching the naturall cause of this effect, let vs giue place to other to dispute it that will, without our further deciding of the same. But to returne to the matter of the LACEDÆMONIANS children.

They did robbe with ſo great care, and feare to be diſcouered, that they tell of one, which hauing ſtollen a little foxe, did hide him vnder his cloke, and ſuffered him with his teeth and clawes to teare out all his belly, and neuer cried, for feare he ſhould haue bene betrayed, vntill he fell downe dead in the place where he ſtoode. This is not vncredible, by that we ſee young boyes doe abide at this day: for we haue ſeene diuerſe, which haue bidden whipping euen to death, vpon the altar of Diana, ſurnamed Orthia. Now this vnder maiſter, who had the charge of euery company of theſe boies, vſed after ſupper (ſitting yet at the table) to bid one of them ſing a ſong: to another he put forth a queſtion, who was to be well aduiſed of his aunſwer, as for example: Who is the honeſteſt man in the city? or how thinkeſt thou by that ſuch a one did? By this exerciſe they were inured from boyes ſtate, to iudge of thinges well or ill done, and to vnderſtand the life and gouernment of their citizens. For which of them did not aunſwere quickely and directly to theſe queſtions, who is a good man, who is an honeſt citizen, and who not: they thought it was a ſigne of a dull wit, and careleſſe nature, not giuen to any vertue, for deſire of honour and eſtimation. Furthermore this vnder maſter was euer to waite for his aunſwer, and to ſee it ſhould be briefe and well knit vp in wordes: otherwiſe his puniſhment that aunſwered croſſely, or to little purpoſe, was that his maſter bit him by the thumbe. This he did many times in the preſence of the old men and magiſtrates of the city, that they might ſee whether he puniſhed them with reaſon or not, and according to their deſeruing. And though he did hurt him, they did not by and by reproue him, but when the children were gone away, then was he him ſelfe rebuked and puniſhed, if he had corrected them too ſore, or contrarily had fauoured them too much. Moreouer they did aſcribe the good or ill opinion conceiued of the children, vnto euery of their fauourers, and louers, which did affect and entertaine them: in as much as they ſay, a young boy vppon a time fighting with another, and a cry ſcaping out of his mouth, which his faint cowardly heart did yeeld, his fauourer and louer was ſtraight condemned by the officers of the citty to a fine. Albeit this loue was a thing euen incorporated into them, that the moſt honeſt and vertuouſeſt women loued the young maides thus alſo: yet was there no iealouſie nor ſuſpition that grew hereof, but rather to the contrary, there grew a maruellous mutuall loue and kindneſſe betweene them, which liued in one ſelfe place. For either of them by all the meanes they could, did deuiſe how to make the childe they loued in common, the wiſeſt, the gentleſt, and the beſt conditioned aboue all other. They taught theſe children to ſpeake in ſuch ſort, that their ſpeach had euer in it a pleaſaunt grace, and in few words cõprehended much matter. For Lycurgus ordained, a great maſſe and weight of iron money, ſhould be but little worth, and of a ſmall value, as we haue tolde you before: and contrarily, that ſpeach in few wordes, without any affectation, ſhould hold much deepe and graue matter, wherewith the children being acquainted, after long ſilence, ſhould be briefe and pitthy in their aunſwers. For as the ſeede of incontinent men which are too buſie with euery ragge and colman hedge, can take no roote to bring forth frute: euen ſo immoderate ſpeach, full of wordes and buſie tattle, bringeth forth as little ſenſe. Hereof it commeth, that the annſwers of the LACONIANS were ſo ſhort and witty. As they ſay, king Agis aunſwered on a day an ATHENIAN, who ieſting at the ſwords the LACEDÆMONIANS did weare, ſaid they were ſo ſhort, that theſe tumblers and iuglers did ſwallow them downe in the ſight of all the world: and yet ſaied Agis we hurt our enemies with them for all that. For mine owne opinion, I like well of the LACONIANS mãner of ſpeaking: which is not to ſpeake much, but when they ſpeake, to touch the matter effectually, and to make the hearers vnderſtand them. I thinke alſo, that Lycurgus ſelfe, was ſhort and quicke in his talke. For ſo a man may coniecture by his aunſwers which are writtten: as that which he made to one who earneſtly praied him to ſtabliſh a popular ſtate in LACEDÆMON, that the baſeſt might haue as great authority as the higheſt. Beginne (quoth he) to doe it firſt in thine own houſe. And as that alſo which he aunſwered another who asked him, why he had appointed ſo ſmall things, & ſo litle of value to be offered to the gods? Becauſe (quoth he) we ſhould neuer ceaſe to honour them. And as that which he ſpake another time, touching fightes and frayes, which was: that he did neuer forbid his citizens any of them, but thoſe wherein they vſe to giue their hand, as you would ſay to yeelde. Men finde alſo ſuch like answers, in some of his letters written to his citizens, as when they asked him. How can we defend our selues against our enemies? He aunswered: If ye be poore, and one doe couet no more then another. And in another letter that was sent, where he discourseth, whether it were requisite to inclose the city with walles: he sayeth, can that city be without walles, which is enuironned with men, though it be vncompassed with stone? Neuertheless it is hard to resolue, whether those letters, and other such like that are shewed, be to be beleeued, or discredited to be his. But that long speach was much disliked, and reproued among the LACEDÆMONIANS, it is manifestly to be seene by the words, which some amongst them haue heretofore aunswered. As king Leonidas said one day, to one that discoursed with him many good things, but out of season: friend, thou speakest many good wordes, but to litle purpose. And Charilaus, nephew to Lycurgus, being asked why his vncle made so few lawes: because said he, to men of few wordes, few lawes will serue. And Archidamidas sayed thus to some which reproued Hecataeus the Orator, for that being bidden to supper at one of their feasts, he spake not a word all supper time. He who can speake wel, knoweth also when to speake. And where I haue tolde before, that in their feat and quicke aunswers, commonly there was some prety grace, it may be well seene and knowen by these that follow. Demaratus aunswered a busie fellow who troubled him too much with vaine importunate questions, asking him still: who was the honestest man of LACEDÆMON, euen he that is least like thy selfe. And Agis sayd to some which highly praysed the ELIANS for their vpright iudgement, and iust dealing in the games Olympicall. What wonder make ye of it (quoth he) if in fiue years space the ELIANS one day do good iustice? And Theopompus likewise to a stranger, who as desirous to shew his affection he bare the LACEDÆMONIANS, told him how euery body called him Philolacon (as to say) a louer of LACEDÆMON. It were more honesty for thee (said he) to be named Philopolites, a louer of her citizens. And Plistonax the sonne of Pausanias, when an Orator of ATHENS said the LACEDÆMONIANS were vnlearned, and ignorant: thou saiest true quoth he, for we only of all the GRECIANS haue learned none of your ill conditions. And Archidamidas, to one that demanded of him, what number of fighting men there might be of the SPARTANS: Enow said he, to driue away the wicked. We may coniecture also their manner of speaking, by their words in mirth, which they spake sometimes playing wise: for they did neuer vse to speake vain words at randone, but it had alwaies some secret meaning in it, which required anothers good obseruation that would find it. As he which was desired to goe heare the nightingall counterfeited naturally: I haue (said he) heard the nightingall it selfe. And another which hauing red this inscription vpon a tumbe.

VVhen as they had, well quenched tyrannie

Their happe was yet in wretched wise to die,

They well deserued death, said he, that did but quench tyranny: they should haue quite consumed it with fire. O giue me not those (said he) which will die, but those which with fighting will kill others. Another seeing men sitting in coches and litters as they went: god forbid (said he) that I should euer sit in a chaire, where I could not rise to my elders. Such were their aunswers and encounters. So that some had reason which sayed heretofore, to speake LACONIAN like, was to be Philosopher like: as you would say, more to exercise the minde, then the body. Besides all this, they did study to sing well, and to make goodly ditties and songs. Then they spake most properly and featly. There was in their songs also a certaine motion, I wote not what, which stirred vp the hearers hearts, and did kindle desire in them to do notable feats. Their tongue was plaine, without affectation: their matter graue and morall, contayning for the most part the praise of those, which were slaine in battell for the defence of their countrey, as being happy men: & a shame to those that liue, which for fainte hearts refused so to die, to lead a miserable and vnfortunate life. and that the world ſhall witneſſe be, ere many yeares be paſt.

To conclude, who nearely will conſider the works & makings of the LACON poets (whereof ſome are yet extant) and will marke alſo the notes and tunes of the pipe, after the ſound and meaſure whereof they marched in array, going to charge the enemy: he ſhall finde, that Terpander and Pindarus, had reaſon to ioyne hardines with muſicke. For Terpander ſpeaking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, ſayeth in a place: Terpander of the Lacedamonians.

This is that land where deedes of chiualrie, did florish moſt, in many a martiall feate: VVhere muſicke made, her choiſe of harmony, and iuſtice kept her ſtately royall ſeate.

And Pindarus ſpeaking of them alſo ſaieth: Pyndarus of the Lacedamonians.

There: graue aduiſe, is found in aged braines:
there: gallant youths, are luſty lads in deede.
VVhich can both ſing, and daunce, in courtlike traines:
yet daunt their foes, with many a doughty deede.

By which teſtimonies it appeareth, the one and the other made, and deſcribeth them to haue loued muſicke, and the warres together. For as another LACON Poet ſayeth:

It ſitteth well, and is a ſeemely thing, for ſuch as ſpend their time in feates of warre:
To haue the ſkill, ſweete ſonnets for to ſing, and touch the harpe withouten iangling iarre.

For this cauſe therefore in all their warres, when they ſhould giue battell, the King did firſt ſacrifice to the Muſes, to put his ſouldiers in mind (as it ſhould ſeeme) of the diſcipline & wiſdome of the Muſes that they had bene brought vp in, to the end that when his ſouldiers were in the moſt extreme daunger, the Muſes ſhould preſent them ſelues before the ſouldiers eyes, to pricke them forwards to doe ſome noble actes of worthy memory. In their time of warre, they did tollerate their young men a litle of their hard & old accuſtomed life, & ſuffered them then to trim their haires, to haue braue armour, to weare gay apparell, and tooke as great delight therin, to ſee them gallant & luſty, as to behold yong neying & ſnorting horſes, deſirous for to fight. And although from the beginning of their youth, they did vſe to weare long haires: yet were they neuer ſo carefull to combe and bruſh their heads, as when they ſhould to the battell. For when they did noint them ſelues with ſweet oiles, and did ſhed their haire, remembring Lycurgus ſaying: who was wont to tell them, that hairs to them which were faire, did make them more faire, and to them that were fowle, they made them more vgly & dredfull. The exerciſes alſo of their bodies, were more eaſy and gentle, and not ſo hard and ſtraight in their warres, as they were in a peace: and generally, their whole maner of life was not then ſo ſtraightly viewed, nor yet controlled. So as they only were the men of the world, to whom warres were made a reſt from labour, which men ordinarily do endure, to make them the fitter for the warres. Afterwardes when their army was ſet in battell ray, euen in the face of the enemy, the King did ſtraight ſacrifice a goate vnto the goddes, & forthwith commaunded all his ſouldiers to put their garlands of flowers on their heads, & willed that the pipes ſhould ſound the ſong of Caſtor, at the noiſe and tune whereof, he him ſelfe beganne firſt to marche The long buſhes and haire of the Laconians. How the Laconians began battell. The Laconians ſong when they marched. Euſt. Ilia. 15.

forward. So that it was a maruellous pleasure, & likewise a dreadful sight, to see the whole battell march together in order, at the sound of the pipes, and neuer to breake their pace, nor confound their ranckes, nor to be dismaide nor amazed themselues, but to go on quietly and ioyfully at the sound of these pipes, to hazard them selues euen to death. For it is likely, that such courages are not troubled with much feare, nor yet ouercom with much fury: but rather they haue an assured constancy & valiantnes in good hope, as those which are backed with the assisting fauour of the goddes. The King marching in this order, had alwaies some about him, which had before time wonne the prises in games and iustes. And they say there was one of these on a time, that was offered a great some of money at the games Olympical, not to present him selfe at them: but he refused it, liking better with great paine to winne the prise, then for much money to lose his honour. Whereupon one sayd vnto him, LACONIAN: & what hast thou gotten now, to cary away the prise with so much swet? The LACONIAN answered him laughing: I shall fight in the battell, saith he, before the King. When they had once broken into their enemies, they did still fiercely and fiercelier set vpon them, and did neuer cease, vntill their enemies gaue way and fled: and then they chased and followed them still, vntill such time as their ouerthrowe and flight had assured them of the victory. Then they quickly and quietly returned to their campe, iudging it to be no manhood, neither the part of a noble minde, or of so worthy a nation as the GRECIANS were, to kill and hew in peeces, men so scattered and out of order, hauing forsaken all the hope of victory. This fell out not only honourable, but also very profitable for them. For they which were in battell against them, knowing they killed none but such as resisted stoutly, and how they did let other goe which fled before them: they found it was more their benefite to flie, then to tary and abide the strokes. Hippias the sophister saith, that Lycurgus him selfe was a very good captaine, and a great souldier, as he that had bene in many soughten fields: and Philostephanus ascribeth to him the deuise to put horsemen in troupes and companies, which they called Oulames, whereof fifty men at armes was a troupe, whose manner was to put them selues in squadrons. But Demetrius the Phalerian writeth otherwise, that Lycurgus was neuer at the wars, and that he made all his lawes and gouernment in a full peace. But in my opinion, the intermission of wars during the plaies Olympicall, which they say he deuised, doth shew in apparaunce that he was a gentle natured man, and one that loued quietnes and peace. Some notwithstanding (amongest whom Hermippus was one) say, he was not with Iphitus at the first beginning when he ordeined the playes Olympicall, but that by chaunce he happened to come thither, passing by in his iourney onely, and that he staid there to see the games: where he thought he heard the voice of a man behind him, saying, he maruelled much why he did not perswade his citizens also to be partners of this new deuise: and turning backe to see who it was that spake to him, he saw no body. Whereupon he tooke a conceite that it was a speach from the gods: and went therfore presently to seeke out Iphitus, with whom he made all the statutes and orders of the feast, which afterwards were farre more famous, better ordered, & more stately then before. But to returne againe to the LACEDÆMONIANS: their discipline and order of life continued still, after they were full growen men. For it was not lawfull for any man to liue as he listed, but they were within their city, as if they had bene in a campe, where euery man knoweth what allowance he hath to liue withall, & what busines he hath els to do in his calling. To be short, they were all of this mind, that they were not born to serue themselues, but to serue their countrey. Therefore if they were cõmanded nothing els, they went continually to see what the children did, and to teach them somewhat which might profite the common weale, or else they went to learne of those which were their elders. For one of the best and happiest things which Lycurgus euer brought into his city, was the great rest and leysure which he made his citizens to haue, onely forbidding them that they should not professe any vile or base occupation: and they needed not also to be carefull to get great riches, in a place where goods were nothing profitable nor esteemed. For the Ilotes, which were made bond men by the warres, did till their groundes, and yeelded them a certaine reuenue euery yere. And as touching this matter, they tell of a LACEDÆMONIAN, who being on a day at ATHENS where the law was pleaded, did vnderstand that a citizen there was condemned for Idlenes, and how he went home to his house very sorowfully, accõpanied with his friends which were sory for him, & greatly lamented his ill hap. The LACEDÆMONIAN then prayed those which were about him, to shew him the man condemned for liuing nobly, and like a gentleman. I haue alledged this, to shew how he thought it a vile & seruil thing to exercise any handy craft, or to work any thing by hand to get money. For sutes in lawe, a man may be well assured they were banished with the golde & siluer from LACEDÆMON, considering now there was no more auarice nor couetousnes there, nor yet pouertie nor lacke, but equalitie with aboundance, & quiet life with sobrietie. All other times but when they had warres, they followed dauncing, feasts, playes, bankets, hunting, or other exercises of body, and meetings to passe the time away. For the young men vntill they came to thirtie yeres of age, neuer went into the market to buie any prouision or things for the house, but did their fathers or their friends businesse: nay it was a shame for the oldest men, to haunt the market too often. As to the contrary, it was honorable for them to be present at the shew place the most part of the day, where they diuersely exercised their bodies, and likewise to be at the places of assembly, there to spend time with talking together, and discoursing honestly one with another, without talking of any matter of gaine, traffike, or money. For all their talke (for the most part) was about the praising of some honest thing, or sportingwise to reproue some dishonestie, which alwayes caried with it some gentle lesson or monition by the way. For Lycurgus was not such a sower man, as they neuer saw him laughe: but as Sosibius writeth, it was he that first sacrificed to the litle god of laughter, which is at LACEDÆMON, becausse he would mingle their feasts and assemblies with mirthe, as a pleasant sawce to ease the trouble of their strickt and hard life. To be briefe, he did accustome his citizens so, that they neither would nor could liue alone, but were in maner as men incorporated one with another; and were alwaies in company together, as the bees be about their maister bee: still in a continuall loue to serue their countrie, to winne honor, & to aduaunce the commonweale. Which affection of theirs is plaine and easly seene to be imprinted in them by certaine of their answers, as in that which Pædaretus said on a time, being left out of the election of the number of the three hundred. Who departing home to his house mery and iocond as might be, said: It did him good to see there were three hundred found better in the citie than himselfe. Pisistratidas also being sent ambassadour with certaine other to the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA, the PERSIAN lordes asked him, if they came of their owne desire, or whether they were sent from the whole state: if we obtaine, said he, it is from the state: if we be denied, then we come of our selues. And Argileonida the mother of Brasidas, asked some that went to visite her after they were returned home to LACEDÆMON from their iorney to AMPHIPOLIS, if her sonne died like a man, and a worthie SPARTAN. And they straight did commend him highly, saying: there was not left in all LACEDÆMON such a valiant man. She replied vnto them: Say not so, my friends, I pray you: for Brasidas was indeed a valiant man, but the country of LACONIA hath many moe yet valianter then he was. Now touching their Senate: Lycurgus was the first that erected it among them. The first that were therof, were Lycurgus chiefe aiders and assisters of that erection, as we haue declared before: but afterwards he ordained, that when any of those first should happen to die, they should choose in his place the most honest reported man in the citie, so he were three score yeere olde and aboue. This was the noblest glorie that could be among men, when a man bare the bell and prise, not that he was swiftest among the swift, nor strongest amongst the strong, but that he among the honest was honestest. He had the rewarde of his vertue, as for libertie to speake, soueraigne authoritie to gouerne, and princely power ouer the commonweale, the honour, the life, and the goods of the whole citizens: howbeit the election was made after this sort. The people first assembled in the market place, where there were some appointed and shut vp thereabout in a house, from whence they could neither see, nor be seene of those that were assembled, but only they might heare the noise which they made there. For the people by their crie and showte, did declare whom they did choose, and whom they did refuse of the competitours, as they vsed to shew their liking by the like crie in other things. The competitours were not brought in, and presented all together, but one after another in order, as by lot did fall out. He on whom the lot fell, passed through the middest of the assembly of the people, and said neuer a worde.

Pædaretus saying.

The manner of choosing the Senate in Sparta.

The people ſtraight that liked, made a crie or ſhowte alowde. The men appointed which were locked vp, had bookes or tables in which they wrote and noted the greatneſſe of the crie, and ſhowt the people made, as euery competitour paſſed by, not knowing nor ſeeing who he was. Theſe hidden men did onely ſet downe in their bookes, the firſt, the ſecond, the third, and ſo many more, as by ſhowtes and cries they perceiued did paſſe thus through the aſſemblie. They noted alſo in their ſaid bookes, which of theſe had the greateſt crie and ſhowte of people at their paſſing thorough: and him they came and declared to be Senatour choſen. Then he wearing a garland of flowers on his head, went to all the temples of the goddes in the citie to giue thankes, hauing a great traine of young men following, and prayſing of his vertues. There went alſo with him a maruellous company of women ſinging ſonges of his praiſe, and how bleſſed he was, that he had liued ſo vertuouſly. Then euery one of his kinne prepared a bancket for him at home at their houſes, and as he entred the houſe, they ſaide vnto him: The citie honoureth thee with this bancket. That done, he repaired afterwards to the ordinarie place of their eating, where he did in all things as he was accuſtomed, ſauing he was ſerued nowe at his table with a double allowance, whereof he reſerued the one. After ſupper, all his kinſe women ſtood in the entrie of the hall where they had eaten: ſo he called her whom he loued beſt, and gaue her his allowance he had ſaued, and ſaid to her: This was giuen me in token I was this day rewarded for my vertue: and euen ſo I giue it thee for a like token of rewarde for thy vertue. Then was ſhe brought home by all the women there to her houſe, euen in like ſorte as he was by the men. Touching burials, Lycurgus made a wiſe order: For firſt of all, to cut off all ſuperſtition of burying places, he commaunded they ſhould burie their dead within the citie, and that their graues ſhould be round about their temples, that young perſons might haue them alwaies in their eyes, and not be affraide to ſee a dead body, as if to touche a coarſe, or to paſſe by their graues, it ſhould defile a man. Then did he forbid them to burie any thing with the coarſe, and willed they ſhould only lappe it vp in a redde clothe, with oliue leaues. It was not lawfull to graue the name of any dead body vpon his graue, but onely of ſuch a man as died in the warres, or of ſome holy woman profeſſed into their temples. Furthermore, the time appointed to mourne in, was very ſhorte. For it laſted not but a eleuen dayes, and on the twelft day, they muſt doe ſacrifice to Proſerpina, and ſo leaue off their mourning. To conclude, he left nothing idle, or vnworking in his citizens: for to all neceſſarie things which men can not lacke, Lycurgus ioyned euer a certaine emulation of men. As to deſire vertue, and to contemne vice: and furniſhed his citie with many good precepts and examples, among which his citizens being ſtill borne and bred vp, and hauing the ſame in euery place before their eyes where they went, they came to paſſe in time to be framed after the very patterne and mould of vertue it ſelfe. For this cauſe he did not ſuffer any to trauell out of the countrie, or to goe abroade as he would, without ſpeciall licence, for feare leaſt thoſe which trauelled abroad for their pleaſure, ſhould bring home ſtrange faſhions and manners, and a corrupt diſordered life, which by litle and litle might get away, and bring an alteration and change of the whole ſtate. Furthermore, he kept out of SPARTA all ſtrangers, except thoſe which had neceſſarie buſineſſe there, or were come thither for ſome profit to the countrie: not that he was affraide they ſhould learne ſomething whereby to loue vertue, or that they ſhould deſire to follow his faſhion and manner of gouernement as Thucydides was: but rather fearing they ſhould teach his citizens ſome naughtie manners, or ſome ill fauoued vice. For it muſt needs be, that ſtrangers bring euer ſtraunge and new deuiſes with them: which new deuiſes bring with them alſo new opinions: and new opinions beget new affections and mindes, that many times are repugnant to the lawe, and to the forme of the common weale eſtabliſhed before, as diſcordes doe many times in an harmonie of muſicke, that before agreed very well together. Therefore he iudged it a thing moſt neceſſarie, to keepe his citie free and ſafe from counterfaiting of any ſtrangers maners or faſhions, that were commonly as perſons infected with ſome contagious ſickneſſe. Now in all we haue ſpoken before, euen to this place, there is no maner of token or ſhew of iniuſtice, or lacke of equitie, wherewith ſome ſeeme to burden Lycurgus in his lawes: by ſaying they were well made, to make men warlike and valiant, but not to be iuſt or righteous. But concerning the law they call Cryptia, as much to ſay, as their ſecret: if it were of Lycurgus curgus institution, as Aristotle saieth, it might haue caried Plato into the like opinion that Lycurgus had of his common weale. This was the lawe: The gouernours which had the charge and ouersight of the young men, at certaine appointed times, did chooſe out thoſe they thought to haue the beſt diſcretion, and ſent them abroade into the countrie, ſome one waye, ſome another way, who caried with them daggers, and ſome prouiſion to feede them. Theſe young men being thus diſperſed abroade in the countrie, did hide themſelues all the day cloſe in ſecret places, and there they lay and tooke their reſt: afterwards when night was come, they went to ſeeke out the high wayes, and killed the firſt of the Ilotes that they met. Sometimes euen in the broad day, they went into the countrie to kill the ſtrongeſt and ſtowteſt of them: as Thucydides telleth in his hiſtorie of the warres of Peloponnesvs, where he ſaith. That a certaine conuenient number of the Ilotes were crowned, by a publicke proclamation of the Spartans: and being infranchiſed, for their good ſeruices they had done the common weale, they were carried to all the temples of the goddes for an honour. Within a while after, no man knew what was become of them, being about two thouſand in number: ſo that neuer man heard tell neither then nor ſince, how they came to their deaths. Howbeit Ariſtotle aboue all others ſaith, that the Ephores, ſo ſoone as they were placed in their offices, made warres with the Ilotes, becauſe they might lawfully kill them. And it is true, that in other things they did handle them very hardly. For they forced them ſometimes to drinke wine without water out of meaſure, till they had made them ſtarke drunke. Then they brought them all into their common halles where they did eate, to make their children to beholde them, and to ſee what beaſtlineſſe it was for a man to be drunke. Likewiſe they made them ſing ſongs, and daunce daunces, vnfit for honeſt men, and ſuch as were full of deriſion and mockerie, and did forbid them expreſſely to ſing any honeſt ſongs. So it is reported, that in the iourney the Thebans made to Laconia, many of the Ilotes were taken priſoners thereat, and when they were commaunded to ſing the verſes of Terpander, or of Alcman, or of Spendon the Laconian, they would not doe it: ſaying, they durſt not ſing them for their maiſters. Wherefore he that firſt ſaid in the countrie of Lacedæmonia, he that is free is more free, and he that is bonde, is more bonde then in other places: knew very well the diuerſitie betweene the libertie and bondage there, and the libertie and bondage of other countries. But in my opinion, the Lacedæmonians began to vſe theſe great outrages and cruelties, long time after the death of Lycurgus, and ſpecially ſince the great earthquake that happened at Sparta, at which time the Ilotes roſe againſt them with the Messenians, and did great miſchiefe through the countrie, and put the citie to the greateſt diſtreſſe and danger that euer it had. For I cannot be perſuaded, that euer Lycurgus inuented, or inſtituted, ſo wicked & miſchieuous an acte, as that kinde of ordinance was: becauſe I imagine his nature was gentle and mercifull, by the clemencie and iuſtice we ſee he vſed in all his other doings, and was witneſſed beſides by open oracle from the goddes, for a iuſt and wiſe man. Furthermore, they ſay of him, that when he ſaw the chiefeſt points of his gouernement had taken deepe roote, and that the forme of his commonweale went on, and was ſtrong enough to maintaine and keepe it ſelfe a foote, like as Plato ſaieth, that God reioyced greatly after he had made the worlde, and ſaw the ſame turne and moue his firſt mouing: euen ſo Lycurgus taking ſingular pleaſure and delight in his minde, to ſee his notable lawes put in vre, & ſo well eſtabliſhed and liked of by experience, ſought yet to make them immortall, as neere as he could poſſible, by any forecaſt of man, that no after time whatſoeuer, might chaunge or put them downe. To bring this to paſſe, he cauſed all the people to aſſemble, and tolde them he thought his ciuill pollicie and ſtate of commonweale was already ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, for vertuous and happy life: yet there was one matter behinde of greater importance then all the reſt, which he could not yet declare vnto them, vntill he had firſt asked counſell of the oracle of Apollo. And therefore in the meane time they ſhould keepe and obſerue his lawes and ordinances inuiolablie, without changing, remooving, or ſtaying any matter therein, vntill he were returned from the citie of Delphes, and then they ſhould doe that other thing behinde, if the God then ſo counſelled him. They all promiſed him to doe it, and prayed him to make haſt to go on his iourney. But before he departed, he made the kings and ſenatours ſweare firſt, and conſequently all the people after, that they would keepe his lawes and ordinances without changing or altering any thing, vntill he did return againe. This done, he went to the citie of DELPHES, where so soone as he arriued, he sacrificed in the temple to Apollo, and asked him: If the lawes he had made were good to make a man an happy life. Apollo made him answer, his lawes were very good, and that his citie keeping them, should be the most renowmed of the world. Lycurgus caused this oracle to be written, which he sent to SPARTA. After he sacrificed to Apollo againe: and then taking leaue of his friends, and of his sonne, he determined to die, because his citizens should neuer be released of the othe they had made betweene his hands. When he had this determination, he was come to the age, wherein a man hath strength enough to liue longer: and yet was olde enough also to die if he would. Wherefore finding himselfe happie to haue obteined his desire, he willingly pined himselfe to death, by abstinence, and lack of meate. For he thought it meete, that the very death of great personages should bring benefit euer to the common weale, and that the end of their life should be no more idle, or vnprofitable, then the rest of their life before: nay rather, that it was one of their most meritorious actes, to haue their death extolled for worthinesse. So he imagined, that his death would be the perfection and crowne of his felicitie, after he had made and ordained so many good and notable lawes, for the honour and benefit of his countrie: and should be as a seale of confirmation of his lawe, and the continuall preseruitour of this citie, considering all his citizens had swotne to keepe them all inuiolably, vntill he were returned. He was not deceiued of his hope, for his citie was the chiefest of the world, in glorie and honour of gouernment, by the space of fiue hundred yeeres. For so long his citie kept his lawes without any change or alteration by any of the Kings successours, vntill King Agis, the sonne of Archidamus began to raigne. For the creation of the Ephores, did not breake, nor discontinue any of the lawes of Lycurgus, but reduced them rather to a more straight and strickt order: although it seemed at the first that the Ephores were ordained, for the maintenance and defence of the libertie of the people, whereas in deed they did also strengthen the authoritie of the Kings and Senate. Nowe in the raigne of king Agis, golde and siluer began first to creepe in againe to the citie of SPARTA, by meanes of Lysander. With money there came in straight couetousnesse, and greedines to get and gather. And although Lysander was not desirous to get it, nor would be corrupted for any money: yet he brought riches and couetousnesse into the countrie, and filled the same with all fineneſse, by bringing in great store of golde and siluer from the warres, directly against the lawes and ordinances of Lycurgus. The which so long as they were in force and vse, it appeared that the gouernment of SPARTA seemed not to be a pollicy or commonweale, but rather a certaine holy place and order of religion. And euen as the Poets faine, that Hercules went through the world with his clubbe, and Lions skin, punishing cruell robbers, and vnnaturall tyrants: so in like case with a litle scroule of parchement, and a poore cape, did the SPARTANS commaund and giue lawes to all the rest of GREECE, euen with their good liking and consent. And they chased the tyrants away, which vsurped tyrannicall power ouer any of their cities, and did decide all controuersies, and oftentimes pacified their seditions, without sending out one souldier, but onely a simple poore ambassadour. At whose commaundement, the people presently assembled like the bees, which gather together about their King, so soone as they spie him: they did then so greatly reuerence the good gouernment & iustice of the SPARTANS. Therefore I can but wonder much at those which say, the citie of LACEDÆMON could obey well, but not commaund: and for proofe they alledge words of king Theopompus, who aunswered one which said, that SPARTA was maintained, because the Kings could commaund well. Nay the rather (said he) because the citizens can obey well. For men commonly disdaine to obey those, which are not wise in commaunding. So that the faithfull obedience of the subiects, dependeth much vpon the sufficient commandement of the wise prince. For he that directeth well, must needs be well obeyed. For like as the arte of a good rider, is to make his horse gentle, and ready at commaundement: euen so the chiefest point belonging to a prince, is to teach his subiects to obey. Wherefore the LACEDÆMONIANS procured, that not onely other people did willingly obey them, but also desired to be ruled, and commanded by them. For they asked them, neither shippes nor money, nor yet did send them any number of men of warre to compell them, but onely they sent one citizen of SPARTA to gouerne them, to whom all the other people submitted themselues, and were holpen by him in their necessitie, as fearing and reuerencing him. In this wise the SICILIANS were holpen by Gylippus, the CHALCIDIANS by Brasidas, and all the GRECIANS inhabiting ASIA, by Lysander, Callicratidas, and by Agesilaus, who were called the reformers and directers of princes, peoples, and Kings, vnto whom they were sent here and there: but euer they had their eye vpon the citie of SPARTA, as vpon the most prefect patterne to order mans life by, and to gouerne a common weale after. To this effect tended the mery word spoken in iest by Stratonicus: Who said he did order the ATHENIANS to tend their sacrifices, and the ELIANS to tend their games: and if they made any fault therein, the LACEDÆMONIANS should be well whipped. That was merily spoken, and in a iesting manner. But Antisthenes (the philosopher and one of Socrates scholers) seeing the THEBANS growen very hawty & glorious, after that they had conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS in the iorney of LEVCTRES: me thinketh said he, these THEBANS here do like the schoole boyes, which bragge and reioyce when they haue a little beaten their master. But this was not Lycurgus meaning, to haue his citie to commaunde many. But he thought the felicitie of a citie, as of a priuate man, consisted chiefly in the exercise of vertue, and in the vnitie of the inhabitantes thereof. He framed his common wealth to this ende, that his citizens should be nobly minded, content with their owne, and temperate in their doings, that thereby they might maintaine and keepe themselues long in safetie. The selfe same intention had Plato, Diogenes, and Zenon, in setting forth their bookes, which they wrote of the gouernment of common weales: and so had likewise many other great and learned men which haue written of the same matter. Howbeit they onely left behind them, wordes, and written books: but Lucurgus contrariwise, left no written books nor pamphlets, but stablished and left behind him, a royall forme of gouernment, which no man euer before had inuented, nor neuer after could be followed. He hath made them plainely see, a whole citie liue together, and gouerne it selfe philosophically, according to the true rules and preceptes of perfect wisedome: which imagined that true wisdome was a thing hanging in the aire, and could not visibly be seene in the world. Whereby he hath worthily excelled in glorie all those, which euer tooke vpon them to write or stablish the gouernement of a common weale. And therefore sayth Aristotle, that after his death they did him lesse honour in LACEDÆMONIA, then he had deserued: albeit they did him all the honour they possibly could deuise. And yet they built a temple for him, and made solemne sacrifice to him euery yeare, as vnto a god. More, they say, that when the ashes of his bodie were brought to SPARTA, there fell straight lightning vpon his tombe where they were put which they had not often seene to happen, to other men of name after their decease, sauing only to the poet Euripides, who dying in MACEDONIA, was buried neere the citie of ARETHVSA. The which is some manifest argument, for such as loue the Poet, to lay against those which somewhat depraue him, seeing this signe came to him after his death, which had happened before to a most well beloued man of the goddes. Some say Lycurgus died in the citie of CIRRHA. But Apollothemis sayth, he dyed in ELIDA. Timæus and Aristoxenus write, he ended his dayes in CRETA. And Aristoxenus sayth further, that those of the Ile of CRETA doe shewe his graue in the place which they call Pergamia, by the broad high wayes side. He left one onely begotten sonne named Antiorus, who died without issue, so that his house and name fayled with him. But his neere kinsmen and familiar friendes, did set vp a company or brotherhood in memorie of him, which continued a long time: and the dayes wherein they assembled, were called the Lycurgides. There is another Aristocrates (the sonne of Hipparchus) who sayth, that hee being dead in CRETA, his friends burned his bodie, and afterwardes threw his ashes into the sea, according as he had prayed and requested them. For he feared, that if any part of him should at any time haue bene brought to SPARTA, the inhabitants would haue sayd he was returned againe, and thereby would haue thought themselues discharged of their oth, and might haue lawfully altered the lawes which he had appointed. And this is the discourse and end of Lycurgus life.

THE LIFE OF Numa Pompilius.

In what time Numa was. Cicero de Or. 2. & Tuscul. 4. Liu. Halic. li. 2.

THE Historiographers differ maruelously of the time, in which Numa Pompilius raigned king, albeit some wil deriue from him many noble houses descēded in ROME. For one Clodius, who wrote the booke intituled the table of time, affirmeth that the ancient registers of the citie of ROME were lost when it was taken & sacked by the GAVLES: and that those which are extant at this day be not true, but were only made by men desirous to gratifie some, which haue thrust in ancient houses and families of the first ROMAINES, that concerne nothing them whom they ment to represent. On the other side, although the common opinion be, that Numa was a familiar friend and scholler of Pythagoras the philosopher, yet some say he was neuer learned, nor had any knowledge at all in the Greeke tongue. And yet mainteining that it is possible enough, that he was so well borne, and had such perfection in all kind of vertue, that he neuer needed any master: & though he had neded, they had rather attribute the honour of the instructing of this king vnto some other forren person, that was more excellent then Pythagoras. Other say, that Pythagoras the philosopher was long time after the raigne of Numa, & well nigh fiue ages after him. Howbeit other say, there was another Pythagoras borne in SPARTA (who hauing wonne the ptyse of running at the games Olympicall, in the sixtenth Olympiade, & the third yeare of Numaes raigne) did come into ITALY, where he kept much about Numa, & did assist and helpe him in the gouerning & ordering of his Realme. By meanes whereof there be many customes yet of the LACONIANS, mingled with the ROMAINES, which this second Pythagoras was sayd to haue taught him. Neuertheless it is not confessed that Numa was borne of the SABYNES, which they say are descended from the LACEDÆMONIANS. So it falleth out very hard to agree certainly of the time when Numa was, and chiefly for such as will followe the rolle or table of those, which from Olympiades to Olympiades haue wonne the ptyses of games Olympicall: considering the rolle or table that they haue at this present, was very lately published by one Hippias an Elian, who deliuereth no reason or argument of necessitie, why it should be taken for an vndoubted trothe, which he in that sort hath gathered. Yet we will not leaue to put in writing those things worthy of memory which we could gather by any meanes of king Numa, beginning at that place which we thought to be meeteſt. It was now ſince ROME was built, ſeuen and thirtie yeares (for ſo long time raigned Romulus) whē Romulus the fifth of the month of Iuly (which they call the Nones of the goates) made a ſolemne ſacrifice without the citie, neere to a certaine place cōmonly called, the goat marſh. As all the whole Senate, with the moſt part of the people were preſent at this ſacrifice, ſodainely there roſe in the ayre a very great tempeſt, and a maruellous darke thicke cloud, which fell on the earth with ſuch boyſterous windes, ſtormes, lightnings, and thunder: that the poore cōmon people being affrayd of ſo ſore a tempeſt, diſperſed themſelues ſodainly, running here and there for ſuccour, and therewithall king Romulus vaniſhed away in ſuch ſort, that he was neuer after ſeene aliue nor dead. This brought the Senators & noble men whom they called Patricians, into great ſuſpition. And there ranne a foule tale among the common people, how they had long time borne very impatiently to be ſubiects to a King, becauſe themſelues would haue had and taken vpon them ſome ſoueraign authoritie, and that for this cauſe they had killed king Romulus. Adding ſomewhat more vnto it, how a litle before he had vſed them more roughly, and cōmanded them more ſtraightly then he was wont or accuſtomed. Neuertheleſſe they found the meanes to quench all theſe brutes & murmurings, by doing diuine honour and ſacrifice vnto him, as one not dead, but paſſed to a better life. To confirme this, one of the nobleſt men among them called Proclus came in, and by oth, affirmed before all the people, that he ſaw Romulus aſcending vp into heauen, armed at all peeces, and that he heard a voyce ſay: from thenceforth call him Quirinus. This being thus appeaſed, there ſprange vp another trouble, to know whom they ſhould chooſe in his place. For the ſtrangers which were come then frō other places to dwel in ROME, were not yet throughly ioyned to the naturall borne ROMAINES: in ſo much, as the common people did not only wauer, and ſtagger vp and downe in opinion, but the Senators alſo (that were many and of diuers nations) did enter into a ſuſpition one of another. Theſe things notwithſtanding they all agreed in this, that of neceſſitie they muſt chooſe a King: howbeit in the reſt they differed much, not only whō they ſhould chooſe, but alſo of what nation he ſhould be. For thoſe which were the firſt founders & builders of the citie of ROME with Romulus could in no wiſe abide, nor ſuffer that the SABYNES (to whom they had diuided part of their landes, and a moytie of their citie) ſhould attempt and preſume to commaund them, whom they did receiue and aſſociate into their companie and fellowſhip. The SABYNES alledged on the other ſide for them, a good reaſon, and ſuch as caried great probabilitie. Which was, that neuer ſince the death of their king Tatius, they neither had in any thing diſobeyed nor diſquieted king Romulus, but had ſuffered him to raigne peaceably: and therefore Romulus being nowe deceaſed, reaſon would that the new King ſhould be choſen of their nation. And that albeit the ROMAINES had receiued them into their citie, they could not ſay therfore, that in time of this aſſociation, they were leſſe to be reckoned of in any thing, than themſelues. Further they added, that in ioyning with them, the ROMAINES had doubly increaſed their might and power, and had made a bodie of a people, which deſerued the honour and title of a citie. Theſe were the cauſes of their contention. But to preuent that of this contention there might grow no confuſion in the citie, if it ſhould remaine without an head to commaund: the Senators which were a hundred and fiftie in number, gaue counſell that euery one of them by turnes, one after another, ſhould carie the royall ſtate of the king, and all the ſhowes and ornaments of his maieſtie, and ſhould doe the ordinarie ſacrifices of the king, and diſpatch all cauſes ſixe houres in the day, and ſixe houres in the night, as the king before had vſed. Thus they thought it beſt to deuide the rule, that one might haue aſmuch power as the other, aſwell in reſpect of themſelues, as alſo for regarde of the people. For they imagined, that the chaunging and remouing thus of this regall dignitie, and paſſing it from man to man, would cleane take away enuie among them, and make euery of them to rule temperately, and vprightly ſee, that in one, and the ſelfe ſame day and night, euery of them ſhould be a King and priuate perſon alſo. The ROMAINES call this manner of regiment in vacation, Interregnum: as you would ſay, rule for the time. Now albeit their gouernement was very modeſt and ciuill, yet they could not for all that keepe themſelues from falling into the ſuſpition, and ſlaunder of the people: who

gaue it out straight, that this was a fine deuise of theirs, to chaunge by this meanes the rule of the Realme into a few noble mens handes, to the ende that the whole authoritie and gouernement of all publique causes, should remaine still in them selues, because it grieued them to be subiect to a King. And in the ende, the two partes of the citie came to this agreement: that the one part should choose one of the bodie of the other, to be the King. This course they liked very well, aswell for the pacification of present sturre and dissention amongst them selues, as for procuring equalitie of affection, and sturring vp a likenesse of goodwill in the King that thus indifferently should be chosen: whereby he should loue the one part for that they had chosen him, and likewise the other part for that he was of their Nation. The SABYNES were the first, which referred the election to the ROMAINES choyse: and the ROMAINES thought it better to choose one of the Nation of the SABYNES, then to haue a ROMAINE chosen by the SABYNES. After they had consulted, they determined amongst them selues: and did choose Numa Pompilius one of the bodie of the SABYNES to be King, who was none of the number of them which came to dwell at ROME, howbeit hee was a man so famous for his vertue, that the SABYNES so soone as they named him, did receiue him more willingly, then they who had chosen him. After they had thus published their election, the first and chiefest persons of the one and the other side, were chosen out to goe vnto him. Now Numa Pompilius was borne in one of the chiefest and best cities which the SABYNES had, called Cures, whereuppon the ROMAINES, and their fellowes the SABYNES were called afterwards Quirites, and he was the sonne of Pomponius a noble man, the youngest of foure brethren: being by the secret working of the goddes, borne on the very day, on the which ROME was first founded by Romulus, which was the one and twentieth day of Aprill. This man being naturally giuen and inclined vnto all vertue, did yet increase the same, by studie, and all kind of good discipline: and by the exercise thereof, and of true patience, and right philosophie, he did maruellously adorne himselfe and his manners. For hee did not onely cleare his soule, and minde, of all passions and vices commonly vsed in the world: but he conquered in himselfe all heates, violence, & couetousnesse. And would neither seeke nor vsurpe, that which was an other mans, a thing at that time honored among the most barbarous people: but thought that to be the true, and right victorie in man, first to conquer and commaund himselfe by iudgement and reason, and then to subdue all couetousnes and greedines. Hauing therefore this opinion, he would in no wise haue in his house any superfluitie or fineneſſe. He became to euery man that would employ him (aswell straunger as his owne countrie man) a wise counsaillour, and an vpright iudge. He bestowed his leasure, not to follow his owne delight, or to gather goods together: but to serue the goddes, & to behold their celestiall nature and power, as much as mans reason and vnderstanding could comprehend. Therby he got so great a name and reputation, that Tatius (which was king of ROME with Romulus) hauing but one onely daughter called Tatia, made him his sonne in law. Howbeit this mariage put him in no such iolitie, that he would dwel at ROME with his father in law, but rather kept at home at his owne house in the countrie of the SABYNES, there to serue and cherish his olde father with his wife Tatia: who for her part also liked better, to liue quietly with her husband being a priuate man, then to go to ROME where she might haue liued in much honour and glory, by meanes of the King her father. She died as it is reported, 13. yeares after she was maried. After her death, Numa leauing to dwell in the citie, was better contented to liue in the country alone, and solitarie, & gaue himselfe to walke much in the fields and woods consecrated to the gods, as one desirous to leade alone life, farre from the companie of men. Whereupon was raised (in my opinion) that which is spoken of him, and of the goddesse Egeria. That it was not for any strangenesse, or melancholines of nature, that Numa withdrew himself from the conuersation and company of men, but because he had found another more honorable and holy societie of the Nymph, and goddesse Egeria, who had done him, as they say, that honour, as to make him her husbande: with whom as his beloued darling it is saide he enioyed happie dayes, and by daily frequenting of her company, he was inspired with the loue and knowledge of all celestiall things. Surely, these deuises are much like vnto certaine old fables of the Phrygians, which they, hauing learned from the father to the sonne, do loue to tell of one Atis: of the Bithynians, of one Herodotus: of the ARCADIANS, of one Endymion: and of many other such like men, who in their liues were taken for saints, and beloued of the goddes. Notwithstanding, it is likely, that the goddes loue neither birdes, nor horse, but men, and haue sometimes a liking to be familiar with perfect good men, and doe not disdaine sometime the conuersation of such as be holy, religious, and deuout. But to beleeue the goddes haue carnall knowledge, and doe delight in the outward beauty of creatures, that seemeth to carie a very hard beliefe. Yet the wise EGYPTIANS thinke it probable enough and likely, that the spirit of the goddes hath giuen originall of generation to women, and doe beget fruit of their bodies: howbeit they hold that a man can haue no corporall company with any diuine nature. Wherein they doe not consider, that euery thing that ioyneth together, doth deliuer againe a like substaunce, to that wherewith it was ioyned. This notwithstanding, it is meete we should beleeue the gods beare good will to men, and that of it doth spring their loue, whereby men say the gods loue those whose manners they purifie and inspire with vertue. And they doe not offend, which faine that Phorbas, Hyacinthus and Admetus, were sometimes the louers of Apollo; and also Hippolytus the SICYONIAN: of whom they report, that euer when he passed ouer the arme of the sea which lieth betweene the cities of SICYONA, and of CERRHA; the god which knew he came, reioyced, and caused Pythia the prophetesse to pronounce these heroycall verses.

Who are beloued of the goddes.

It is sayd also that Pan was in loue with Pindarus and his verses, and that the goddes honored the poets Hesiodus, and Archilocus, after their death by the Muses. They say moreouer, that AEsculapius lay with Sophocles in his life time, and at this day they doe yet show many tokens thereof: and after his death, another god (as it is reported) made him to be honorably buried. Now if they graunt, that such things may be true: how can we refuse to beleeue, that some goddes haue bene familiar with Zaleucus, Minos, Zoroastres, Lycurgus, Numa, and such other like personages, which haue gouerned kingdoms, and stablished common weales: and it is not vnlike that the goddes in deede did company with them, to inspire and teach them many notable things, and that they did draw neare vnto these Poets and plaiers of the harpe, that made and played many dolefull and ioyfull ditties, at the least for their sport and pleasure onely, if euer they came neare them. Neuertheless if any man be of other opinion, the way is open and large as Bacchylides sayd, to thinke and say as he lust. For my selfe I doe finde, that which is written of Lycurgus, Numa, and other such persons, not to be without likelyhood and probability: who hauing to gouerne rude, churlish, and stiffe necked people, and purposing to bring in straunge nouelties into the gouernments of their countreis, did faine wisely to haue conference with the gods, considering this fayning fell to be profitable and beneficiall to those them selues, whom they made to beleeue the same. But to returne to our history. Numa was forty yeares old, when the ambassadours of ROME were sent to present the kingdome vnto him, and to intreat him to accept thereof. Proclus, and Velesus, were the ambassadours that were sent. One of the which the people looked should haue bene chosen for King, because those of Romulus side, did fauour much Proclus: and those of Tatius part fauoured Velesus. Now they vsed no long speach vnto him, because they thought he would haue bene glad of such a great good fortune. But contrarily it was in deede a very hard thing, and required great perswasions, and much intreaty, to moue a man which had alwaies liued quietly, and at ease, to accept the regiment of a citty, which as a man would say, had bene raised vp and growen by warres, and martiall deedes. Wherefore he aunswered them in the presence of his father, and one other of his kinsemen called Martius in this sort. Change and alteration of mans life is euer dangerous: but for him that lacketh nothing necessary, nor hath cause to complain of his present state, it is a great folly to leaue his old acquainted trade of life, and to enter into another new and vnknowen, if there were no other but this only respect: that he leaueth a certainety, to venter vppon vncertainty. Howbeit there is further matter in this, that the dagers & perils of this kingdom which they offer me, are not altogether vncertain, if we will looke back what happened vnto Romulus. Who was not vnsuspected to haue laid wait, to haue had Tatius his fellow & companion murdered: & now after Romulus death, the Senators selues are mistrusted to haue killed him on the other side by treason. And yet they say it, and sing it euery where: that Romulus was the sonne of a God, that at his birth he was miraculously preserued, and afterwardes he was as incredibly brought vp. Whereas for my owne part, I doe confesse, I was begotten by a mortall man, and was fostered, brought vp, and taught by men as you know: and these few qualities which they praise and commend in me, are conditions far vnmeete for a man that is to raigne. I euer loued a solitarie life, quiet and study, and did exempt my selfe from worldly causes. All my life time I haue sought and loued peace aboue all thinges, and neuer had to doe with any warres. My conuersation hath bene to company with men, which meete only to serue and honor the goddes, or to laugh and be merry one with another, or els to spend their time in their priuate affaires, or otherwise sometime to attend their pastures, and feeding of their cattell. Whereas Romulus (my ROMAINE lords) hath left you many warres begonne, which peraduenture you could be contented to spare: yet now to maintaine the same, your city had needs of a martiall King, actiue, and strong of body. Your people moreouer, through long custome, and the great increase they are giuen vnto by feates of armes, desire nought else perhappes but warres: and it is plainely seene, they seeke still to grow, and commaund their neighbours. So that if there were no other consideration in it, yet were it a meere mockerie for me, to goe to teach a city at this present to serue the goddes, to loue iustice, to hate warres, and to flie violence: when it rather hath needs of a conquering captaine, then of a peaceable King. These and such other like reasons and perswasions Numa alledged, to discharge himselfe of the Kingdome which they offered him. Howbeit the ambassadours of the ROMAINES most humbly besought and praied him with all instance possible, that he would not be the cause of another new stur, and commotion among them, seeing both parts in the city haue giuen their consent and liking to him alone, and none other to be their King. Moreouer, when the ambassadours had left him vpon this suite, his father, and Martius his kinseman, beganne also priuately to perswade him, that he should not refuse so good and godly an offer. And albeit he was contented with his present state, and desired to be no richer then he was, nor coueted no princely honour nor glory, because he sought only most famous vertue: yet hee must needes thinke, that to rule well, was to doe the goddes good seruice, whose will it was to employ the iustice they knew in him, and not to suffer it to be idle. Refuse not therefore (q they) this royall dignity, which to a graue and wise man is a goodly field, to bring forth many commendable works & fruits. There you may doe noble seruice to the goddes, to humble the hearts of these martiall people, and to bring them to be holy and religious: for they readely turne, and easely conforme them selues vnto the nature of their prince. They dearely loued Tatius, although he was a straunger: they haue consecrated a memory to Romulus with diuine honours, which they make vnto him at this day. And it may be, that the people seeing them selues conquerers, will be full enough of warres: and the ROMAINES being now full of spoiles and triumphes, will be glad to haue a gentle prince, and one that loueth iustice, that they may thenceforth liue in peace, vnder good and holy lawes. And yet if it be otherwise, that their hearts be still full of heate and furie to fight: is it not better to turne this their desire to make warres some other way, when a man hath the bridle in his owne handes to doe it, and to be a meane in the meane time to ioyne the countrey, and all the nations of the SABINES in perpetuall loue and amity, with so mighty and florishing a city? besides all these perswasions and reasons, there were many signes also (as they say) which promised him good lucke, together with the earnest affection and liking of his owne countrey citizens. Who, so soone as they vnderstood the comming & commission of the ambassadours of ROME, they importunately desired him to goe thither, and to accept the offer of the Kingdome: that he might more straightly vnite and incorporate them together with the ROMAINES. Whereupon, Numa accepted the Kingdome. Then after he had done sacrifice to the goddes, he set forwards on his iourney towardes ROME: where the people and Senate went out to meete him, with a wonderfull desire to see him. The women at his entry, went blessing of him, and singing of his praises. They did sacrifice for him, in all the temples of the goddes. There was neither man nor woman but seemed to be as ioyfull and glad: as if a new Realme, and not a new King, had beene come to the citty of ROME. Thus was he brought with this open ioy, and

and reioycing, vnto the market place, where one of the Senatours, which at that time was regent, called Spurius Vettius, made them pronounce his open election: and so by one consent he was chosen King, with all the voyces of the people. Then were brought vnto him the tokens of honour and dignity of the King. But he himselfe commaunded they should be staid a while, saying: He must first be confirmed King by the gods. Then he tooke the wise men & priests, with whom he went vp into the Capitoll, which that time was yet called mount Tarpeian. And there, the chiefest of the foothsayers called Augures, turned him towardes the south, hauing his face couered with a vaile, and stood behinde him, laying his right hand vpon his head, and praying to the gods that it would please them to declare their willes by flying of birdes, or some other token concerning this election: and so the soothsayer cast his eyes all about, as farre as he could possibly discerne. During all this time there was a maruellous silence in the market place, although then an infinite number of people were assembled there together, attending with great deuotion what the issue of this diuinatiō would be: vntill there appeared vnto them on the right hand, good and lucky birdes, which did confirme the election. Then Numa putting on his regall robes, came downe from mount Tarpeian, into the market place, where all the people receiued him with wonderfull shoutes of ioy, as a man the most holy, and best beloued of the goddes that they could haue chosen. So hauing taken the royall seate of the Kingdome, his first act was this. That he discharged the guard of the three hundred souldiers, which Romulus had alwaies about his person, called Celeres: saying he would not mistrust them which trusted him, neither would he be King ouer people, which should mistrust him. His second act was, that he did adde to the two priests of Iupiter & Mars, a third, in the honour of Romulus, who was called Flamen Quirinalis. For the auncient ROMAINES also called their priests, instituted in the old time, Flamines, by reason of certaine litle narrowe hats which they did weare on their heads, as if they had called them Pilamines: for Pilos in Greeke signifieth a hat. And at that time (as they say) there were many mo Greeke wordes mingled with the Latine, then there are at this day. For they called the mantles the Kings did weare Lænas. And Iuba saith, that it is the very same which the GRECIANS call Chlænas, and that the young boy which was a seruant in the temple of Iupiter, was called Camillus, as some of the GRECIANS doe yet call the god Mercurie, because hee is seruaunt of the gods. Now Numa hauing done these things at his first entrie into his Kingdome, still to winne further fauour and good will of the people; beganne immedialy to frame his citizens to a certaine ciuility, being as iron wrought to softnes, and brought them from their violent and warlike desires, to temperate and ciuill manners. For out of doubt, ROME was properly that, which Plato ascribeth to a city full of trouble and pride. For, first it was founded by the most couragious and warlike men of the world, which from all parts were gathered there together, in a most desperate boldnes: and afterwards it increased, and grew strong, by armes and continuall warres, like as piles driuen into the ground, which the more they are rammed in, the further they enter, and sticke the faster. Wherfore Numa iudging it no small nor light enterprise, to plucke downe the haughty stomacks of so fierce and violent a people, and to frame them vnto a sober and quiet life: did seeme to worke it by meanes of the goddes, with drawing them on thereto by litle and litle, and pacifying of their whot and fierce courages to fight, with sacrifices, feastes, dauncings, and common processions, wherein he celebrated euer himselfe. In the which together with their deuotion, there was mingled now and then, pastime and pleasure: and sometimes he laid the terrour and feare of the goddes before their eyes, making them beleeue that he had seene straunge visions, or that he had heard voyces, by which the goddes did threaten them with some great troubles and plagues, alwaies to pull downe and humble their hearts, vnto the feare of the goddes. This was the cause why they thought afterwardes that he had learned his wisedome of Pythagoras the Philosopher: because the greatest part of the philosophy of the one, and of the gouernment of the other, consisted in such ceremonies, and diuine studies. They report also that Numa did put on the outward show and semblaunce of Pythagoras holinesse, as following his intention and example. For Pythagoras as they say, made an Eagle so tame and gentle, that she would stoupe, and come downe to him by certaine voices, as she flew in the aire ouer his head. And that

Numa and Pythagoras institutions much a like.

passing through the assembly of the games Olympicall, he shewed her thigh of gold, & many other pretty feats and deedes they tell of, which seemed to be wonderfull, and for which Timon Phliasian hath written these verses of him:

Pythagoras which loued to dwell in dignity, and had an heart to glory bent, and past in pollicy, Much like a man which sought, by charming to enchaunt, did vse this art, to winne mens mindes, which vnto him did haunt,
His graue and pleasaunt tongue, in sugred speach did flow, whereby he drew most mindes of men, to bent of his owne bow.

Euen so the fained fable of Numa, which he so cunningly disguised, was about the loue of a goddesse, or some Nymphe of the mountaine: with whom he seemed to haue certaine secret meetings and talke, whereof we haue spoken before. And it is sayed he much frequented the Muses in the woddes. For he would say, he had the most part of his reuelations of the Muses, and he taught the ROMAINS to reuerence one of them aboue all the rest, who was called Tacita, as ye would say, Lady silence. It seemeth he inuented this, after the example of Pythagoras, who did so specially commaund, and recommend silence vnto his schollers. Againe, if we consider what Numa ordained concerning images, and the representation of the goddes, it is altogether agreable vnto the doctrine of Pythagoras: who thought that God was neither sensible, nor mortall, but inuisible, incorruptible, and only intelligible. And Numa did forbid the ROMAINES also to beleeue, that God had euer forme, or likenesse of beast or man. So that in those former times, there was in ROME no image of God, either painted or grauen: and it was from the beginning a hundred three score and ten yeares, that they had built temples & chappels vnto the gods in ROME, and yet there was neither picture nor image of God within the. For they tooke it at the first for a sacrilege, to present heauenly things by earthly formes, seeing we cannot possibly any way attaine to the knowledge of God, but in minde and vnderstanding. The very sacrifices which Numa ordained, were altogether agreable, and like vnto the manner of seruing of the gods, which the Pythagorians vsed. For in their sacrifices they spilt not the bloud, but they did theirs commonly, with a litle meale, a litle sheading of wine and milke, and with such other light things. Such as affirme that those two men did much company and were familiar together, do laie further proofes and arguments for the same. The first is this: that the ROMAINES did make Pythagoras a free man of the city of ROME, as Epicharmus the Comicall poet an auncient writer (and sometimes one of Pythagoras schollers) saith in a book he wrote and dedicated vnto Antenor. The other proofe is: That Numa hauing had foure children, called one of them Mamercus, after Pythagoras sonnes name, from whom they say is discended, the house of the AEmilians, which is the noblest of the Patricians: for the King gaue him the surname of AEmilius, because of his sweet tongue and pleasant voice. Furthermore, I my selfe haue heard say many times in ROME, that the ROMAINES hauing receiued an oracle, which commanded them to set vp images in their city, to the wisest & valiantest man that euer was among the GRECIANS: caused two statues of brasse to be set vp in their market place, the one of Pythagoras, and the other of Alcibiades. Howbeit to striue about this matter any further, seeing there are so many doubtes: me thinketh it were but vaine. Moreouer, they attribute to Numa, the first erection of the colledge pontificall: and say he him selfe was the first Pontifex that euer was. But touching the name of Pontifex, some will say they were so called, because they chiefly were ordained & appointed for the seruice of the almighty: for this word Potens in the ROMAINE tongue, betokeneth mighty. Other thinke this name was giuen to them by their founders, as to exempt persons out of the world: who enioyned them to do all the seruice and sacrifices to the goddes they could possibly, and yet notwithstanding, if they had any other law full let or impediment thereof, they were not straight condemned for omitting the same. Howbeit the most part doe bring out another deriuation of this name, wherein me thinkes there is litle reason. As that they should be called Pontifices, because they had the charge and maintenaunce of the bridge. For that which the GRECIANS call Gephyran, the LATINES call Pontem: that is, a bridge. And to say truely, the charges of repairing the bridge, belongeth to the Bishops: as well as the keeping of the most holy and vnchangeable ceremonies. For the ROMANES thought it not only a thing vnlawful, but tooke it for a most damnable and wicked act, to destroy or breake the bridge of wood, which was only ioyned together (as they say) with pinnes of wood, & without any iron at all, by the commandement of an olde oracle. But the stone bridge was built long time after the raigne of Numa, and in the time of the raigne of his nephew Martius. Now the first and chiefest of these bishops, which they call the great Pontifex, hath the place, authoritie, and dignitie of the high priest and maister of their pontificall lawe: who should be carefull, not onely about all publique sacrifices and ceremonies, but also about such as were priuate, and to see that no man priuately should breake the auncient ceremonies, nor bring in any new thing into religion, but rather euery man should be taught by him, how and after what sorte he should serue and honour the gods. Heraldo hath the keeping of the holy virgines which they call Vestales. For they do giue Numa the first foundation and consecrating of them, and the institution also of keeping the immortall fire, with honour and reuerence, which these virgines haue the charge of. Either for that he thought it meete to commit the substance of fire (being pure and cleane) vnto the custodie of cleane and vncorrupt maides: or els because he thought the nature of fire (which is barreh, and bringeth forth nothing) was fittest, and most proper vnto virgines. For in GREECE, where they kept continuall fire likewise (as in the temple of Apollo in DELPHES, and at ATHENS) the maidens do not keepe the same, but olde women which are past mariage. And if this fire chaunce to faile, as they say in ATHENS the holy lampe was put out in the time of the tyrannie of Aristion: and in the citie of DELPHES it was put out, when the temple of Apollo was burnt by the MEDES: and at ROME also, in the time of the warres that the ROMAINES had against king Mithridates: and in the time of the ciuill warres, when altar, fire, and all were burnt and consumed together: they say that it must not be lighted againe with other common fire, but must be made a new, with drawing cleane and pure flame from the beames of the sunne, and that they doe in this manner. They haue a hollowe vessell made of a peece of a triangle, hauing a corner right, and two sides alike: so that from all parts of his compasse and circumference, it falleth into one poinct. Then they set this vessell right against the beames of the sunne, so that the bright sunne beames come to assemble and gather together in the center of this vessell, where they doe pearce the aire so strongly, that they set it a fire: and when they put to it any drie matter or substance, the fire taketh it straight, because the beame of the sunne, by meanes of the reuerberation, putteth that drie matter into fire, and forceth it to flame. Some thinke that these Vestall virgines keepe no other thing, but this fire, which neuer goeth out. Other say, there are other holy things also, which no body may lawfully see but they: whereof we haue written more largely in the life of Camillus, at the least so much as may be learned and tolde. The first maidens which were vowed and put into this order of religion by Numa, were (as they say) Geganie, and Verenia: and after them, Canuleia and Tarpeia. Afterwards king Seruius increased the number with two other, and that number of foure continueth vntill this day. Their rule & order set downe by king Numa was this: that they should vowe chastitie for the space of thirtie yeares. In the first ten yeares they learne what they haue to doe: the next ten yeares following, they doe that which they haue learned: and the last ten yeares, they teach young nouices. After they haue passed their thirtie yeares, they may lawfully marie if they be disposed, and take them to another manner of life, and leaue their religion. But as it is reported, there haue bene very few of them which haue taken this libertie, and fewer also which haue ioyed after they were professed, but rather haue repented themselues, and liued euer after a very grieuous and sorowfull life. This did so fraye the other Vestalls, that they were better contented with their vowed chastitie: and so remained virgines, vntill they were olde, or els dyed. He gaue them also great priuiledges, and prerogatiues. As: to make their will and testament, in their fathers life time. To doe all things without any gardian or ouerseer, as women which haue three children at a birth. When they goe abroade, they carie maces before them to honour them. And if by chaunce they meete any offendour in their way, going to execution, they saue his life: howbeit the professed Vestall must affirme by othe, that she met him vnwares, & not of set purpose. If any man presume vnder their chaire, whereupon they are caried through the citie, he shall die for it. Also when they themselues do any faulte, they are corrected by the great bishop, who sometimes doth whip them naked (according to the nature and qualitie of their offence) in a darke place, and vnder a curten. But she that hath deflowred her virginity, is buried quick by one of the gates of the citie, which they call Collina gate: where within the citie there is a mount of earth of a good length, and with the LATINES is said to be raised. Vnder this forced mount, they make a litle hollow vawte, and leaue a hole open, whereby one may go downe: and within it there is set a litle bed, a burning lampe, & some victuals to sustaine life withall. As a litle bread, a litle water, a litle milke, and a litle oyle, and that for honours sake: to the ende they would not be thought to famish a body to death, which had bene consecrated by the most holy and deuoute ceremonies of the world. This done, they take the offender, and put her into a litter, which they couer strongly, and close it vp with thick leather in such sorte, that no body can so much as heare her voyce, and so they carie her thus shut vp through the market place. Euery one draweth back, when they see this litter a faire off, and do giue it place to passe by: and then follow it mourningly with heauy lookes, & speake neuer a word. They do nothing in the citie more fearefull to behold, then this: neither is there any day wherein the people are more sorowfull, then on such a day. Then after she is come to the place of this vawte, the sergeants straight vnlose these fast bound couerings: and the chiefe bishop after he hath made certaine secret prayers vnto the gods, and lift his handes vp to heauen, taketh out of the litter the condemned Vestall muffled vp close, and so putteth her vpon the ladder, which conueyeth her downe into the vawte. That done, he withdraweth, and all the priests with him: and when the seely offendour is gone downe, they straight pluck vp the ladder, and cast abundance of earth in at the open hole, so that they fill it vp to the very top of the arche. And this is the punishment of the Vestalls which defile their virginitie. They thinke also it was Numa that built the round temple of the goddesse Vesta, in which is kept the euerlasting fire: meaning to represent not the forme of the earth, which they say is Vesta, but the figure of the whole world, in the middest whereof (according to the Pythagorians opinion) remaineth the proper seate and abiding place of fire, which they call Vesta, and name it the vnite. For they are of opinion, neither that the earth is vnmoueable, nor yet that it is set in the middest of the world, neither that the heauen goeth about it: but say to the contrarie, that the earth hanged in the ayre about the fire, as about the center thereof. Neither will they graunt, that the earth is one of the first and chiefest parts of the world: as Plato he like opinion in that age, that the earth was in another place then in the very middest, and that the center of the world, as the most honorablest place, did appertaine to some other of more worthy substance than the earth. Furthermore, the bishops office was to shewe those that needed to be taught, all the rites, manners, and customes of buriall: whome Numa taught not to beleeue that there was any corruption or dishonestie in burials, but rather it was to worship and honour the goddes of the earth, with vsuall and honourable ceremonies, as those which after their death receiue the chiefest seruice of vs that they can. But aboue all other in burials, they did specially honour the goddesse called Libitina, that is said, the chiefe gouernour and preseruer of the rites of the dead: or be it Proserpina, or Venus, as the most learned men among the ROMAINES do iudge, who not without cause do attribute the order of the beginning and end of mans life, to one selfe god, and power diuine. Numa ordained also, how long time euery body should mourne in blacke. And for a childe from three yeares to ten yeares of age, that dyed: he ordained they should mourne no more moneths then it had liued yeares, and not to adde a day more. For he commanded, that the longest time of mourning should be but ten moneths onely, and so long time at the least he willed women should remaine widdowes, after the decease of their husbands: or else she that would marie within that time, was bounde by his order to sacrifice a whole bullock. Numa also erected many other orders of priests: of two sortes whereof I will only make mention. The one shall be the order of the SALII, and the other of the FECIALES: for me thinkes, both the one and the other dooth manifestly shewe the great holinesse, and singular deuotion which he had in him. The FECIALES are properly those, which the GRECIANS call IRENOPHYLACES, as who would say, peace keepers. And in my iudgement, they had their right name according to their office, because they did pacifie quarels with reason by waye of order, and did not suffer (as much as in them laye) that any matter should be tried by violence, vntill they were past all hope of any peace. For the Grecians call it properly Irenen, when both parties agree, and decide their controuersie with reason, and not with sworde. Euen so those which the Romaines called the Feciales, went many times in person to those that did the Romaines iniurie, and sought to persuade them with good reason, to keep promise with the Romaines, and to offer them no wrong. But if they would not yeeld to reason, whom they sought to persuade: then they called the gods to the witnesse thereof, and praied them, that if they did not most earnestly incense the Romaines, to pursue that most iustly appertained vnto their right, that all euils and mischieues of the warres might fall vpon themselues, and on their countrie. This done, they did threaten open warres against such enemies. And if the Feciales would not consent to open warres, and did happen to speake against them: it was not lawfull in that case, neither for priuate person, nor for the King himselfe to make any warres. But like a iust prince, he must haue leaue by their sufferance to make the wars. Then did he consider, and consult, by what meanes he might best procure, & prosecute the same. Concerning this matter, they iudge that the ill hap which came to the Romaines, when the citie of Rome was taken and sacked by the Gaules, chaunced iustly for breaking of this holy institution. For at that time, the barbarous people besieged the citie of the Clvsinians: and Fabius Ambustus was sent ambassadour vnto them, to see if he could make peace betweene them. The barbarous people gaue him an ill aunswer: whereupon Fabius thinking his embasie had bene ended, and being somwhat hotte, and rashe in defence of the Clvsinians, gaue defiance to the valianteſt Gaule there, to fight with him mã to man. Fortune fauored him in this chalenge: for he slew the Gaule, and stripped him in the field. The Gaules seeing their man slaine, sent immediatly an heraulde to Rome, to accuse Fabius, howe against all right and reason, he began warres with them, without any open proclamation made before. The Feciales being then consulted with therabout, did declare, he ought to be deliuered into the hands of the Gaules, as one that had broken the lawe of armes, and had deserued it: but he made friends to the people which fauored him very much, and by their meanes escaped his deliuerie, and punishment. Neuerthelesse, the Gaules within short time after, came before Rome with all their power: which they tooke, sacked, & burnt euery whit, sauing the Capitoll, as we haue written more amplie in the life of Camillus. Now concerning the Priests that were called Salij, they say he did institute them vpon this occasion. In the eight yeare of his reigne, there came a pestilent disease through all Italie, and at the length it crept also into Rome. Whereat euery man being greatly affraide and discouraged, they say there fell from heauen a target of copper, which lighted betweene the hands of Numa. They tell hereof a wonderfull tale, which the King himselfe affirmed he heard, of the Nymphe Egeria, and the Muses. To wit, that this target was sent from heauen, for the health and preseruation of the citie: and therefore he should keepe it carefully, and cause eleuen other to be cast and made, all like vnto the same in fashion and greatnesse, to the end, that if any would enterprise to steale it, he should not tell which of them to take for the right target. Moreouer he said, he was commaunded to consecrate the place to the Muses (in the which he did oftentimes companie with them) and also the fields which were neere thereabouts: and likewise to giue the fountaine that sprang in that place, vnto the Vestalls professed, that euery day they might drawe water at that Well, to wash the sanctuarie of their temple. The successe hereof proued his words true, for the sickines ceased incontinently. So he assembled all the chiefe crafts men then in Rome, to proue which of them would take vpon him to make one like vnto that. Euery man despaired to performe it. Howbeit one called Veturius Mamurius (the excellenteſt workeman that was in those dayes) did make them all so sute like, that Numa himselfe did not knowe the first target, when they were all laide together. So he ordained these priests Salij, to haue the custodie of these targets, to see them safe kept. They were called Salij, not after the name of Salian borne in Samothracia, or in Mantinea, as some haue vntruly alleaged, who first inuented the manner of dauncing all armed: but they were so called, of their fashion and manner of dauncing, and leaping. For in the moneth of Marche, they go skipping and leaping vp and downe the citie, with those targets on their armes, apparelled in red cassockes without sleeues, and girded about with broade leather sworde girdles, studded with copper, hauing helmets of copper on their heads, & striking vpon their targets with short daggers, which they cary in their hands. Moreouer, all their dauncing consisteth in mouing of their feete: for they handle them finely, making turnes aboue ground and beneath, with a sodaine measure, and a maruellous force of agilitie. They call these targets Ancylia, because of their fashion, which is not altogether compasse: for they are not all round as other common targets be, but they are cut with circles wreathed about, both the ends bowing in many foldes, and one so neere another, that altogether they come to a certaine wreathed forme, which the GRECIANS call Ancylon. Or els they are so called, because Ancon signifieth an elbow, vpon which they cary them. All these deriuations are written in the historie of Iuba, who in any case will haue this word Ancylia to be drawne out of the Greeke tongue. And it may be also they were so called, because the first came from aboue, which the GRECIANS call Anecathen: or els for healing the sick, which is called Acesit. Or els for ceasing of the drineſſe, which in Greeke is called, Anchmôn Lysis. Or for the ending of all diseases and euils, for which cause the ATHENIANS call Castor and Pollux, Anacas: if they lust to giue this word his deriuation from the Greeke tongue. Now the reward which Mamurius the goldsmith had for the making of these targets was, that the Salij vnto this day do make mention of him, in their song, which they sing going through the citie, and dauncing of their daunce all armed. Howbeit some thinke they say not Veturius Mamurius, but veterem memoriam, auncient memorie. But Numa after he had ordained and instituted these orders of priests, built his palace neere vnto the temple of Vesta, which holdeth his name Regia at this day, to say, the Kings palace. In which he remained most part of his life, studying either to sacrifice to the gods, or to teach the Priests what they should do, or how with them he should best contemplate all heauenly things. It is true that he had another house on the hill, which they call at this day, Quirinall, the place whereof is yet to be seene. But in all these sacrifices, ceremonies, and processions of the Priests, there were alwaies husshers that went before, crying to the people, keepe silence, and tend vpon diuine seruice. For they say the Pythagorians thought it good, that men should not worship the gods, nor make prayers to them in passing by, or doing any other thing: but they thought it meete, that men should of purpose go out of their houses, to serue and pray vnto them. Euen so King Numa thought it not meete, that his subiects should come to see, and heare diuine seruice negligently, as it were for a fashion, and onely to be ridde of it, as heeding an other thing: but he would haue them set aside all other businesse, and employ their thoughts and hearts only vpon the principall seruice of religion, and deuotion towards the gods. So that during seruice time, he would not haue heard any noise, any knocking, bousing, or any clapping, as they commonly heare in all artificers shops of occupation, whereof at this day yet they seee some signes and tokens, remaining in their sacrifices at ROME. For all the time the Augur beholdeth the flying of the birds, or that he is doing any sacrifice, the vergers crie alowde: Hoc Age, which meaneth, tend this. And it is a warning to those that are present, to call their wittes home, and to thinke on that which is in hand. Also there are many of his orders like the precepts of the Pythagorians. For as they did warne men, not to sit vpon a little bushell, not to cut fire with a sword, not to looke behinde them when they goe abroade: to sacrifice to the celestiall goddes in odde number, and to the goddes of the earth in an euen number, of which precepts they would not haue the commō people to haue any knowledge or vnderstanding. Euen so there are many institutions of Numa, the reasons whereof are hidde and kept secret: as not to offer wine to the gods of the vine neuer cut, and not to sacrifice vnto them without meale: and to turne a turne about when they do reuerence to the gods, & to sit downe after they haue worshipped them. And as touching the two first ordinances, it seemeth that by them he did recōmend clemency & humanity, as being a part of the deuotion towards the gods. But as for the turning which he willeth them to make, that worship the gods: they say it presenteth the turning which the element maketh by his mouing. But me thinketh it should rather come of this: for that the temples being set to the east, he that worshippeth entring into the temple, sheweth his backe to the West, and for this cause turneth towards that part, and afterwards returneth againe towards god: doing the whole turne, & ending the consummation ſummation of his prayer, by this double adoration which he maketh before & behind. Vnleſſe peraduenture that he ment ſecretly to ſignifie, & giue them to vnderſtand by this turning and chaunging of their looke, that which the EGYPTIANS figured by their wheeles: in ſhowing thereby, that theſe worldly things were neuer conſtant & in one ſtate. And therefore, that we ſhould take it thankfully, & patiently beare it, in what ſort ſo euer it pleaſed God to change or alter our life. And where he cõmanded that they ſhold ſit after they had worſhipped God: they ſaid it was a token of a good hope vnto them that praied, that their praiers ſhould be exalted, & that their goods ſhould remaine ſafe, and ſticke by them. Other ſay, that this eaſe & ſitting, is a ſeparating them from doing: and therefore he would they ſhould ſit in the temples of the gods, to ſhew they had done that which they had in hand before, to the end to take of the godds the beginning of another. And it may well be alſo, that it was referred to the thing we ſpake of a little before. That Numa would accuſtome his people, not to ſerue the gods, nor to ſpeake to thẽ at all, as they paſſed by, or did any other thing, or were in haſte: but would haue thẽ pray vnto the godds when they had time & leaſure, & al other buſines at that time ſet a part. By this good inſtruction & training them vnto religion, the citie of ROME by litle & litle came to be ſo tractable, & had the great power of king Numa in ſuch admiratiõ: that they tooke all to be as true as the goſpell that he ſpake, though it had no more likelihood of troth, then tales deuiſed of pleaſure. Furthermore, they thought nothing incredible, or vnpoſſible to him, if he wold haue it. And for proofe hereof, there goeth a tale of him, that he hauing bidden a great company of the citizens of ROME to come and ſup with him, cauſed them to be ſerued with plaine groſſe meat, and in very poore and homely veſſell. And when they were ſet, and began to fall to their meat, he caſt out words ſodainly vnto them, how the goddeſſe with whom he accompanied, was come to ſee him euen at that inſtant, & that ſodainely the hall was richly furniſhed, & the tables couered with all ſorts of excellent fine & delicate meates. Howbeit this far paſſed all the vanity of lying, which is found writtẽ of him, about his ſpeaking with Iupiter. The hill Auentine was not at that time inhabited, nor incloſed within the walles of ROME, but was full of ſprings & ſhadowed groues, whither cõmonly repaired to ſolace themſelues, the two godds, Picus & Faunus, which otherwiſe might be thought two Satyres, or of the race of the Titanias: ſauing it is ſaid, that they went through all ITALY, doing the like miracles & wonders in phiſicke, charmes & art magike, which they report of thoſe the GRECIANS call Idees Dactyles. There they ſay that Numa tooke them both, hauing put into the ſpring both wine & honnie, where they vſed to drinke. When they ſaw that they were taken, they transformed thẽſelues into diuers formes, diſguiſing & diſfiguring their naturall ſhape, into many terrible & fearefull ſights to behold. Neuertheles in the end, perceiuing they were ſo faſt, as to eſcape there was no reckoning: they reuealed vnto him many things to come, & taught him the purifying againſt lightning & thunder, which they make yet at this day with onions, haire, and pilchers. Other ſay, he was not taught that by them, but that they fetched Iupiter out of heauẽ, with their coniuring & magicke: whereat Iupiter being offended, anſwered in choller, that he ſhould make it with heads. But Numa added ſtraight, of onions: Iupiter replied, of men. Thẽ Numa asked him againe, to take a litle away the cruelty of the cõmaundement: What haires? Iupiter anſwered, quick haires. And Numa put to pilchers alſo. And it is reported that this was the goddeſſe Egeria, that taught Numa this ſubtiltie. This done, Iupiter returned appeaſed: by reaſon wherof the place was called Ilicium. For Ileos in the Greeke tongue ſignifieth appeaſed, & fauorable: & this purifying was afterwards made in that ſort. Theſe tales not only vaine, but ful of mockery alſo, do ſhow vs yet plainely the zeale & deuotion men had in thoſe times towards the godds: vnto which Numa through cuſtome had won them. And as for Numa himſelfe, they ſay that he ſo firmely put all his hope & confidence in the help of the godds: that one day when he was told his enemies were in armes againſt him, he did but laugh at it, & anſwered. And I do ſacrifice. It is he (as ſome ſay) that firſt built a temple to Faith & Terme: and which made the ROMAINES vnderſtand, that the moſt holy and greateſt oth they could make, was to ſweare by their faith, which they kepe yet at this day. But Terme, which ſignifieth bounds, is the god of confines, or borders: vnto whom they doe ſacrifice, both publiquely & priuately, vpon the limits of inheritances, & now they ſacrifice vnto him liue beaſts. him without any bloud, through the wise institutiō of Numa: who declared & preached vnto them, that this God of bounds was sincere, & vpright, without bloud or murther, as he that is a witnes of iustice, & a keper of peace. It was he, which in my opiniō, did first limit out the bouds of the territorie of ROME which Romulus would neuer doe, for feare least in bounding out his owne, he should confesse that which he occupied of other mens. For bounding & mearing, to him that wil keepe it iustly is a bond that bridleth power & desire. But to him that forceth not to keepe it it is a proofe to shew his iniustice. To say truly, the territorie of ROME had no great bounds at the first beginning, & Romulus had got by conquest the greatest part of it, and Numa did wholy deuide it vnto the needy inhabitants to relieue them, & to bring thē out of pouerty: (which carieth men hedlong into mischiefe, & discourageth thē to labour) to the end that plowing vp the said land, they should also plow vp the weedes of their own barrennes, to become ciuill & gentle. For there is no exercise nor occupation in the world, which so sodainly bringeth a man to loue & desire quietnes, as doth husbandry & tillage: & yet to defend a mans own, there is in it corage & hardines to fight. But greedy desire, violently to take from others, & vniustly to occupy that is none of theirs, is neuer in right husband men. And therfore Numa hauing brought in husbandry amongst his subiects, as a medicine and meane to make them loue quietnes: was desirous to inure them to this trade of life, the rather to make thē humble & gentle of condition, then to increase them in riches. He deuided all the territorie of ROME into certaine parts which he called Pagos: as much to say, as vallages. And in euery one of thē he ordeined controllers & visiters, which should survey all about: & he himselfe sometimes went abroad in person, coniecturing by their labour the manners & nature of euery man. Such as he found diligent, he aduanced them vnto honor, & gaue them countenance & authority: other which he saw slothfull & negligent, by rebuking & reprouing of them, he made them amend. But amongst all his ordinances which he made, one aboue all the rest caried the praise: & that was, that he deuided his people into sundry occupations. For the citie of ROME seemed yet to be made of two nations, as we haue said before: and to speake more properly, it was made of two tribes. So that it could not, or would not for any thing be made one: being altogether impossible to take away all factions, and to make there should be no quarrels nor contentions between both parts. Wherfore he considered, that when one will mingle two bodies or simples together, which for their hardnes and contrary natures cannot well suffer mixture: then he breakes & beates them together, as small as may be. For, so being brought into a smaller & lesser powder, they would incorporate and agree the better. Euen so he thought it was best to deuide the people also into many small parts: by meanes whereof they should be put into many parties, which would more easily take away the first & the greatest part, when it should be deuided and separated thus into sundry sorts. And this diuision he made by arts & occupations: as minstrels, goldsmiths, carpenters, diers, shoemakers, tawers, tanners, bel-founders, & pot makers, & so forth through other crafts and occupations. So that he brought euery one of these into one bodie, & company by it selfe: and ordeined vnto euery particular mysterie or craft, their feasts, assemblies, & seruices, which they should make vnto the goddes, according to the dignitie & worthines of euery occupation. And by this meanes, he first tooke away al faction: that neither side said, nor thought any more, those are SABYNES, these are ROMAINES, these are of Tatius, these are of Romulus. Insomuch as this diuision was an incorporating, & an vniting of the whole together. Among other his ordinances, they did much commend his reforming of the law, that gaue libertie vnto fathers to sell their children. For he did except children already maried, so they were maried with their fathers cōsent & goodwil: iudging it to be too cruell & ouer hard a thing, that a woman who thought she had maried a free man, should find her self to be the wife of a bondman. He began also to mend a litle the calender, not so exactly as he should haue done, nor yet altogether ignorantly. For during the raigne of Romulus, they vsed the moneths confusedly, without any order or reason, making some of them 20. dayes & lesse, and others 35. dayes and more, without knowing the difference betweene the course of the sunne and the moone: and onely they obserued this rule, that there was 360. dayes in the yeare. But Numa considering the inequalitie stood vpon 11. dayes, for that the 12. reuolutions of the moone are runne in 354. dayes, and the reuolution of the sunne, in 365. dayes, he doubled doubled the 11. dayes, whereof he made a moneth: which he placed from 2. yeres to 2. yeares, after the moneth of Februarie, & the ROMAINES called this moneth put betweene, Mercidinus, which had 22. dayes. And this is the correction that Numa made, which since hath had a farre better amendmẽt. He did also change the order of the moneths. For March which before was the first, he made it now the third: and Ianuary the first, which vnder Romulus was the 11. and Februarie the 12. and last. Yet many are of opinion, that Numa added these two, Ianuary & Februarie. For the ROMAINES at the beginning had but 10. moneths in the yere: as some of the barbarous people make but three moneths for their yere. And the ARCADIANS amongst the GRECIANS haue but foure moneths for their yeare. The ACARNANIANS haue sixe to the yeare. And the EGYPTIANS had first but one moneth to their yeare: & afterwards they made foure moneths for their yeare. And this is the cause why they seeme (albeit they inhabite in a new countrie) to be neuertheles the ancientest people of the world: for that in their Chronicles they reckon vp such infinite number of yeares, as those which count the moneths for the yeares. And to proue this true, that the ROMAINES at the beginning had but 10. moneths in the yeare, & not 12. it is easely to be iudged by the name of the last, which they call at this day Decẽber. And that the moneth of March was also the first, may be coniectured by this: for the fifth moneth after that, is yet called Quintilis: the 6. Sextilis, & so the other in order following the nũbers. For if Ianuary & February had then bene the first, of necessitie the moneth of Iuly, which they call Quintilis, must haue bene named September: considering also that it is verie likely, that the moneth which Romulus had dedicated vnto Mars, was also by him ordained to be the first. The second was Aprill: so called of the name Aphrodite, that is to say Venus, vnto whom they make open sacrifice in this moneth. And on the first day of the same, women doe wash themselues, hauing a garland of myrtle vpon their heads. Howbeit some other say, that it was not called after the name of Aphrodite, but it was only called Aprilis, because thẽ is the chiefest force & strength of the spring, at which season the earth doth open, and the seedes of plants and hearbs begin to bud & shew forth, which the word it selfe doth signifie. The moneth following next after that, is called Maye: after the name of Maia, the mother of Mercurie, vnto whom the moneth is consecrated. *The month of Iune is so called also, because of the qualitie of that season, which is as the youth of the yeare. Although some will say, that the moneth of Maye was named of this word Maiores, which signifieth as much as the elders: & the moneth of Iune, of Iuniores, which signifies the yonger men. All the other following, were named in old time by the numbers according to their order, Quintilis, Sextilis, September, October, Nouember, and December. But Quintilis, was after called Iulius, of the name of Iulius Cæsar, who slew Pompeius. And Sextilis was named Augustus, Octauius Cæsars successour in the empire, who was also surnamed Augustus. It is true also that Domitian would they should call the two moneths following (which are September & October) the one Germanicus, and the other Domitianus. But that held not long: for so soone as Domitian was killed, the moneths recouered their auncient names againe. The two last moneths only, haue euer continued their names, without changing or altering. But of the two which Numa added, or at the least translated: the moneth of February doth signifie as much as purging, or at the least the deriuation of the word soundeth neere it. In this moneth, they do sacrifice of plants, * & do celebrate the feast of the Lupercales, in which there are many things agreable, and like to the sacrifices made for purification. And the first, which is Ianuarie, was called after the name of Ianus. Wherfore me thinks that Numa tooke away the moneth of March from the first place, & gaue it vnto Ianuary: because he would haue peace preferred before warre, and ciuill things before marshall. For this Ianus (were he King, or demigod) in the former age was counted very ciuill & politick. For he changed the life of men, which before his time was rude, cruell, & wild: and brought it to be honest, gentle, & ciuill. For this cause they doe paint his image at this day with two faces, the one before, and the other behind, for thus chaunging the liues of men. And there is in ROME a temple dedicated vnto him, which hath two doores, that be called the doores of warre: for the custome is to open them, when the ROMAINES haue any warres in any place, and to shut them when they be at peace. To haue them shut, it was a rare thing to see, and happened very seeldome: by reason of the greatnesse of their empire, which of all sides was enuironed with barbarous nations, whom they were cõpelled to keepe vnder with force of armes. Notwithstanding it was once shut vp in the time of Augustus, after he had slaine Antonie: and once before also in the yere when Marcus Attilius & Titus Manlius were Cõsuls. But that cõtinued not long, for it was opened again incontinently, by reason of wars that came vpon them soone after. Howbeit during the raign of Numa, it was neuer one day opened, but remained shut continually by the space of 43 yeares together. For all occasions of wars, were then vtterly dead & forgotten: because at ROME the people were not only through the example of iustice, clemẽcie, & the goodnes of the King brought to be quiet, & to loue peace: but in the cities thereabouts, there began a maruellous change of maners & alteration of life, as if some gentle aire had breathed on them, by some gratious & healthfull wind, blowen from ROME to refresh them. And thereby bred in mens minds such a hearty desire to liue in peace, to till the ground, to bring vp their children, & to serue the goddes truly: that almost through all ITALY, there was nothing but feasts, playes, sacrifices, and bankets. The people did traffick & frequent together, without feare or danger, and visited one another, making great cheere: as if out of the springing fountaine of Numaes wisdome many pretie brookes & streames of good & honest life had run ouer all ITALIE, and had watered it: and that the mildnes of his wisedome had from hand to hand bene dispearsed through the whole world. Insomuch, as the ouer excessiue speeches the Poets accustomably do vse, were not sufficient enough to expresse the peaceable raigne of that time.

The Romaines had no warres in all Numaes time.

There: spiders weaue, their cobwebbes day and night in harnesses, which wont to serue for warre: there: cancred rust doth fret, the steele full bright of trenchant blades, well whet in many a iarre.
There: mightie speares, for lacke of vse are eaten, with rotten wormes: and in that countrie there, the braying trompe doth neuer seeme to threaten,
their quiet eares, with blasts of bloudy feare.
There: in that land, no drowsie sleepe is broken, with hotte alarmes, which terrours do betoken.

For during all king Numaes raigne, it was neuer heard that euer there were any wars, ciuill dissention, or innouation of gouernement attempted against him, nor yet any secret enmity or malice borne him, neither any cõspiracy once thought on to reigne in his place. And whether it was for feare of displeasing the gods (which visibly seemed to take him into their protectiõ) or for the reuerent regard they had vnto his vertue, or for his prosperous & good successe all the time he raigned, I cannot tell: howbeit he sought to keepe men still pure, & honest, from al wickednes, & layd most opẽ before the eies of the whole world, a very example of that which Plato long time after did affirme, & say, concerning true gouernmẽt: which was. That the only meane of true quietnes, & remedy from al euill (which euer troubleth men) was: whẽ by some diuine ordinance from aboue there meeteth in one person, the right maiestie of a King, & the mind of a wise philosopher, to make vertue gouernesse & ruler ouer vice. For in deede happy is such a wise man, & more happy are they, which may heare the graue counsaile, & good lessons of such a mouth. And there me thinkes needeth no force, no compulsion, no threats, nor extremitie to bridle the people. For mẽ seeing the true image of vertue in their visible prince, & in the example of his life, doe willingly grow to be wise, & of them selues do fall into loue, liking, and friendship together, and doe vse all temperance, iust dealing, and good order one towarde another, leading their life without offence, and with the commendation of other: which is the chiefe point of felicitie, and the most happie good that can light vnto men. And he by nature is best worthy to be a King, who through his wisedome and vertue, can graffe in mens manners such a good disposition: and this, Numa aboue all other, seemed best to knowe and vnderstand. Furthermore, touching his wiues and children, there are great contrarieties among the historiographers. For some of them say, he neuer maried other wife then Tatia, and that he neuer had any children, but one only daughter, and she was called Pompilia. Other write to the contrarie, that he had foure sonnes, Pompo, Pinus, Calpus, and Mamercus: of euery one of the which (by succession from the father to the sonne) haue descended the noblest noblest races, and most ancient houses of the ROMAINES. As the house of the Pomponians, of Pompo: the house of the Pinarians, of Pinus: the house of the Calphurnians of Calpus: & the house of the Mamercians, of Mamercus. All which families by reason of their progenitor haue kept the surname of Reges, Kings. There are three other writers, which do reproue the two first: saying that they did write to gratifie the families, making them falsely to descend of the noble race of king Numa. Moreouer it is said, he had his daughter Pompilia, not by Tatia, but by his other wife called Lucretia, whom he maried after he was made King. Howbeit they all agree, that his daughter Pompilia was maried vnto one Martius, the sonne of the same Martius, which perswaded him to accept the kingdome of ROME. For he went with him to ROME, to remaine there: where they did him the honour to receiue him into the number of the Senatours. After the death of Numa, Martius the father stoode against Tullus Hostilius for the succession of the Realme, and being ouercome, he killed him selfe for sorrow. But his sonne Martius, who maried Pompilia, continued still at ROME, where he begot Ancus Martius, who was king of ROME after Tullus Hostilius, and was but fiue yeare old when Numa died. Whose death was not sodaine. For he died consuming by litle and litle, as well through age, as also through a lingring disease that waited on him to his end, as Piso hath written: and Numa at his death was litle more then foure score yeare old. But the pompe and honour done vnto him at his funeralles, made his life yet more happy and glorious. For all the people his neighbours, friendes, kinsemen, and allies of the ROMAINES came thither, bringing crownes with them, and other publique contributions to honour his obsequies. The noble men selues of the citie (which were called Patricians) caried on their shoulders the very bed, on which the corse lay, to be conuaied to his graue. The Priestes attended also on his body, and so did all the rest of the people, women and children in like case, which followed him to his tumbe, all bewailing and lamenting his death, with teares, sighes, and mournings. Not as a King dead for very age, but as they had mourned for the death of their dearest kinseman, and nearest friend that had died before he was old. They burnt not his body, because (as some say) he commaunded the contrary by his will and testament: but they made two coffines of stone, which they buried at the foote of the hill called Ianiculum. In the one they laide his body, and in the other the holy bookes which he had written himselfe, much like vnto those, which they that made the lawes among the GRECIANS did write in tables. But because in his life time he had taught the priestes, the substaunce of the whole contained in the same: he willed the holy tables which he had written, should be buried with his body. For he thought it not reasonable that so holy matters should be kept by dead letters and writings, but by mens manners and exercises. And he followed herein they say, the Pythagorians, who would not put their workes in writing, but did printe the knowledge of them in their memories, whom they knew to be worthy mē, and that without any writing at all. And if they had taught any manner of person the hidden rules and secrets of Geometry, which had not bene worthy of them: then they saide the goddes by manifest tokens would threaten to reuenge such lacti-ledge and impiety, with some great destruction and misery. Therefore, seeing so many things agreable, and altogether like betwene Numa and Pythagoras, I easely pardon those which maintaine their opinion, that Numa and Pythagoras were familiarly acquainted and conuersant together. Valerius Antias the historian writeth, there were twelue bookes written concerning the office of Priestes, and twelue other containing the philosophy of the GRECIANS. And that foure hundred yeares after (in the same yeare when Publius Cornelius, and Martius Bebius were consuls,) there fell a great rage of waters and raine, which opened the earth, and discouered these coffines: and the liddes and couers thereof being caried away, they found the one altogether voide, hauing no manner of likelyhood, or token of a body that had layen in it: and in the other they found these bookes, which were deliuered vnto one named Petilius (at that time Praetor) who had the charge to read them ouer, and to make the report of them. But he hauing perused them ouer, declared to the Senate, that he thought it not conuenient the matters contained in them should be published vnto the simple people: and for that cause they were caried into the market place, and there were openly burnt. Surely it is a common thing, that happeneth vnto all good and iust men, that Good men prayſed after their death. they are far more prayſed and eſteemed after their death, then before: becauſe that enuy doth not long continue after their death, and oftentimes it dieth before them. But notwithſtanding, the misfortunes which chaunced afterwardes vnto the fiue Kings which raigned at ROME after Numa, haue made his honour ſhine, with much more noble glory then before. For the laſt of them was driuen out of his Kingdome, and died in exile, after he was very old. And of the other foure, none of them died their naturall death, but three of them were killed by treaſon. The misfortunes of Numaes ſucceſſours. And Tullus Hoſtilius which raigned after Numa, deriding and contemning the moſt part of his good and holy inſtitutions, and chiefly his deuotion towardes the goddes, as a thing which made men lowly and faint hearted: did as ſoone as euer he came to be King, turne all his ſubiects hearts to the warres. Hoſtilius. But this mad humor of his, continued not long. For he was plagued with a ſtraunge and moſt grieuous diſeaſe that followed him, which brought him to chaunge his mind, and did farre otherwiſe turne his contempt of Religion, into an ouer feareful ſuperſtition, which did nothing yet reſemble the true Religion and deuotion of Numa: & beſides, he infected others with his contagious errour, through the inconuenience which happened vnto him at his death. For he was ſtriken and burnt with lightning.

THE COMPARISON OF Lycurgus with Numa.

THVS hauing written the liues of Lycurgus and Numa, the matter requireth, though it be ſomewhat hard to doe, that we comparing the one with the other, ſhould ſet out the difference betweene them. For in thoſe things wherein they were like of condition, their deedes do ſhew it ſufficiently. The vertues of Numa and Lycurgus were alike, but their deedes diuerſe. As in their temperaunce, their deuotion to the goddes, their wiſedome in gouerning, and their diſcrete handling of their people, by making them beleeue that the goddes had reuealed the lawes vnto them, which they eſtabliſhed. And now to come vnto their qualities, which are diuerſely, & ſeuerally commended in either of them. Their firſt quality is, that Numa accepted the Kingdome, and Lycurgus gaue it vp. The one receiued it, not ſeeking for it: and the other hauing it in his handes did reſtore it againe. The one being a ſtraunger and a priuat man was by ſtrangers elected and choſen, their Lord and King. The other being in poſſeſſion a King, made himſelfe againe a priuat perſon. Sure it is a goodly thing to obtaine a Realme by iuſtice: but it is a goodlier thing to eſteeme iuſtice aboue a Realme. Vertue brought the one to be in ſuch reputatiō, that he was iudged worthy to be choſen a King: and vertue bred ſo noble a mind in the other, that he eſteemed not to be a King. Their ſecond quality is, that like as in an inſtrumēt of muſicke, the one of them did tune and wreſt vp the ſlacke ſtrings which were in SPARTA: ſo the other ſlackened, and ſet them lower, lower, which were too high mounted in Rome. Wherein Lycurgus difficulty was the greater. For he did not perswade his citizens, to plucke of their armour and cuirates, nor to lay by their swords, but only to laue their gold & siluer, to forsake their soft beds, their fine wrought tables, and other curious rich furniture, and not to leaue off the trauell of warres, to giue themselues only vnto feastes, sacrifices, and plaies. But to the contrary, to giue vp banquetting and feasting, and continually to take paines in the warres, yeelding their bodies to all kinde of paines. By which meanes the one for the loue and reuerence they did beare him, eamy perswaded all that he would: and the other, by putting him selfe in danger, and being hurt also, obtained not without great trauell and aduenture, the end of his intended purpose and desire. Numa his muse was so gentle, louing and curteous, that the manners of his citizens, which before were furious and violent, were now so tractable and ciuill, that he taught them to loue peace and iustice. And to the contrary, if they will compell me to number amongest the lawes and ordinaunces of Lycurgus, that which we haue written touching the Ilotes, which was a barbarous cruell thing, I must of force confesse that Numa was much wiser, more gentle, and ciuill in his lawes, considering that euen vnto those which in deede were borne slaues, he gaue some little tast of honor, and sweetnes of liberty, hauing ordained, that in the feasts of Saturne, they should sit down at meat at their masters own table. Some hold opinion, that this custome was brought in by king Numa: who willed that those, which through their labour in tillage brought in much fruite, should haue some pleasure thereof to make good cheere with the first fruites of the same. Other imagine, that it is yet a token and remembraunce of the equality which was amongest men in the world in Saturnes time, when there was neither master nor seruant, but all men were a like equall, as brethren or kinsmen. To conclude, it seemeth either of them tooke a direct course, thought best to them selues, to frame their people vnto temperaunce, and to be contented with their own. But for their other vertues, it appeareth that the one loued warre best, and the other iustice: whether it were that men would say, that for the diuersity of the nature or customs of their people (which were almost contrary in manners) they were both compelled to vse also contrary and diuers meanes from other. For it was not of a faint heart, that Numa tooke from his people the vse of armes, and desire to be in warres: but it was to the end they should not doe any wrong to others. Neither did Lycurgus also study to make his people souldiers and warlike, to hurt others: but for feare rather that others should hurt them. And so, to cut off the excesse in the one, and to supply the defect of the other: they were both enforced to bring in a straunge manner of gouernment. Furthermore, touching their seuerall kind of gouernment, and diuiding of their people into states and companies: that of Numa was marueilous meane and base, and framed to the liking of the meanest people, making a body of a city, and a people compounded together of all sortes, as goldesmiths, minstrels, founders, shoemakers, and of all sortes of crafts men and occupations together. But that of Lycurgus, was directly contrary: for his was more seuere and tyrannicall, in gouerning of the nobility, casting all crafts and base occupations vpon bondmen and straungers, and putting into the handes of his citizens the shield and launce, suffering them to exercise no other art or science, but the art and discipline of warres, as the true ministers of Mars: which all their life time neuer knew other science, but only learned to obey their captaines, and to commaund their enemies. For to haue any occupation, to buy and sell, or to trafficke, free men were expressely forbidden: because they should wholly & absolutely be free. And all sciences to get money was lawfull for slaues, and the Ilotes: being counted for as vile an occupation, as to dresse meate, and to be a scullian of a kitchin. Numa put not this difference amongst his people, but only tooke away couetous desire to be rich by warres: but otherwise, he did not forbid them to get goods by any other lawfull meanes, neither tooke any regard to bring all to equality, and to be alike wealthy, but suffered euery man to get what he could, taking no order to preuent pouerty, which crept in, and spred far in his city. Which he should haue looked vnto at the beginning, at that time when there was not too great an vnequality amongest them, and that his citizens for substaunce were in manner equall one with another: for then was the time whē he should haue made head against auarice, to haue stopped the mischeiues & inconueniences, which fell out afterwards, & they were not litle. For that only was the fountaine and roote, of the most part of the greatest euils and mischieues, which happened afterwards in ROME. And as touching the diuision of goodes: neither ought Lycurgus to be blamed for doing it, nor Numa for that he did it not. For this equality to the one, was a ground and foundation of his common wealth, which he afterwards instituted: and vnto other it could not be. For this diuision being made not long before the time of his predecessour, there was no great need to change the first, the which (as it is likely) remained yet in full perfection.

Reason for mariages. As touching mariages, and their children to be in common, both the one and the other wisely sought to take away all occasion of iealousie: but yet they tooke not both one course. For the ROMAINE husband, hauing children enough to his contentation: if another that lacked children came vnto him, to pray him to lend him his wife, he might graunt her vnto him, and it was in him to giue her altogether, or to lend her for a time, and to take her afterwardes againe. But the LACONIAN keping his wife in his house, and the mariage remaining whole and vnbroken, might let out his wife to any man that would require her to haue children by her. Furthermore, many (as we haue told you before) did them selues intreat men, by whom they thought to haue a trimme broode of children, and layed them with their wiues. What difference, I pray you was betweene these two customes: sauing that the custome of the LACONIANS shewed, that the husbands were nothing angry, nor grieued with their wiues for those things, which for sorrow and iealousie do turment the hearts of most maried men in the world. And that of the ROMAINS was a simplicity somewhat more shamefast, which to couer it, was shadowed yet with the cloke of matrimony, and contract of mariage: confessing that to vse wife and children by halfes together, was a thing most intollerable for him. Furthermore, the Numaes order for maidens the better. keeping of maidens to be maried by Numaes order, was much straighter & more honorable for womanhood: and Lycurgus order hauing too much scope & liberty, gaue Poets occasion to speake, and to giue them surnames not very honest. As Ibycus called them Phenomeridas: to say, thigh shewers: and Andromanes: to say manhood. And Euripides saith also of them.

and sought for young mens company, and tooke their wiue in charge.
And shewed their thighes all bare, the rayment did them wrong, on each side open were their cotes, the slits were all too long.

And in deede to say truely, the sides of their petticotes were not sowed beneath: so that as they went, they shewed their thighes naked and bare. The which Sophocles doth calely declare by these verses:

The song which you shall sing, shall be the sonnet saide, by Hermony lusty lasse, that strong and sturdy maide: VVhich trust her petticote, about her middle short, and set to shew her naked hippes, in francke and friendly sort.

The Laconians were too manly. And therefore it is said, the LACON wiues were bold, manly, and stout against their husbands, namely the first. For they were wholly mistresses in the house, and abroad: yea they had law on their side also, to vtter their minds franckly concerning the chiefest maters. But Numa euer reserued the honor and dignity vnto the women, which was left them by Romulus in his time, when their husbands, after they had taken them away perforce, disposed them selues to vse them as gently as possibly they could: neuertheless, he added otherwise thereto great honesty, and tooke away all curiosity from them, and taught them sobriety, and did inure them to speake litle. For he did vtterly forbid them wine, and did prohibite them to speak, although it were for things necessary, vnles it were in the presence of their husbands. In so much as it is reported, that a woman chaunciug one day to plead her cause in person, openly before the iudges: the Senate hearing of it, did send immediatly vnto the oracle of Apollo, to know what that did prognosticate to the city. And therefore Numa thought the memory of the naughty women, would much commend the great humility, gentleries, & obedience of the good. For like as our GRECIAN historiographers do note those which were the first that killed any of

The first diuorce at Rome. their citizens, or haue fought with their brethre, or haue killed their fathers or mothers: euen so the ROMAINS doe note that Spurius Caruilius was the first that forlooke his wife, two hundred and thirtie yeares after the first foundation of ROME, which was neuer done by any before.

fore. And that the wife of one Pinarius, called Thalea, was the firſt which euer brauled or quarrelled with her mother in law called Gegania, in the time when Tarquine ſurnamed the proud raigned: ſo well and honeſtly were the orders of Numa deuiſed concerning mariage. Moreouer, the age and time of marying of maydes, which both the one and the other ordeined: doth agree with the reſt of their education. For Lycurgus would not that they ſhould be maried, till they were of good yeres, and women growen: to the end that they knowing the company of man at ſuch time as nature requireth, it ſhould be a beginning of their pleaſure and loue, and not of griefe and hate, when ſhe ſhould be compelled vnto it before time agreeable by nature, and becauſe their bodies alſo ſhould be more ſtrong and able to beare children, and to indure the mothers painefull throwes and trauell in child bearing, conſidering they are maried to no other ende, but to beare children. But the ROMAINES to the contrary, doe marie them at twelue yeres of age and vnder: ſaying, that by this meanes their bodies and manners be wholy theirs, which doe marie them, being aſſured that no body els could touch them. By this reaſon it is manifeſt, that the one is more naturall, to make them ſtrong to beare children: & the other more morall, to giue them the forme and maner of conditions, which a man would haue thē to keepe all their life time. Moreouer touching orders for education of children, that they ſhould be brought vp, inſtructed, and taught, vnder the ſelfe ſame maſters & gouernors, which ſhould haue an eye to make them drinke, eate, play, & exerciſe themſelues honeſtly, and orderly together: Numa made no more prouiſion for the ſame, then the leaſt maker of lawes that euer was, and nothing in compariſon of Lycurgus. For Numa left the parents at libertie, to vſe their diſcretion (according vnto their couetouſneſſe or neceſſitie) to cauſe their children to be brought vp as they thought good: whether they would put them to be labourers, carpenters, founders, or minſtrels. As if they ſhould not frame the manners of children, and faſhion them from their cradell all to one end: but ſhould be as it were like paſſengers in one ſhip, which being there, ſome for one buſineſſe, other for another purpoſe, but all to diuerſe ends, do neuer medle one with another, but in a rough ſtorme or tempeſt, when euery man is affraide of his owne life. For otherwiſe, no man careth but for himſelfe. And other makers of lawes alſo, are to be borne withall, if any thing hath ſcaped them through ignorance, or ſometime through lacke of ſufficient power and authoritie. But a wiſe philoſopher, hauing receiued a realme of people newly gathered together, which did contrary him in nothing: whereto ſhould he moſt plie his ſtudie and indeuour, but to cauſe children to be well brought vp, and to make young men exerciſe themſelues, to the end they ſhould not differ in manners, nor that they ſhould be troubleſome, by their diuerſe manner of bringing vp, but that they ſhould all agree together, for that they had bene trained from their childhood vnto one ſelfe trade, and faſhioned vnder one ſelfe patterne of vertue? That good education, beſides other commodities, did alſo ſerue to preſerue Lycurgus lawes. For the feare of their othe which they had made, had bene of ſmall effect, if he had not through inſtitution, and education (as it were) died in wolle the manners of children, and had not made them from their nurſes breaſts in manner, ſucke the iuice and loue of his lawes, and ciuill ordinaunces. And this was of ſuch force, that for the ſpace of fiue hundred years and more, Lycurgus chiefe lawes and ordinaunces remained in full perfection, as a deepe woded die, which went to the bottome, and pearced into the tender wolle. Contrariwiſe, that which was Numaes chiefe end and purpoſe, to continue ROME in peace and amity, died by and by with him. For he was no ſooner dead, but they opened both the gates of the temple of Ianus, which he ſo carefully had kept ſhut all his raigne, as if in deede he had kept in warres there, vnder locke and key, and they filled all ITALIE with murther and bloud: and this his godly, holy, and iuſt gouernment which his Realme enioyed all his time, did not laſt long after, becauſe it had not the bond of education, and the diſcipline of children which ſhould maintaine it. Why, may a man ſay to me here: hath not ROME excelled ſtill, and preuailed more and more in chiualry? This queſtion requireth a long anſwer, and ſpecially vnto ſuch men as place felicity in riches, in poſſeſſions, and in the greatnes of empire, rather then in the quiet ſafety, peace, and concord of a common weale: and in clemency and iuſtice, ioyned with contentation. Neuertheles, how ſoeuer it was, that maketh for Lycurgus alſo, that the ROMAINES after they had chaunged the ſtate which they had of Numa, did so marueilously increase and grow mightie: and that the LACEDÆMONIANS to the contrary, so soone as they beganne to breake Lycurgus lawes, being of great authoritie & sway, fell afterwardes to be of small account. So that hauing lost the soueraignte & commaundement ouer GREECE, they stood in great hazard also to be ouerthrowen for euer. But in troth it was some diuine thing in Numa, that he being a meere stranger, the ROMAINES did seeke him, to make him King, and that he could so chaunge all, and rule a whole citie as he listed (not yet ioyned together) without neede of any force or violence: as it was in Lycurgus, to be assisted with the best of the citie, in resisting the commõs of LACEDÆMON, but he could neuer otherwise haue kept them in peace, and made them loue together, but by his only wisedome and iustice.

DIDYMVS the Grammarian, in a litle booke that he wrote, & dedicated vnto Asclepiades, touching the tables of the lawes of Solon, alleageth the wordes of one Philocles, in which he speaketh against the common opinion of those that haue written, that Solons father was called Euphorion. For all other writers agree, that he was the sonne of Execestides, a man but reasonably to liue, although otherwise he was of the noblest and most auncient house of the city of ATHENS. For of his fathers side, he was descended of king Codrus: and for his mother, Heraclides Ponticus writeth, she was cosin germaine vnto Pisistratus mother. For this cause euen from the beginning there was great friendship betweene them, partly for their kindred, and partly also for the curtesie, and beauty of Pisistratus, with whom it is reported Solon on a time was in loue. Afterwards they fortuned to fall at iarre one with the other, about matter of state and gouernment: yet this square bred no violent inconuenience betweene them, but they reserued in their hearts still their auncient amity, which continued the memory of their loue, as a great fire doth a burning flame. That Solon was no staied man to withstand beauty, nor any great doer to preuaile in loue, it is manifest to all, as well by other poeticall writings that he hath made, as by a law of his owne: wherein he did forbid forbid bondmen to perfume themselues, or to be louers of children. Who placed this lawe among honest matters, and commendable: as allowing it to the better sort, and forbidding it to the basest. They say also that Pisistratus selfe was in loue with Charmus, and that he did set vp the litle image of loue, which is in Academia, where they were wont to light the holy candle. But Solons father (as Hermippus writeth) hauing spent his goods in liberalitie, and deedes of courtesie, though he might easily haue ben relieued at diuers mens hands with money, he was yet ashamed to take any, because he came of a house which was wont rather to giue & relieue others, then to take themselues: so being yet a young man, he deuised to trade marchandise. Howbeit other say, that Solon trauelled countries, rather to see the world, and to learne: then to traffick, or gaine. For sure he was very desirous of knowledge, as appeareth manifestly: for that being now old, he commonly vsed to say this verse:

A statute for bondmen.

Solon gaue him selfe in youth to trade marchandise.

I grow old, learning still.

Also he was not couetously bent, nor loued riches too much: for he said in one place:

VVho so hath goods, and gold enough at call, great heards of beastes, and flockes in many a folde, both horse and mule, yea store of corne and all, that may content ech man aboue the moulde:
no richer is, for all those heapes and hoordes, then he which hath, sufficiently to feede, and clothe his corpes, with such as God afoordes.
But if his ioye, and chiefe delight do breede, for to beholde the fayre and heauenly face, of some sweete wife, which is adornde with grace:
or els some childe, of beautie faire and bright, then hath he cause (in deed) of deepe delight.

Solons iudgement of riches.

And in another place also he saieth:

In deed I do desire, some wealth to haue at will:
but not vnlesse the same be got, by faithfull dealing still.
For sure who so desires by wickednesse to thriue:
shall finde that iustice from such goods, will iustly him deprriue.

There is no law forbiddeth an honest man, or gentleman, greedily to scrape goods together, and more then may suffice: & likewise to get sufficient to maintaine one withall, and to defray all needfull charges. In those dayes no state was discommended, as saith Hesiodus, nor any arte or science made any difference betweene men: but marchandise they thought an honorable state, as that which deliuered meanes, to traffick into strange and far countries, to get acquaintance with states, to procure the loue of princes, & chiefly to gather the experience of the world. So that there haue bene marchants, which heretofore haue bene founders of great cities: as he which first built MASSILIA, after he had obtained the friendship of the GAVLES, dwelling by the riuer of Rhosne. And they say also, that Thales Milesius the wise, did traffick marchandise, and that Hippocrates the mathematike did euen so: & likewise that Plato trauelling into Egypt, did beare the whole charges of his iourney, with the gaines he made of the sale of oile he caried thither. They remeber also that Solon learned to be lauish in expence, to fare delicatly, & to speake wantonly of pleasures in his Poems, somewhat more licentiously then became the grauity of a Philosopher: only because he was brought vp in the trade of marchandise, wherin for that men are maruellous subiect to great losses and daungers, they seeke otherwhiles good there to driue these cares away, and liberty to make much of themselues. Yet it appeareth by these verses, that Solon accounpted himselfe rather in the nũber of the poore, then of the rich.

The commodities of marchandise.

A marchaunt builded Massilia. Thales. Hippocrates. Plato. all marchaunts.

Rich men (oftimes) in lewdest liues do range, and often seene, that vertuous men be poore: Yet would the good, their goodnesse neuer chaunge with lewd estate, although their wealth be more.
For vertue stands alwaies both firme and stable:
when riches roue, and seldome are durable.

Pouerty with vertue better than riches.

This Poetrie at the beginning he vſed but for pleaſure, and when he had leaſure, writing no matter of importance in his verſes. Afterwards he did ſet out many graue matters of philoſophie and the moſt part of ſuch things as he had deuiſed before, in the gouernment of a comon weale, which he did not for hiſtorie or memories ſake, but onely of a pleaſure to diſcourſe: for he ſheweth the reaſons of that he did, and in ſome places he exhorteth, chideth, and reproueth the ATHENIANS. And ſome affirme alſo he went about to write his lawes and ordinances in verſe, and doe recite his preface, which was this:

How Solon vſed his poetrie.

Vouchſafe o mighty Ioue, of heauen and earth high King:
to graunt good fortune to my lawes, and health in euery thing.
And that their glorie growe, in ſuch triumphant wiſe, as may remaine in fame for aye, which liues and neuer dies.

Solon delighted in morall, but not in naturall philoſophie.

He chiefely delighted in morall philoſophie, which treated of gouernement and common weales: as the moſt part of the wiſe men did of thoſe times. But for naturall philoſophie, he was very groſſe and ſimple, as appeareth by theſe verſes.

The clattering hayle, and ſoftly falling ſnowe doe breede in aire, and fall from cloudes on hie.
The dreadfull clappes, which thunderbolts doe throwe, do come from heauen, and lightnings bright in skie, The ſea it ſelfe by boiſterous blaſts dooth rore which (were it not prouoked ſo full ſore) Would be both calme and quiet for to paſſe, as any element that euer was.

So in effect there was none but Thales alone of all the ſeuen wiſe men of GREECE, who ſearched further the contemplation of things in common vſe among men, than he. For ſetting him a parte, all the others got the name of wiſdome, onely for their vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernment. It is reported that they met on a day all ſeauen togither in the citie of DELPHES, and another time in the citie of CORINTH, where Periander got them togither at a feaſt that he made to the other ſixe. But that which moſt increaſed their glorie, and made their fame moſt ſpoken of, was the ſending backe againe of the three footed ſtoole when they all had refuſed it, and turned it ouer one to another with great humanitie. For the tale is, how certaine fiſher men of the Ile of Co, caſt their nettes into the ſea, and certaine ſtrangers paſsing by, that came from the citie of MILETVM, did buie their draught of fiſhe at aduenture, before the net was drawne. And when they drue it vp there came vp in the net a three footed ſtoole of maſſy gold, which men ſay, Helen (as ſhe did retutne from TROYE) had throwne in in that place, in memory of an auncient oracle ſhe called then vnto her minde. Thereupon the ſtrangers and fiſher men firſt fell at ſtrife about this three footed ſtoole, who ſhould haue it: but afterwardes the two cities tooke part of both ſides, on their citizens behalfe. In ſo much as warres had like to haue followed betweene them, had not the propheteſſe Pythia giuen a like oracle vnto them both. That they ſhould giue this three footed ſtoole vnto the wiſeſt man. Whereupon the men of Co, ſent it firſt to Thales in the city of MILETVM, as being willing to graunt that vnto a priuate perſon, for which they had made warres with all the MILESIANS before. Thales ſaide, he thought Bias a wiſer man then him ſelfe: and ſo it was ſent vnto him. He likewiſe ſent it again vnto another, as to a wiſer man. And that other, ſent it alſo vnto another. So that being thus poſted from man to man, and through diuerſe handes, in the end it was brought backe againe vnto the city of MILETVM, and deliuered into the handes of Thales the ſecond time: and laſt of all was caried vnto THEBES, and offered vp vnto the temple of Apollo Iſmenian. Howbeit Theophraſtus, writeth, that firſt it was ſent to the city of PRIENA, vnto Bias: and then vnto Thales, in the city of MILETVM, by Bias conſent. And after that it had paſſed through all their hands, it was brought againe vnto Bias: and laſtly it was ſent to the city of DELPHES. And thus much haue the beſt and moſt auncient writers written: ſauing that ſome ſay in ſteade of a three footed ſtoole, it was a cuppe that king Cræſus ſent vnto the city of DELPHES. Other ſay, it was a peece of

Helens three footed ſtoole of gold drawne vp in a draught net.

plate which Bathycles left there. They made mention also of another priuate meeting betwixt Anacharsis and Solon, and of another betweene him and Thales, where they recite, that they had this talke. Anacharsis being arriued at ATHENS, went to knocke at Solons gate, saying that he was a straunger which came of purpose to see him, and to desire his acquaintance and friendship. Solon answered him, that it was better to seeke friendship in his owne countrie. Anacharsis replyed againe: thou then that art at home, and in thine owne countrie, beginne to shew me friendship. Then Solon wondering at his bolde readie wit, entertained him verie courteously: and kept him a certain time in his house, and made him very good cheere, at the selfe same time wherein he was most busie in gouerning the common weale, & making lawes for the state thereof. Which when Anacharsis vnderstoode, he laughed at it, to see that Solon imagined with written lawes, to bridle mens couetousnes and iniustice. For such lawes, sayde he, doe rightly resemble the spyders cobwebbes: because they take holde of little flies and gnattes which fall into them, but the rich and mightie will breake and runne through them at their will. Solon answered him, that men do iustly keepe all couenants and bargaines which one make with another, because it is to the hinderance of either partie to breake them: & euen so, he did so temper his lawes, that he made his citizens knowe, it was more for their profite to obey law and iustice, then to breake it. Neuertheless afterwards, matters proued rather according to Anacharsis comparison, then agreeable to the hope that Solon had conceiued. Anacharsis being by happe one daye in a common assembly of the people at ATHENS, saide that he maruelled much, why in the consultations and meetings of the GRECIANS, wise men propounded matters, and fooles did decide them. It is said moreouer, that Solon was sometime in the citie of MILETVM at Thales house, where he saide that he could not but maruell at Thales, that he would neuer marrie to haue children. Thales gaue him neuer a word at that present: but within fewe dayes after he suborned a straunger, which said that he came but newly home from ATHENS, departing from thence but ten dayes before. Solon asked him immediately, What newes there? This stranger whom Thales had schooled before, answered: none other there, sauing that they carried a young man to buriall, whom all the citie followed: for that he was one of the greatest mens sonnes of the citie, and the honestest man withall, who at that present was out of the countrie, and had bene a long time (as they saide) abroade. O poore vnfortunate father, then said Solon: and what was his name? I haue heard him named, said the stranger, but I haue forgotten him nowe: sauing that they all saide, he was a worthy wise man. So Solon still trembling more and more for feare, at euery answer of this stranger: in the ende he could holde no longer, being full of trouble, but tolde his name himselfe vnto the stranger, and asked him againe, if he were not the sonne of Solon which was buried. The very same, said the stranger. Solon with that, like a mad man straight began to beate his head, and to say, and doe, like men impatient in affliction, and ouercome with sorrow. But Thales laughing to see this pageant, staid him, and said. Loe, Solon, this is it that keepeth me from marying, and getting of children: which is of such a violence, that thou seest it hath now ouercome thee, although otherwise thou art strong, aud able to wrestle with any. Howbeit for any thing he hath said vnto thee, be of good cheere man, for it is but a tale, and nothing so. Hermippus writeth, that Patæcus (he which sayd he had Esops soule) reciteth this story thus. Neuertheless it lacketh iudgement, and the courage of a man also, to be afraid to get things necessary, fearing the losse of them: for by this reckonning, he should neither esteeme honour, goodes, nor knowledge when he hath them, for feare to lose them. For we see that vertue it selfe, which is the greatest and sweetest riches a man can haue, decayeth oft times through sickenes, or els by phisicke, and potions. Furthermore Thales selfe, although he was not maried, was not therefore free from this feare, vnlesse he would confesse that he neither loued friends, kinsmen, nor countrey: howbeit Thales had an adopted sonne, called Cybistus, which was his sisters sonne. For our soule hauing in it a naturall inclination to loue, and being borne as well to loue, as to feele, to reason, or vnderstand, and to remember: hauing nothing of her owne whereupon she might bestow that naturall loue, borroweth of other. As where there is a house or inheritaunce without lawfull heires, many times straungers, and base borne children, doe creepe into the kinde affection of the owner, and when they

haue once wonne and possessed his loue, they make him euer after to be kinde and tender ouer them. So that ye shall see many times men of such a hard and rough nature, that they like not of them that moue them to marie, and get lawfull children: and yet afterwardes are readie to die for feare and sorow, when they see their bastardes (that they haue gotten of their slaues or concubines) fall sicke or die, and doe vtter wordes farre vnmeete for men of noble courage. And some such there be, that for the death of a dogge, or their horse, are so out of heart, and take such thought, that they are readie to goe into the ground, they looke so pittifully. Other some are cleane contrarie, who though they haue lost their children, forgone their frendes, or some gentleman deare vnto them, yet no sorowfull worde hath commen from them, neither haue they done any vnseemely thing: but haue passed the rest of their life like wise, constant, and vertuous men. For it is not loue but weakenesse, which breedeth these extreme sorowes, and exceeding feare, in men that are not exercised, nor acquainted to fight against fortune with reason. And this is the cause that plucketh from them the pleasure of that they loue and desire, by reason of the continuall trouble, feare and griefe they feele, by thinking how in time they may be depriued of it. Nowe we must not arme our selues with pouertie, against the griefe of losse of goods: neither with lacke of affection, against the losse of our friendes: neither with want of mariage, against the death of children: but we must be armed with reason against misfortunes. Thus haue we sufficiently enlarged this matter. The ATHENIANS hauing now susteined a long and troublesome warre against the MEGARIANS, for the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA: were in the ende wearie of it, and made proclamation straightly commaunding vpon paine of death, that no man should presume to preferre any more to the counsaile of the citie, the title or question of the possession of the Ile of SALAMINA. Solon could not beare this open shame, and seeing the most part of the lustiest youthes desirous still of warre though their tongues were tyed for feare of the proclamation: he fained himselfe to be out of his wits, and caused it to be giuen out that Solon was become a foole, & secretly he had made certain lamentable verses, which he had cunned without booke, to sing abroad the citie. So one day he ranne sodainely out of his house with a garland on his head, and got him to the market place, where the people straight swarmed like Bees about him: and getting him vp vpon the stone where all proclamations are vsually made, out he singeth these Elegies he had made, which began after this sort.

Proclamation vpon paine of death no man to moue the counsell for the title of Salamina.

Solon fained madnesse to recouer Salamina.

I here present my selfe (an Herauld) in this case, which come from Salamina land, that noble worthy place.
My mind in pelting prose, shall neuer be expresst,
But song in verse Heroicall, for so I thinke it best.

Solons Elegies of the Salaminians.

This Elegie is intituled SALAMINA, & conteineth a hundred verses, which are excellently well written. And these being sung openly by Solon at that time, his friendes incontinently praysed them beyond measure, and specially Pisistratus: and they went about perswading the people that were present, to credit that he spake. Hereupon the matter was so handled amongst them, that by and by the proclamation was reuoked, and they beganne to follow the warres with greater fury then before, appointing Solon to be generall in the same. But the common tale and report is, that he went by sea with Pysistratus vnto the temple of Venus, surnamed Coliade: where he found all the women at a solemne feast and sacrifice, which they made of custome to the goddesse. He taking occasion thereby, sent from thence a trusty man of his owne vnto the MEGARIANS, which then had SALAMINA: whom he instructed to faine himselfe a reuolted traytour, and that he came of purpose to tell them, that if they would but goe with him, they might take all the chiefe ladies and gentlewomen of ATHENS on a sodaine. The MEGARIANS easely beleeued him, and shipped forthwith certaine souldiers to goe with him. But when Solon perceyued the shippe vnder saile comming from SALAMINA, he commaunded the women to depart, and in stead of them he put lusly beardlesse springalles into their apparell, and gaue them litle short daggers to conuay vnder their clothes, commaunding them to play and daunce together vpon the sea side, vntill their enemies were landed, and their shippe at anker; and so it came to passe. For the MEGARIANS being deceyued by that they saw a farre off, as soone as euer they came to the shore side, did land in heapes, heapes, one in another necke, euen for greedines, to take these women: but not a man of them escaped, for they were slaine euery mothers sonne. This strategeme being finely handled, and to good effect, the ATHENIANS tooke sea straight, and coasted ouer to the Ile of SALAMINA: which they tooke vpon the sodaine, and wanne it without much resistance. Other say that it was not taken after this sort: but that Apollo Delphicus gaue Solon first such an oracle. Solon wanne Salamina.

Thou shalt first winne by vowes and sacrifice, of whose dead bones, the dust engraued lies, the helpe of lordes and demy gods full bright: in weste rne soyle, Asopia that hight.

By order of this oracle, he one night passed ouer to SALAMINA, & did sacrifice to Peripheimus, and to Cichris, demy gods of the country. Which done, the ATHENIANS deliuered him fiue hundreth men, who willingly offered themselues: and the citie made an accord with them, that if they tooke the Ile of SALAMINA, they should beare greatest authoritie in the common weale. Solon imbarked his soldiers into diuers fisher boates, and appointed a galliot of thirtie owers to come after him, & he ankered hard by the citie of SALAMINA, vnder the poynt which looketh towards the Ile of NEGREPONT. The MEGARIANS which were within SALAMINA, hauing by chaunce hard some inckling of it, but yet knew nothing of certaintie: ranne presently in hurly burly to arme them, and manned out a shippe to descry what it was. But they fondly comming within danger, were taken by Solon, who clapped the MEGARIANS vnder hatches fast bound, and in their roomes put aborde in their shippe the choysest souldiers he had of the ATHENIANS, commaunding them to set their course direct vpon the citie, and to keepe themselues as close out of sight as could be. And he himself with al the rest of his souldiers landed presently, and marched to encounter with the MEGARIANS, which were come out into the field. Now whilest they were fighting together, Solons men whom he had sent in the MEGARIANS shippe, entred the hauen and wan the towne. This is certainly true, & testified by that which is shewed yet at this day. For to keepe a memoriall hereof, a shippe of ATHENS arriueth quietly at the first, & by & by those that are in the shippe make a great showte, and a man armed leaping out of the shippe, runneth showting towards the rocke called Sciradion, which is as they come from the firme land: and hard by the same is the temple of Mars, which Solon built there after he had ouercome the MEGARIANS in battell, from whence he sent back againe those prisoners that he had taken (which were saued from the slaughter of the battell) without any ransome paying. Neuertheles, the MEGARIANS were sharply bent still, to recouer SALAMINA againe. Much hurt being done and suffered on both sides: both partes in the end made the LACEDÆMONIANS indges of the quarrell. But vpon iudgment giuen, common report is, that Homers authoritie did Solon good seruice, because he did adde these verses to the number of shippes, which are in the Iliades of Homer, which he rehearsed before the iudges, as if they had bene indeede written by Homer. Great strife betwixt the Megarians & Athenians for Salamina Iliad. lib 2.

Aiax that champion stowt, did leade with him in charge. twelue shippes from Salamina soyle, which he had left at large, and euen those selfsame shippes, in battell did he cast, and place in order for to fight, with enemies force at last.
In that same very place, whereas it seemed then, the captaines which from Athens came, imbatteld had their men.

Howbeit the ATHENIANS selues thinke, it was but a tale of pleasure: and say that Solon made it appeare to the iudges, that Philaus, and Eurysaces (both Aiax sonnes) were made free denizes of ATHENS Whereupon they gaue the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, & one of them came to dwell in a place called Brauron, in the country of ATTICA: & the other in a towne called MELITVM. And for due proofe thereof, they say there is yet a certen canton or quarter of the country of ATTICA, which is called the canton of the Philaides, after the name of this Philaus, where Pisistratus was borne. And it is sayed moreouer, that Solon (because he would throughly conuince the MEGARIANS) did alleage that the SALAMINIANS buried not the dead after the MEGARIANS manner, but after the ATHENIANS manner. For in MEGARA they burie the dead with their faces to the East: and in ATHENS their faces are towards the West. Yet Hereas the Megarian denieth it saying that the MEGARIANS did burie them

The manner of buriall with the Megarians & the Athenians.

also with their faces towards the West: alleadging moreouer, that at ATHENS euery corse had his owne beere or coffin by it selfe, & that at MEGARA they did put three or foure corses together. They say also there were certeine oracles of Apollo Pythias, which did greatly helpe Solon, by which the god called SALAMINA, IONIA. Their strife was iudged by fiue Arbitrators, all SPARTANS borne: that is to say, Critolaidas, Amompharetus, Hypsechidas, Anaxilas, & Cleomenes. Solon vndoutedly wonne great glory & honour by this exployte, yet was he much more honoured & esteemed, for the oration he made in defence of the temple of Apollo, in the citie of DELPHES: declaring that it was not meete to be suffered, that the CYRRHÆIANS should at their pleasure abuse the sanctuarie of the oracle, & that they should ayde the DELPHIANS in honour and reuerence of Apollo. Whereupon the counsell of the Amphictyons, being moued with his words and persuasions, proclaymed warres against the CYRRHÆIANS: as diuers others do witnesse, and especially Aristotle, in the storie he wrote of those that wanne the Pythian games, where he ascribeth vnto Solon the honour of that determination. Neuertheless Hermippus sayeth, Solon was not made generall of their armie, as Euanthes Samian hath written. For AEschines the Orator wrote no such thing of him: & in the chronicles of the DELPHIANS they find, that one Alcmæon, & not Solon, was the generall of the ATHENIANS. Now the citie of ATHENS had a long time beene vexed and troubled through Cylons haynous offence, euer since the yere that Megacles (gouernour of the citie of ATHENS) did with fayre words handle so the confederats of the rebellion of Cylon, which had taken sanctuarie within the liberties of the temple of Minerua: that he perswaded them to be wise, and to present themselues before the iudges, holdinge by a threed, which they should tye about the base of the image of the goddesse where shee stoode, because they should not lose their libertie. But when they were come to the place of the honorable goddesses so called (which be the images of the furies) comming downe to present themselues before the iudges, the threed brake of it selfe. Then Megacles, and other officers his companions, layed hold on them presently, saying that it was a manifest signe that the goddesse Minerua refused to saue the. So those they tooke, and all they could lay hands on, were immediately stoned to death without the citie: the rest which tooke the altars for refuge, were slaine there also. And none were saued, but such as had made meanes to the gouernours wiues of the cittie, to intreate for them: which from that time forth were euer hated of the people, and commonly called the abiects and excommunicates. Who being the issues of the rebelles that rose with Cylon, chanced to rise againe in credit, & growing to great authoritie, they neuer left quarelling & fighting continually with the offspring of Megacles. These factiõs were greatest & highest in Solons time: who being of authoritie, & seeing the people thus diuided in two partes, he stepped in betweene them, with the chiefest men of ATHENS, & did so persuade, & intreate those whom they called the abiects & excõmunicates, that they were contented to be iudged. So three hundreth of the chiefest citizens were chosen iudges to heare this matter. The accuser was Myron Phlyeian. This matter was heard and pleaded, & by sentence of the iudges, the excommunicats were condemned. Those that were aliue, to perpetuall exile: & the bones of them that were dead, to be digged vp, & throwẽ out of the confines of the territorie of ATHENS. But whilest the cittie of ATHENS was occupied with these vprores, the MEGARIANS wisely caught holde of the occasion deliuered, and set vpon the ATHENIANS, tooke frõ them the hauen of NISÆA & recouered againe out of their handes the Ile of SALAMINA. Furthermore, all the cittie was possessed with a certaine superstitious feare: for some sayed, that sprites were come againe, and straunge sightes were seene. The prognosticators also sayed, they perceiued by their sacrifices the cittie was defiled with some abhominable & wicked things, which were of necessitie to be purged and throwen out. Hereupon, they sent into CRETA for Epimenides Phæstian, whom they reckoned the seuenth of the wise men, at the least such as will not alowe Periander for one of the number. He was a holy and deuoute man, and very wise in celestiall thinges, by inspiration from aboue: by reason whereof, men of his time called him the new Curetes, that is to say, Prophet: and he was thought the sonne of a Nimphe called Balté. When he was come to ATHENS, and growen in friendshippe with Solon: he did helpe him much, and made his waye for establishing of his lawes. For he acquainted the ATHENIANS to make their sacrifices much lighter, and of leſſe coſt: and brought the citizēs to be more moderate in their mourning, with cutting off certaine ſeuere and barbarous ceremonies, which the moſt parte of women obſerued in their mourning, and he ordeined certen ſacrifices which he would haue done immediately after the obſequies of the dead. But that which exceeded all the reſt was, that by vſing the citizens vnto holines & deuotion, daily ſacrifices, prayers vnto the godds, purging of themſelues, & humble offerings: he wan mens hartes by litle & litle, to yeeld them more cōfirmable to iuſtice, and to be more inclined to cōcord & vnitie. It is reported alſo that Epimenides whē he ſaw the hauen of Munychia, & had long conſidered of it: told thoſe about him, that men were very blind in foreſeing things to come. For if the ATHENIANS, (ſayd he) knew what hurt this hauē would bring thē: they would eate it as (they ſay) with their teeth. It is ſayed alſo that Thales did prognoſticate ſuch alike thing, who after his death commaunded they ſhould burie his bodie, in ſome vile place of no reckoning, within the territorie of the MILESIANS, ſaying that one day there ſhould be the place of a citie. Epimenides therefore being maruelouſly eſteemed of euerie man for theſe cauſes, was greatly honoured of the ATHENIANS, and they offered him great preſents of mony and other things, but he would take nothing, and only prayed them to giue him a bough of the holy oliue: which they graunted him, and ſo he returned ſhortely home into CRETA. Now that this ſedition of Cylon was vtterly appeaſed in ATHENS, for that the excommunicates were baniſhed the country: the citie fell againe into their olde troubles and diſſentions about the gouernment of the common weale: & they were deuided into ſo diuers partes and factions, as there were people of ſundry places & territories within the coūtrie of ATTICA. For there were the people of the mountaines, the people of the vallies, and the people of the ſea coaſt. Thoſe of the mountaines, tooke the cōmon peoples part for their liues. Thoſe of the valley, would a few of the beſt citizens ſhould carie the ſway. The coaſte men would that neither of them ſhould preuaile, becauſe they would haue had a meane gouernmēt & mingled of them both. Furthermore, the faction betwene the poore & rich, proceeding of their vnequalitie, was at that time very great. By reaſon whereof the citie was in great daunger, and it ſeemed there was no way to pacifie or take vp theſe controuerſies, vnles ſome tyrant happened to riſe, that would take vpon him to rule the whole. For all the cōmon people were ſo ſore indebted to the rich, that either they plowed their lands, and yeelded them the ſixt part of their croppe: (for which cauſe they were called Hectemori, and ſeruants) or els they borowed mony of them at vſurie, vpon gage of their bodies to ſerue it out. And if they were not able to pay them, then were they by the law deliuered to their creditours, who kept them as bondmen and ſlaues in their houſes, or els they ſent them into ſtraunge coūtries to be ſold: and many euen for very pouertie were forced to ſel their owne children (for there was no law to forbid the contrarie) or els to forſake their citie & country, for the extreame cruelty & hard deling of theſe abominable vſurers their creditors. Inſomuch that many of the luſtieſt & ſtowteſt of thē, banded together in cōpanies, & incouraged one another, not to ſuffer & beare any longer ſuch extremitie, but to chooſe them a ſtoute & truſty captaine, that might ſet them at libertie, and redeeme thoſe out of captiuity, which were iudged to be bondmen & ſeruants, for lacke of paying of their debts at their dayes appoynted: & ſo to make againe a new diuiſion of all landes and enements, and wholy to chaūge and turne vp the whole ſtate and gouernment. Then the wiſeſt men of the citie, who ſaw Solon only neither partner with the rich in their oppreſſion, neither partaker with the poore in their neceſſitie: made ſute to him, that it would pleaſe him to take the matter in hand and to appeaſe and pacifie all theſe broyles and ſedition. Yet Phanias Leſbian writeth, that he vſed a ſubtiltie, whereby he deceiued both the one and the other ſide, concerning the cōmon weale. For he ſecretly promiſed the poore to deuide the lands againe: & the rich alſo, to confirme their couenants & bargaines. How ſoeuer it fell out, it is very certain that Solon frō the beginning made it a great matter, & was very ſcrupulous to deale betwene them: fearing the couetouſnes of the one, & arrogancie of the other. Howbeit in the end he was choſen gouernour after Philōbrotus, & was made reformer of the rigour of the lawes, & the tēperer of the ſtate & cōmō weale, by cōſent & agreemēt of both parties. The rich accepted him, becauſe he was no begger: the poore did alſo like him, becauſe he was an honeſt man. They ſay moreouer, that one word & ſentēce which he ſpake (which at that preſent was rise in euery mans mouth) that equalitie did breede no strife: did aswell please the rich and wealthie, as the poore and needie. For the one sort conceiued of this word equalitie, that he would measure all things according to the qualitie of the man: and the other tooke it for their purpose, that he would measure all things by the number, and by the polle only. Thus the captaines of both factions perswaded and prayed him, boldly to take vpon him that soueraigne authoritie, sithence he had the whole citie now at his commaundement. The netters also of euery parte, when they saw it very hard to pacifie these things with law and reason, were well content that the wisest, and honestest man, should alone haue the royall power in his handes. Some say also that there was such an oracle of Apollo:

Sitt thou at helme, as gouernour to steere to guide our course, and rule the rowling shippe, for thou shalt see, full many Athenians there, will take thy parte, and after thee will trippe.

Solon refuseth to be a tyrant. Tymondas, & Pittacus tyrants.

But his familiar friendes aboue all rebuked him, saying he was to be accompted no better then a beast, if for feare of the name of tyrant, he would refuse to take vpon him a Kingdome which is the most iust and honorable state, if one take it vpon him that is an honest man. As in olde time, Tinnondas made himselfe King of those of Negrepont, with their consent: and as Pittacus was then presently of those of Metelin. Notwithstanding, all these goodly reasons could not make him once alter his opinion. And they say that he answered his friendes, that principalitie and tirannie, was indeede a goodly place: howbeit there was no way for a man to get out, when he was once entered into it. And in certaine verses that he wrote to Phocus, thus he sayde:

Solons answer for tyranny.

I neither blush, nor yet repent my selfe, that haue preserude, my natiue soyle alwaies, and that therin (to hourde vp trash and pelfe) no tyrants thought, could once eclypse my praise.
No might could moue, my mind to any wrong, which might beblot, the glory of my name: for so I thought, to liue in honour long, and farre excell all other men for fame.

Hereby appeareth plainely, that euen before he was chosen reformer of the state, to stablish new lawes: he was then of great countenance and authoritie. But he himselfe writeth, that many sayed of him thus, after he had refused the occasion of vsurping of this tyranne:

Sure Solon was a foole, and of a bashfull mind that would refuse the great good happe, which godds to him assignde.
The praye was in his handes, yet darst hee neuer draw, the net therefore: but stood abasht, and like a dastard dawe.
For had not that so bene, he would (for one dayes reigne, to be a kinge in Athens towne) himselfe (all quicke) haue slaine.
And eke subuerted quite, his familie withall,
So sweete it is to rule the rost, yclad in princely pall.

Thus brought he common rumor to taber on his head. Now, notwithstanding he had refused the kingdome, yet he waxed nothing the more remisse nor soft therefore in gouerning, neither would he bow for feare of the great, nor yet would frame his lawes to their likeing, that had chosen him their reformer. For where the mischiefe was tollerable, he did not straight plucke it vp by the rootes: neither did he so change the state, as he might haue done, least if he should haue attempted to turne vpside down the whole gouernment, he might afterwards haue bene neuer able to settle and stablish the same againe. Therefore he only altered that, which he thought by reason he would persuade his citizens vnto, or els by force he ought to compell them to accept, mingling as he sayd, sowre with sweet, and force with iustice. And herewith agreeth his answer that he made afterwards vnto one that asked him, if he had made the best lawes he could for the Athenians? yea sure, sayth he, such as they were to receiue. And this that followeth also, they haue euer since obserued in the Athenian tong: to make certe things pleasant, that be hatefull, finely conueying them vnder colour of pleasing names. As calling whores, lemans: taxes, contributions: garrisons, gardes: prisons, houses. And all this came vp first by Solons inuētiō, who called cleering of debts, Seisachtheian: in English, discharge. For the first change & reformation he made in gouernment was this: he ordeined that all manner of debts past should be cleere, and nobody should aske his debtor any thing for the time past. That no man should thenceforth lend money out to vsurie, vpon couenants for the body to be bound, if it were not repayed. Howbeit some write (as Androtion among other) that the poore were cōtēted that the interest onely for vsury should be moderated, without taking away the whole debt: & that Solon called this easie & gentle discharge, Seisachtheian with crying vp the value of mony. For he raysed the pound of siluer, being before but three score and thirteene Drachmes, full vp to an hundred: so they which were to pay great summes of money, payed by tale as much as they ought, but with lesse number of peeces then the debt could haue bene payed when it was borrowed. And so the detters gained much, & the creditours lost nothing. Neuertheles the greater part of them which haue written the same, say, that this crying vp of money, was a generall discharge of all debts, conditions, & couenantes vpon the same: whereto the very poemes themselues, which Solon wrote, do seeme to agree. For he glorieth, & breaketh forth in his verses, that he had taken away all bawks & markes that separated mens lands through the country of ATTICA: & that now he had set at libertie, that which before was in bondage. And that of the cittizens of ATHENS, which for lack of payment of their debts had bene condēned for slaues to their creditours, he had brought many home againe out of strange cōtries, where they had bene so long, that they had forgotten to speake their naturall tongue: & other which remained at home in captiuitie, he had now set them all at good libertie. But while he was in doing this, men say a thing thwarted him, that troubled him maruellously. For hauing framed an Edict for clearing of al debts, and lacking only a litle to grace it with words, and to giue it some pretie preface, that otherwise was ready to be proclaymed: he opened him selfe some what to certaine of his familiars whom he trusted (as Conon, Clinias, and Hipponicus) & told them how he would not medle with lands and possessions, but would onely cleere and cut off all maner of debts. These men before the proclamatiō came out, went presently to the mony men, & borrowed great summes of mony of them, & layed it out straight vpon land. So when the proclamation came out, they kept the landes they had purchased, but restored not the mony they had borrowed. This fowle part of theirs made Solon very ill spoken of, & wrōgfully blamed: as if he had not only suffered it, but had bene partaker of this wrong & iniustice. Notwithstanding he cleared himselfe of this slaunderous report, losing fiue talents by his owne law. For it was well knowne that so much was due vnto him, & he was the first that following his owne proclamation, did clearly release his debtors of the same. Other say he was owing fifteene talents: and among the same, Polyxēlus the Rhodian is one that affirmeth it. Notwithstanding they euer after called Solons friendes, Greocopides, cutters of debts. This law neither liked the one nor the other sort. For it greatly offended the rich, for cancelling their bonds: and it much more misliked the poore, because all landes and possessions they gaped for, were not made againe common, and euery body a like rich and wealthie, as Lycurgus had made the LACEDÆMONIANS. But Lycurgus was the eleuēth descended of the right line from Hercules, & had many yeres bene king of LACEDÆMON, where he had gotten great authoritie, and made himself many friends: all which things together, did greatly help him to execute that, which he wisely had imagined for the order of his common weale. Yet also, he vsed more persuasion then force, a good witnes thereof the losse of his eye: preferring a law before his priuate iniurie, which hath power to preserue a citie long in vnion and concorde, and to make cittizens to be neither poore nor rich. Solon could not attaine to this, for he was borne in a popular state, & a man but of meane wealth: Howbeit he did what he could possible, with the power he had, as one seeking to win no credit with his cittizēs, but onely by his counsaile. Now, that he got the ill will of the greater part of the cittie, by his proclamation which he made: he himselfe doth witnesse it saying:

Euen those which earst, did beare me frendly face, and spake full fayer, where euer I them met:

Things hateful made pleasant with sweete wordes.

Cleering of debts, Solons first law.

Neuertheles he sayeth immediatly after, that with the same authoritie and power he had, a man possibly

Could not controll, the peoples mindes:
nor still their braynes, which wrought like windes.

But shortly after, hauing a feeling of the benefite of his ordinance, and euery one forgetting his priuate quarrell: they altogether made a common sacrifice, which they called the sacrifice of Seisachthia, or discharge, and chose Solon generall reformer of the law, and of the whole state of the cõmon weale, without limiting his power, but referred all matters indifferently to his will. As the offices of state, common assemblies, voyces in election, iudgments in iustice, and the bodie of the Senate. And they gaue him also full power and authoritie, to sesse and taxe any of thẽ, to appoint the number, what time the sesse should continue, and to keepe, confirme, and disanull at his pleasure, any of the auncient lawes and customes then in being. To begin withall, he first tooke away all Dracons blouddie lawes, sauing for murther, and manslaughter, which were too seuere & cruel. For almost he did ordaine but one kind of punishment, for all kind of faultes and offences which was death. So that they which were condemned for idlenes, were iudged to dye. And pety larceny, as robbing mens hortyards, & gardens of frute, or herbes, was as seuerely punished: as those who had committed sacriledge or murder. Demades therefore encountered it pleasantly, when he sayed: that Dracons lawes were not written with inck, but with bloud. And Draco himselfe being asked one day, why his punishmẽts were so vnequall, as death for all kind of faultes: he answered. Because he thought the least offence worthie so much punishment: and for the greatest: he found none more grieuous. Then Solon being desirous to haue the chiefe offices of the citie to remaine in rich mens handes, as already they did, and yet to mingle the authoritie of gouernment in such sort, as the meaner people might beare a litle sway, which they neuer could before: he made an estimate of the goodes of euery priuate cittizen. And those which he found yerely worth fiue hundreth bushells of corne, and other liquide frutes and vpwardes, he called Pentacosiomedimnes. as to say, fiue hundreth bushell men of reuenue. And those that had three hundred bushells a yere, and were able to keepe a horse of seruice, he put in the second degree, and called them knightes. They that might dispend but two hundreth bushells a yere, were put in the third place, & called Zeugites. All other vnder those, were called Thetes, as ye would say, hierlings, or craftes men liuing of their labour: whome he did not admit to beare any office in the citie, neither were they taken as free citizens, sauing they had voyces in elections, and assemblies of the citie, and in iudgments, where the people wholy iudged. This at the first seemed nothing, but afterwards they felt it was to great purpose, for hereby the most part of priuate quarrelles and strifes that grew among them, were in the end layed open before the people. For he suffered those to appeale vnto the people, which thought they had wrong iudgment in their cause. Furthermore because his lawes were written somewhat obscurely, and might be diuersely taken and interpreted: this did giue a great deale more authoritie and power to the iudges. For, considering all their controuersies could not be ended, and iudged by expresse lawe: they were driuen of necessitie alwaies to runne to the iudges, and debated their maters before them. In so much as the iudges by this meanes came to be somewhat aboue the lawe: for they did euen expound it as they would themselues. Solon selfe doth note this equall diuision of the publicke authoritie, in a place of his poesies, where he sayeth.

Such power haue I giuen, to common peoples hand, as might become their meane estate, with equitie to stande:
and as I haue not pluckt, from them their dignitie, so haue I not too much increast, their small authoritie.
Vnto the rich likewise, I haue allowed no more, then well might seeme (in iust conceit) sufficient for their store.

And

And ſo I haue for both prouided in ſuch wiſe, that neither ſhall each other wrong, nor ſeeme for to deſpiſe.

Yet conſidering it was meete to prouide for the pouertie of the common ſorte of people: he ſuffered any man that would, to take vpon him the defence, of any poore mans caſe that had the wrong. For if a man were hurt, beaten, forced, or otherwiſe wronged: any other man that would, might lawfully ſue the offendour, and proſecute lawe againſt him. And this was a wiſe lawe ordeined of him, to accuſtome his citizens to be ſorie one for anothers hurt, and ſo to feele it, as if any part of his owne body had bene iniured. And they ſay he made an anſwer on a time agreeable to this law. For, being asked what citie he thought beſt gouerned: he anſwered. That citie where ſuch as receiue no wrong, do as earneſtly defend wrong offered to other, as the very wrong and iniury had bene done vnto themſelues He erected alſo the counſell of the Areopagites, of thoſe magiſtrates of the citie, out of which they did yeerely chooſe their gouernour: and he himſelfe had bin of that number, for that he had bin gouernour for a yeare. Wherfore perceiuing now the people were growne to a ſtomack, and haughtineſſe of minde becauſe they were cleare diſcharged of their debts: he ſet one vp for matters of ſtate, another counſell of an hundred choſen out of euery tribe, whereof foure hundred of them were to conſult and debate of all matters, before they were propounded to the people: that when the great counſell of the people at large ſhould be aſſembled, no matters ſhould be put forth, vnles it had bin before well conſidered of, & digeſted, by the counſell of the foure hundred. Moreouer, he ordeined the higher court ſhould haue the chiefe authoritie and power ouer all things, and chiefly to ſee the lawe executed and maintained: ſuppoſing that the common weale being ſetled, and ſtayed with theſe two courts (as with two ſtrong anker holdes) it ſhould be the leſſe turmoiled and troubled, and the people alſo better pacified and quieted. The moſt part of writers hold this opinion, that it was Solon which erected the counſaile of the Areopagites, as we haue ſaid, and it is very likely to be true, for that Dracon in all his lawes and ordinances made no manner of mention of the Areopagites, but alwayes ſpeaketh to the Ephetes (which were iudges of life and death) when he ſpake of murther, or of any mans death. Notwithſtanding, the eight law of the thirteenth table of Solon ſaith thus, in theſe very words. All ſuch as haue bene baniſhed or detected of naughty life, before Solon made his lawes, ſhalbe reſtored againe to their goods and good name, except thoſe which were condemned by order of the counſaile of the Areopagites, or by the Ephetes, or by the Kings in open courte, for murther, and death of any man, or for aſpiring to vſurpe tyrannie. Theſe words to the contrarie ſeeme to proue and teſtifie, that the counſell of the Areopagites was, before Solon was choſen reformer of the lawes. For how could offenders and wicked men be condemned, by order of the counſell of the Areopagites before Solon, if Solon was the firſt that gaue it authoritie to iudge? vnleſſe a man will ſay peraduenture, that he would a litle helpe the matter of his lawes which were obſcure and darke, and would ſupply that they lacked, with expounding of the ſame by them. Thoſe which ſhall be found attainted and conuicted of any matter, that hath bene heard before the counſell of the Areopagites, the Ephetes, or the gouernours of the citie when this law ſhall come forth: ſhall ſtand condemned ſtill, and all other ſhall be pardoned, reſtored, and ſet at libertie. Howſoeuer it is, ſure that was his intent and meaning. Furthermore amongſt the reſt of his lawes, one of them indeed was of his owne deuiſe: for the like was neuer ſtabliſhed elſe where. And it is that lawe, that pronounceth him defamed, and vnhoneſt, who in a ciuill vprore among the citizens, ſitteth ſtill a looker on, and a neuter, and taketh part with neither ſide. Whereby his minde was as it ſhould appeare, that priuate men ſhould not be only carefull to put themſelues and their cauſes in ſafetie, nor yet ſhould be careleſſe for other mens matters, or thinke it a vertue not to medle with the miſeries and miſfortunes of their countrie, but from the beginning of euery ſedition that they ſhould ioyne with thoſe that take the iuſteſt cauſe in hand, and rather to hazard themſelues with ſuch, then to tarie looking (without putting themſelues in daunger) which of the two ſhould haue the victorie. There is another lawe alſo, which at the firſt ſight me thinketh is very vnhoneſt and fond. That if any man according to the lawe hath matched with a riche heire and inheritour, and of himſelfe is impotent, and vnable to do the office of a husband, ſhe may lawfully lie with any whom ſhe liketh, of her husbands neareſt kinſemen. Howbeit ſome affirme, that it is a wiſe made lawe for thoſe, which knowing themſelues vnmeete to entertaine wedlocke, will for couetouſneſſe of lands, mary with riche heires and poſſeſsioners, and minde to abuſe poore gentlewomen vnder the colour of lawe: and will thinke to force and reſtraine nature. For, ſeeing the lawe ſuffereth an inheritour or poſſeſſioner thus ill beſtowed, at her pleaſure to be bolde with any of her husbands kinne: men will either leaue to purchaſe ſuch mariages, or if they be ſo careleſſe that they will needs mary, it ſhalbe to their extreame ſhame and ignominie, and ſo ſhall they deſeruedly pay for their greedie couetouſneſſe. And the lawe is well made alſo, becauſe the wife hath not ſcope to all her husbands kinſemen, but vnto one choice man whome ſhe liketh beſt of his houſe: to the ende that the children that ſhall be borne, ſhalbe at the leaſt of her husbands bloud and kindred. This alſo confirmeth the ſame, that ſuch a new maried wife ſhould be ſhut vp with her husband, and eate a quince with him: and that he alſo which marieth ſuch an inheritour, ſhould of duetie ſee her thriſe a moneth at the leaſt. For although he get no children of her, yet it is an honour the husband doth to his wife, arguing that he taketh her for an honeſt woman, that he loueth her, and that he eſteemeth of her. Beſides, it taketh away many miſlikings and diſpleaſures which oftentimes happen in ſuch caſes, and keepeth loue and good will waking, that it dye not vtterly betweene them. Furthermore, he tooke away all ioynters and dowries in other mariages, and willed that the wiues ſhould bring their husbands but three gownes onely, with ſome other litle moueables of ſmall value, and without any other thing as it were: vtterly forbidding that they ſhould buie their husbands, or that they ſhould make marchandiſe of mariages, as of other trades to gaine, but would that man and woman ſhould marrie together for vſhe, for pleaſure, and for loue, but in no caſe for money. And for proofe hereof, Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILE, one day anſwered his mother (which would needes be maried to a young man of SYRACVSA) in this ſort. I haue power (ſaieth he) to breake the lawes of SYRACVSA, by hauing the Kingdome: but to force the lawe of nature, or to make mariage without the reaſonable compaſſe of age, that paſſeth my reache and power. So is it not tollerable, and much leſſe allowable alſo, that ſuch diſorder ſhould be in well ordered cities, that ſuch vncomely and vnfit mariages ſhould be made, betweene couples of ſo vnequall yeares: conſidering there is no meete nor neceſſarie ende of ſuch matches. A wiſe gouernour of a citie, or a iudge and reformer of lawes and manners, might well ſaye to an olde man that ſhould marie with a young maide, as the Poet ſaieth of Philoctetes:

Solon forbiddeth iointers and dowries.

Dionyſius ſaying of mariages.

Ah ſillie wretche, how trim a man art thou, at theſe young yeares, for to be maried now?

And finding a young man in an olde riche womans houſe, getting his liuing by riding of her errants, and waxing fat as they ſay the Partridge dooth by treading of the hennes: he may take him from thence, to beſtowe him on ſome young maide that ſhall haue neede of a husband. And thus much for this matter. But they greatly commend another lawe of Solons, which forbiddeth to ſpeake ill of the dead. For it is a good and godly thing to thinke, that they ought not to touche the dead, no more than to touche holy things: and men ſhould take great heed to offend thoſe that are departed out of this world, beſides it is a token of wiſedome and ciuilitie, to beware of immortall enemies. He commanded alſo in the ſelfe ſame lawe, that no man ſhould ſpeake ill of the liuing, ſpecially in Churches, during diuine ſeruice, or in counſell chamber of the citie, nor in the Theaters whileſt games were a playing: vpon paine of three ſiluer *Drachmes to be paied to him that was iniured, and two to the common treaſurie. For he thought it too much ſhamleſſe boldneſſe, in no place to keepe in ones choller, and moreouer, that ſuch lacked ciuilitie and good manners: and yet altogether to ſuppreſſe and ſmother it, he knew it was not onely a harde matter, but to ſome natures vnpoſſible. And he that maketh lawes, muſt haue regarde to the common poſsibilitie of men, if he will puniſh litle, with profitable example, and not much without ſome profit. So was he maruelouſlie well thought of, for the lawe that he made touching wils and teſtaments. For before, men might not lawfully make their heyres whom they would, but the goods came to the children or kindred of the teſtatour. But he leauing it at libertie, to diſpoſe their goods where they

they thought good, ſo they had no children of their owne: did therein preferre friendſhip before kindred, and good will and fauour before neceſſitie and conſtrainte, and ſo made euery one lorde and maiſter of his owne goods. Yet he did not ſimply and a like allowe all ſorts of giftes, howſoeuer they were made: but thoſe onely which were made by men of ſound memorie, or by thoſe whoſe wittes failed them not by extreame ſickneſſe, or through drinkes, medicines, poyſonings, charmes, or other ſuch violence and extraordinarie meanes, neither yet through the intiſements and perſwaſions of women. As thinking very wiſely, there was no difference at all betweene thoſe that were euidently forced by conſtraint, and thoſe that were compaſſed and wrought by ſubornation at length to do a thing againſt their will, taking fraude in this caſe equall with violence, and pleaſure with ſorrow, as paſſions with madneſſe, which commonly haue as much force the one as the other, to drawe and driue men from reaſon. He made another lawe alſo, in which he appointed women their times to go abroade into the fields, their mourning, their feaſts and ſacrifices, plucking from them all diſorder and wilfull libertie, which they vſed before. For he did forbid that they ſhould carie out of the citie with them aboue three gownes, and to take victuals with them aboue the value of an halfe pennie, neither basket nor pannier aboue a cubite high: and ſpecially he did forbid them to go in the night, other then in their coche, and that a torche ſhould be caried before them. He did forbid them alſo at the buriall of the dead, to teare and ſpoile themſelues with blowes, to make lamentations in verſes, to weepe at the funerals of a ſtranger not being their kinſeman, to ſacrifice an oxe on the graue of the dead, to burie aboue three gownes with the corſe, to go to other mens graues, but at the very time of burying the corſe: all which or the moſt part of them, are forbidden by our lawes at this day. Moreouer, thoſe lawes appoint a penaltie vpon ſuch women as offend in the ſame, to be diſtrained for, by certaine officers expreſſely named, to controll and reforme the abuſes of women, as womaniſh perſons and fainte harted, which ſuffer themſelues to be ouercome with ſuch paſſions and fondneſſe in their mourning. And perceiuing that the citie of ATHENS began to repleniſh dayly more and more, by mens repairing thither from all parts, and by reaſon of the great aſſured ſafetie, and libertie that they found there: and alſo conſidering howe the greateſt parte of the Realme became in manner heathy, and was very barren, and that men traffequing the ſeas, are not wonte to bring any marchandiſe to thoſe, which can giue them nothing againe in exchange: he began to practiſe that his citizens ſhould giue themſelues vnto crafts and occupations, and made a lawe, that the ſonne ſhould not be bound to relieue his father being olde, vnleſſe he had ſet him in his youth to ſome occupation. It was a wiſe part of Lycurgus (who dwelt in a citie where was no reſorte of ſtrangers, and had ſo great a territorie, as could haue furniſhed twiſe as many people, as Euripides ſaith, and moreouer on all ſides was enuironed with a great number of ſlaues of the ILOTES, whom it was needfull to keepe ſtill in labour and worke continually) to haue his citizens alwaies occupied in exerciſes of feates of armes, without making them to learne any other ſcience, but diſcharged them of all other miſerable occupations and handy crafts. But Solon framing his lawes vnto things and not things vnto lawes, when he ſaw the countrie of ATTICA ſo leane and barren, that it could hardly bring forth to ſuſtaine thoſe that tilled the ground onely, and therefore much more impoſſible to keepe ſo great a multitude of idle people as were in ATHENS: thought it very requiſite to ſet vp occupations, and to giue them countenance and eſtimation. Therefore he ordeined, that the counſell of the Areopagites, ſhould haue full power and authoritie to enquire how euery man liued in the citie, and alſo to puniſh ſuch as they found idle people, and did not labour. But this was thought too ſeuere and ſtraight a lawe, which he ordained (as Heraclides Ponticus writeth) that the children borne of common harlots and ſtrumpets ſhould not be bound to relieue their fathers. For he that maketh no accompt of matrimonie, plainely ſheweth that he tooke not a wife to haue children, but onely to ſatiſfie his luſt and pleaſure: and ſo ſuch an one hath his luſt reward, and is diſappointed of the reuerence that a father ought to haue of his children, ſince through his owne faulte the birth of his childe falleth out to his reproche. Yet to ſay truly, in Solons lawes touching women, there are many abſurdities, as they fall out ill fauoredly. For he maketh it lawfull for any man to kill an adulterer taking him with the fact. But he that rauiſheth or forciblie taketh away a free woman, is onely condemned to pay a hundred ſiluer *drachmes. And he that was the Pandor to procure her, ſhould only pay twentie drachmes. Vnleſſe ſhe had bene a common ſtrumpet or curtiſan: for ſuch do iuſtifie open acceſſe, to all that will hire them. Furthermore, he doth forbid any perſon to ſell his daughters or ſiſters, vnleſſe the father or brother had taken them, abuſing themſelues before mariage. Me thinketh it is farre from purpoſe and reaſon with ſeueritie to puniſh a thing in one place, and ouer lightly to paſſe it ouer in another: or to ſet ſome light fine on ones head for a great fault, and after to diſcharge him, as it were but a matter of ſporte. Vnleſſe they will excuſe it thus, that money being very hard and ſcante at that time in ATHENS, thoſe fines were then very great and grieuous to pay. For in ſetting out the charges of offerings which ſhould be made in ſacrifices, he appointed a weather to be a conuenient offering, and he ſetteth a buſſhell of corne at a ſiluer drachme. More he ordained, that they which wunne any of the games at ATHENS, ſhould pay to the common treaſurie an hundred drachmes. And thoſe that wunne any of the games Olympicall, fiue hundred drachmes. Alſo he appointed that he which brought a he woolfe, ſhould haue fiue drachmes, & him one drachme for reward of a ſhe woolfe. Wherof as Demetrius Phalerian writeth: the one was the price of an oxe, and the other of a mutton. For, touching the rates he ordained in the ſixteenth table of his lawes meete for burnt ſacrifices, it is likely he did rate them at a much higher price, then ordinarily they were worth: and yet notwithſtanding, the price which he ſetteth, is very litle in compariſon of that which they are worth at this day. Now it was a cuſtome euer amongſt the ATHENIANS to kill their woolues, becauſe all their countrie laye for paſture, and not for tillage. Some there be that ſay, the tribes of the people of ATHENS haue not bene called after the names of the children of Ion, as the common opinion hath bene: but that they were called after their diuers trades and manners of liuing, which they tooke themſelues vnto from the beginning. For, ſuch as gaue themſelues vnto the warres, were called Oplites: as who would ſay, men of armes. Thoſe that wrought in their occupations, were called Ergades: as much to ſay, as men of occupation. The other two which were husbandmen, & followed the plough, were called Teleontes: as you would ſay, labouring men. And thoſe that kept beaſts and cattell, were called Ægicores: as much to ſay, as heard men. Now, foraſmuch as the whole prouince of ATTICA was very drye, and had great lack of water, being not full of riuers, running ſtreames, nor lakes, nor yet ſtored with any great number of ſprings, in ſo much as they are driuen there to vſe (through the moſt part of the countrie) water drawne out of welles made with mens hands: he made ſuch an order, that where there was any Well within the ſpace of an Hippicon, that euery body within that circuite, might come and draw water only at that Well, for his vſe and neceſſitie. Hippicon is the diſtaunce of foure furlongs, which is halfe a mile: and thoſe that dwelt further off, ſhould go ſeeke their water in other places where they would. But if they had digged ten yardes deepe in their ground, and could finde no water in the bottome, in this caſe, they might lawfully go to their next neighbours well, and take a pot full of water containing ſixe gallons, twiſe a day: iudging it great reaſon that neceſſitie ſhould be holpen, but not that idleneſſe ſhould be cheriſhed. He appointed alſo the ſpaces that ſhould be kept and obſerued by thoſe, that would ſet or plant trees in their ground, as being a man very skilfull in theſe matters. For he ordained, that whoſoeuer would plante any kinde of trees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them fiue foote a funder one from another: but for the figge tree and olyue tree ſpecially, that they ſhould in any caſe be nine foote a ſunder, becauſe theſe two trees do ſpread out their branches farre off, and they cannot ſtand neere other trees, but they muſt needs hurt them very much. For beſides that they drawe away the ſame that doth nouriſh the other trees, they caſt alſo a certaine moiſture and ſteame vpon them, that is very hurtfull and incommodious. More he ordained, that whoſoeuer would digge a pit or hole in his ground, he ſhould digge it as farre off from his neighbours pit, as the pit he digged was in depth to the bottome. And he that would ſet vp a hiue of bees in his ground, he ſhould ſet them at the leaſt three hundred foote from other hiues ſet about him before. And of the frutes of the earth, he was contented they ſhould tranſporte and ſell onely oyle out of the Realme to ſtrangers, but no other frute or graine. He ordained that the gouernour uernour of the citie ſhould yearely proclaime open curſes againſt thoſe that ſhould doe to the contrarie, or elſe he himſelfe making default therein, ſhould be fined at a hundred drachmes. Drachma. This ordinance is in the firſt table of Solons lawes, and therefore wee may not altogether diſcredite thoſe which ſay, they did forbid in the olde time that men ſhould carie figges out of the countrie of ATTICA, and that from thence it came that theſe picke thankes, which bewray and accuſe them that tranſported figges, were called Sycophantes. He made another law alſo againſt the hurt that beaſtes might doe vnto men. Wherein he ordeined, that if a dogge did bite any man, he that ought him ſhould deliuer to him that was bitten, his dogge tyed to a logge of timber of foure cubites long: and this was a very good deuiſe, to make men ſafe from dogges. But he was very ſtraight in one lawe he made, that no ſtranger might be made denizen and free man of the citie of ATHENS, vnleſſe he were a baniſhed man for euer out of his countrie, or elſe that he ſhould come and dwell there with all his family, to exerciſe ſome craft or ſcience. Notwithſtanding, they ſay he made not this lawe ſo much to put ſtraungers from their freedome there, as to drawe them thither, aſſuring them by this ordinance, they might come and be free of the citie: and he thought moreouer, that both the one & the other would be more faithfull to the common weale of ATHENS. The one of them, for that againſt their wils they were driuen to forſake their countrie: and the other ſort, for that aduiſedly and willingly they were contented to forſake it. This alſo was another of Solons lawes, which he ordeined for thoſe that ſhould feaſt certaine dayes at the towne houſe of the citie, at other mens coſt. For he would not allow, that one man ſhould come often to feaſts there. And if any man were inuited thither to the feaſt, and did refuſe to come: he did ſet a fine on his head, as reproouing the miſerable niggardlineſſe of the one, and the preſumptuous arrogancie of the other, to contemne & deſpiſe common order. Feaſtes for townes men in the towne hall of Athens. After he had made his lawes, he did ſtabliſh them to continue for the ſpace of one hundred yeares, and they were written in tables of wood called Axones, which were made more long then broad, in the which they were grauen: whereof there remaine ſome monuments yet in our time, which are to be ſeene in the towne hall of the citie of ATHENS. Ariſtotle ſayth, that theſe tables were called Cyrbes. And Cratinus alſo the Comicall poet ſayth in one place, of Solon and Dracon: that Cyrbes was a veſſell or pan wherin they did frie millet or hirſe. Howbeit others ſay, that Cyrbes properly were the tables, which conteined the ordinances of the ſacrifices: and Axones were the other tables, that concerned the common weale. So, all the counſels & magiſtrates together did ſweare, that they would keepe Solons lawes themſelues, and alſo cauſe them to be obſerued of others throughly & particularly. Axones. Cyrbes. Then euery one of the Theſmothetes (which were certaine officers attendant on the counſell, and had ſpeciall charge to ſee the lawes obſerued) did ſolemnly ſweare in the open market place, neere the ſtone where the proclamations are proclaimed: and euery of them both promiſed, and vowed openly to keepe the ſame lawes, and that if any of them did in any one point breake the ſaid ordinances, then they were content that ſuch offender ſhould pay to the tẽple of Apollo, at the citie of DELPHES, an image of fine golde, that ſhould waigh as much as himſelf. Theſmothetes. Moreouer, Solon ſeeing the diſorder of the moneths, and the mouing of the moone, which followed not the courſe of the ſunne, and vſed not to riſe & fal when the ſunne doth, but oft times in one day, it doth both touch and paſſe the ſunne: he was the firſt that called the chaunge of the moone, Ene caì néa, as much to ſay, as olde and new moone. Allowing that which appeared before the coniunction, to be of the moneth paſt: and that which ſhewed it ſelfe after the coniunction, to be of the moneth following. And he was the firſt alſo (in my opinion) that vnderſtoode Homer rightly, when he ſayd: then beginneth the moneth when it endeth. The day following the chaunge, he called Neomenia, as much to ſay, as the new moneth, or the newe moone. After the twenty day of the moneth which they called Icada, he reckoned not the reſt of the moneth, as increaſing, but as in the wane: & gathered it by ſeeing the light of the moone decreaſing vntill the thirtie day. Now after his lawes were come abroad, and proclaimed, there came ſome daily vnto him, which either praiſed them, or miſliked them: & praied him either to take away, or to adde ſome thing vnto them. Many againe came and asked him, how he vnderſtoode ſome ſentence of his lawes: and requeſted him to declare his meaning, and how it ſhould be taken. Wherfore conſidering how it were to no purpoſe to refuſe to do it, & againe how it would get him much enuie and ill will to yeelde thereunto: hee determined (happen what would) to wind himselfe out of these bryers, and to flie the gronings, complaints, and quarrels of his citizens. For he sayth himselfe:

Full hard it is, all mindes content to haue, and specially in matters hard and graue.

So, to conuey himselfe a while out of the way, he tooke vpon him to be master of a shippe in a certaine voyage, and asked licence for ten yeares of the ATHENIANS to goe beyonde sea, hoping by that time the ATHENIANS would be very well acquainted with his lawes. So went he to the seas, & the first place of his arriuall was in EGYPT, where he remained a while, as he himselfe sayth.

Euen there where Nylus, with his crooked crancks

He went to his booke there, and did conferre a certaine time with Psenophis Heliopolitan, and Sonchis Saitan, two of the wisest priestes at that time that were in EGYPT: whom when he heard rehearse the storie of the Iles ATLANTIDES as Plato writeth, he proued to put the same into verse, and did send it abroad through GREECE. At his departure out of EGYPT he went into CYPRVS, where he had great courtesie and friendship of one of the princes of that countrie, called Philocyprus, who was lord of a pretie litle citie which Demophon (Theseus son) caused to be built vpon the riuer of Clarie, and was of a goodly strong situation, but in a very leane and barren countrie. Whereupon Solon told him, it would do better a great deale to remoue it out of that place, into a very fayre and pleasant valley that lay vnderneath it, and there to make it larger and statelier then it was: which was done according to his perswasion. And Solons selfe being present at it, was made ouerseer of the buildings, which he did helpe to deuise and order in good sort, aswell in respect of pleasure, as for force and defence: insomuch as many people came from other places to dwell there. And herein many other lordes of the countrie did follow the example of this Philocyprus, who to honour Solon, called his citie SOLES, which before was called ÆPIA. Solon in his Elegies maketh mention of this foundation, directing his words vnto Philocyprus, as followeth.

Clarius fl.

ÆPia called Soles.

So graunt the goddes, that thou, and thine offspring may clyme to great and passing princely state: long time to liue, in Soles flourishing.
And that they graunt, my shippe and me good gate when I from hence, by seas shall take my way:
that with her harpe, dame Venus doe vouchsafe my selfe againe, into my countrie safe.

Since I haue bene, the onely meane and man, which here to build, this citie first began.

And as for the meeting and talke betwixt him & king Cræsus, I know there are that by distance of time will proue it but a fable, and deuised of pleasure: but for my part I wil not reiect, nor condemne so famous an historie, receiued & approued by so many graue testimonies. Moreouer it is very agreeable to Solons maners & nature, and also not vnlike to his wisdom & magnanimity: although in all points it agreeth not with certaine tables (which they call Chronicles) where they haue busily noted the order and course of times which euen to this day, many haue curiously sought to correct, and could yet neuer discusse it, nor accord all contrarieties & manifest repugnances in the same. Solon at the desire and request of Cræsus, went to see him in the citie of SARDIS. When Solon was come thither, he seemed to be in the selfe same taking that a man was once reported to be: who being borne and bred vp on the maine land, and had neuer seene the sea neither farre nor neere, did imagine euery riuer that he sawe had bene the sea. So Solon passing alongst Cræsus palace, and meeting by the way many of the lordes of his Court richly apparelled, and carying great traines of seruing men, and souldiers about them: thought euer that one of them had bene the King, vntill hee was brought vnto Cræsus selfe. silkes, silkes, layd on with curious goldsmithes worke,& all to shew himselfe to Solon in most stately, sumptuous, and magnificent manner. Who perceiuing by Solons repayre to his presence, that he shewed no manner of signe,nor countenance of wondring, to see so great a state before him, neither had giuen out any worde neere or likely to that which Cræsus looked for in his owne imagination,but rather had deliuered speeches for men of iudgement & vnderstanding to know, how inwardly he much did mislike Cræsus foolish vanitie & base mind: then Cræsus commanded all his treasuries to be opened where his gold and siluer lay,next that they should shewe him his rich and sumptuous wardroppes, although that needed not: for to see Cræsus selfe,it was enough to discerne his nature and condition. After he had seene all ouer and ouer, being brought againe vnto the presence of the King:Cræsus asked him,if euer he had seene any man more happy than himselfe was? Solon answered him,I haue: and that was one Tellus a citizen of ATHENS, who was a maruellous honest man,and had left his children behind him in good estimation,and wel to liue,& lastly,was most happy at his death,by dying honorably in the field,in defence of his countrie. Cræsus hearing this answere, began to iudge him a man of litle wit,or of grosse vnderstanding, because he did not thinke that to haue store of gold & siluer,was the only ioy & felicitie of the world, and that he would preferre the life & death of a meane & priuate man as more happie,than all the riches & power of so mightie a King. Notwithstanding all this,Cræsus yet asked him againe: What other man beside Tellus he had seene happier than himselfe? Solon answered him,that he had seene Cleobis & Biton,which were both brethren, and loued one another singularly well, and their mother in such sort: that vpon a solemne festiual day,when she should go to the temple of Iuno in her couch drawen with oxen: because they taried too long ere they could be brought, they both willingly yoaked themselues by the neckes,& drue their mothers couch in stead of the oxen,which maruellously reioyced her,and she was thought most happy of all other,to haue borne two such sonnes. Afterwards when they had done sacrifice to the goddesse, & made good cheere at the feast of this sacrifice, they went to bed: but they rose not againe the next morning, for they were found dead without suffering hurt or sorow,after they had receiued so much glorie and honour. Cræsus then could no longer bridle in his patience, but breaking out in choller,said vnto him: why, doest thou recken me than in no degree of happie men? Solon would neither flatter him,nor further increase his heate, but aunswered him thus: O King of LYDIANS, the goddes haue giuen vs GRECIANS all things in a meane, and amongst other things chiefly, a base and popular wisedome, not princely nor noble: which, considering how mans life is subiect to infinite chaunges,doth forbid vs to trust or glorie in these worldly riches. For time bringeth daily misfortunes vnto man,which he neuer thought of,nor looked for.But when the goddes haue continued a mans good fortune to his end,then we thinke that man happy & blessed,and neuer before. Otherwise, if we should iudge a man happie that liueth, considering he is euer in danger of chaunge during life: we should be much like to him, who iudgeth him the victory before hand,that is still a fighting,and may be ouercome,hauing no suertie yet to carie it away. After Solon had spoken these wordes, he departed from the Kings presence, and returned backe againe, leauing King Cræsus offended, but nothing the wiser, nor amended. Now AEsope that wrote the fables,being at that time in the citie of SARDIS,& sent for thither by the King,who entertained him very honorably: was very sory to see that the King had giuen Solon no better entertainment: so by way of aduise he said vnto him. O Solon, either wee must not come to princes at all, or else we must seeke to please and content them.But Solon turning it to the contrarie, aunswered him: either we must not come to princes, or els wee must needes tell them truely, and counsell them for the best. So Cræsus made light account of Solon at that time. But after he had lost the battell against Cyrus, and that his citie was taken, him selfe became prisoner, and was bound fast to a gibbet, ouer a great stake of wood, to be burnt in the sight of all the PERSIANS, and of Cyrus his enemie: he then cryed out as lowde as he could, thrise together. O Solon. Cyrus being abashed, sent to aske him, whether this Solon he onely cryed vpon in his extreme miserie, was a god or man. Cræsus kept it not secret from him, but said: he was one of the wise men of GRECE, whom I sent for to come vnto me on a certaine time, not to learne any thing of him which I stood in neede of, but only that he might witnes my felicitie, which then I did enioy: the loſſe whereof is now more hurtfull, than the enioying of the ſame was good or profitable. But now (alas) too late I knowe it, that the riches I poſſeſſed then, were but words and opinion, all which are turned now to my bitter ſorrow, and to preſent & remedileſſe calamitie. Which the wiſe GRECIAN conſidering then, and foreſeeing a farre off by my doings at that time, the inſtant miſerie I ſuffer now: gaue me warning I ſhould marke the end of my life, and that I ſhould not too farre preſume of my ſelfe, as puffed vp then with vaine glorie of opinion of happines, the ground thereof being ſo ſlipperie, and of ſo litle ſuertie. Theſe words being reported vnto Cyrus, who was wiſer than Cræſus, & ſeeing Solons ſaying confirmed by ſo notable an example: he did not only deliuer Cræſus from preſent perill of death, but euer after honoured him ſo long as he liued. Thus had Solon glorie, for ſauing the honor of one of theſe Kings: and the life of the other, by his graue & wiſe counſell. But during the time of his abſence, great ſeditions roſe at ATHENS amongeſt the inhabitantes, who had gotten them ſeuerall heads amongſt them: as thoſe of the vallie had made Lycurgus their head. The coaſt men, Megacles, the ſonne of Alcmæon. And thoſe of the mountaines, Piſiſtratus: with whom all artificers & crafts men liuing of their handie labour were ioyned, which were the ſtowteſt againſt the rich. So that notwithſtanding the citie kept Solons lawes & ordinances, yet was there not that man but gaped for a chaunge, and deſired to ſee things in another ſtate: either parties hoping their condition would mend by chaunge, and that euery of them ſhould be better than their aduerſaries. The whole common weale broyling thus with troubles, Solon arriued at ATHENS, where euery man did honour and reuerence him, howbeit hee was no more able to ſpeake alowde in open aſſembly to the people, nor to deale in matters as he had done before, becauſe his age would not ſuffer him: & therefore he ſpake with euery one of the heads of the ſeuerall factions a part, trying if he could agree & reconcile them together againe. Whereunto Piſiſtratus ſeemed to be more willing then any of the reſt, for he was courteous, and maruellous fayre ſpoken, and ſhewed him ſelfe beſides, very good & pitifull to the poore, and temperate alſo to his enemies: further, if any good qualitie were lacking in him, he did ſo finely counterfeate it, that men imagined it was more in him, than in thoſe that naturally had it in them in deede. As to be a quiet man, no medler, contented with his owne, aſpiring no higher, and hating thoſe which would attempt to chaunge the preſent ſtate of the common weale, and would practiſe any innouation. By this art and fine manner of his, hee deceiued the poore common people. Howbeit Solon found him ſtraight, and ſaw the marke he ſhot at: but yet hated him not at that time, and ſought ſtill to winne him, and bring him to reaſon, ſaying oft times, both to him ſelfe, and to others. That who ſo could plucke out of his head the worme of ambition, by which hee aſpired to be the chiefeſt, and could heale him of his greedie deſire to rule: there could not be a man of more vertue, or a better citizen than hee would proue. About this time began Theſpis to ſet out his tragedies, which was a thing that much delighted the people for the rareneſſe thereof, being not many Poets yet in number, to ſtriue one againſt another for victorie, as afterwards there were. Solon being naturally deſirous to heare and learne, and by reaſon of his age ſeeking to paſſe his time away in ſportes, in muſicke, and making good cheere more then euer he did: went one day to ſee Theſpis, who playd a part himſelfe, as the old faſhion of the Poets was, and after the play was ended, he called him to him, & asked him: if he were not aſhamed to lye ſo openly in the face of the world. Theſpis anſwered him, that it was not materiall to doe or ſay any ſuch things, conſidering all was but in ſport. Then Solon beating the ground with his ſtaffe he had in his hand: but if we cõmend lying in ſport (quoth he) we ſhall finde it afterwards in good earneſt, in all our bargaines and dealings. Shortly after Piſiſtratus hauing wounded himſelfe, and bloudied all his bodie ouer, cauſed his men to carie him in his couch into the market place, where he put the people in an vproare, and told them that they were his enemies that thus traiterouſly had handled and arraied him, for that he ſtood with them about the gouerning of the common weale: inſomuch as many of them were maruellouſly offended, and mutined by & by, crying out it was ſhamefully done. Then Solon drawing neere ſaid vnto him, O thou ſonne of Hippocrates, thou doeſt ill fauouredly counterfeate the perſon of Homers Vlyſſes: for thou haſt whipped thy ſelfe to deceiue thy citizens, as he did teare & ſcratch him ſelf, to deceiue his enemies. this, the common people were ſtill in vprore, being ready to take armes for Piſiſtratus: and there was a generall counſell aſſembled, in the which one Ariſton ſpake, that they ſhould graunt fifty men, to cary holdbers and maſes before Piſiſtratus for guard of his perſon. But Solon going vp into the pulpit for orations, ſtoutly inuayed againſt it: and perſwaded the people with many reaſons, like vnto theſe he wrote afterwards in verſe.

Ech one of you (ô men) in priuate actes, can play the foxe, for ſlie and ſubtill craft:
But when you come, yfore (in all your factes) then are you blinde, dull witted and bedaft, For pleaſaunt ſpeach, and painted flatterie, beguile you ſtill, the which you neuer ſpie.

But in the end, ſeeing the poore people did tumult ſtill, taking Piſiſtratus part, and that the rich fled here and there, he went his way alſo, ſaying: he had ſhewed him ſelfe wiſer then ſome, and hardier then other. Meaning, wiſer then thoſe which ſaw not Piſiſtratus reach and fetch: and hardier then they which knew very well he did aſpire to be King, and yet neuertheleſſe durſt not reſiſt him. The people went on with the motion of Ariſton, and authoriſed the ſame, touching the graunt of holbelders: limiting no number, but ſuffered him to haue about him and to aſſemble, as many as he would, vntill ſuch time as he had gotten poſſeſſion of the caſtle. Then the city was maruellouſly affraide and amazed: and preſently Megacles, and all thoſe which were of the houſe of the Alcmeonides did flie. Solon, who for yeares was now at his laſt caſt, and had no man to ſticke vnto him: went notwithſtanding into the market place, and ſpake to the citizens whom he found there, and rebuked their beaſtlineſſe, and faint cowardly harts, and encouraged them not to loſe their liberty. He ſpake at that time notably, and worthy memory, which euer after was remembred. Before, ſaid he, you might more eaſely haue ſtaide this preſent tyranny: but now that it is already faſhioned, you ſhal winne more glory, vtterly to ſuppeſſe it. But for all his goodly reaſons, he found no man that would hearken to him, they were all ſo amazed. Wherefore he hied him home againe, and tooke his weapons out of his houſe, and laid them before his gate in the middeſt of the ſtreete, ſaying. For my part, I haue done what I can poſſible, to helpe and defend the lawes and liberties of my countrey. So from that time he betooke him ſelfe vnto his eaſe, and neuer after dealt any more in matters of ſtate, or common weale. His friends did counſell him to flie: but all they could not perſwade him to it. For he kept his houſe, and gaue him ſelfe to make verſes: in which he ſore reproued the ATHENIANS faults, ſaying: Solons liberty and conſtancy.

If preſently, your burden heauy be, yet murmur not againſt the goddes therefore.
The fault is yours, as you your ſelues may ſee, which graunted haue of mighty Mars the lore to ſuch as now, by your direction doe hold your neckes, in this ſubiection.

His friends hereupon did warne him, to beware of ſuch ſpeaches, and to take heede what he ſaid: leaſt if it came vnto the tyrants eares, he might put him to death for it. And further, they asked him wherin he truſted, that he ſpake ſo boldly. He aunſwered them, in my age. Howbeit Piſiſtratus after he had obtained his purpoſe, ſending for him vpon his worde and faith, did honour and entertaine him ſo well, that Solon in the end became one of his counſell, and approoued many things which he did. For Piſiſtratus him ſelfe did ſtraightly keepe, and cauſed his friends to keepe Solons lawes. Inſomuch as when he was called by proces into the court of the Areopagites for a murther, euen at that time when he was a tyrant: he preſented him ſelfe very modeſtly to aunſwer his accuſation, and to purge him ſelfe thereof. But his accuſer let fall the matter, and followed it no further. Piſiſtratus him ſelfe alſo did make new lawes: as this. That he that had bene maymed, and made lame of any member in the warres, ſhould be maintained all his life long, at the common charges of the city. The ſelfe ſame was before decreed by Therſippus (as Heraclides writeth) by Solons perſwaſion: who did preferre it to the counſell. Piſiſtratus afterwards tooke hold of the motion, and from thence A good law for reward of ſeruice.

forth made it a generall law. Theophraſtus ſaith alſo, it was Piſiſtratus, and not Solon, that made the law for idleneſſe: which was the only cauſe that the countrey of ATTICA became more frutefull, being better manured: and the city of ATHENS waxed more quiet. But Solon hauing begon to write the ſtory of the Iles ATLANTIDES in verſe (which he had learned of the wiſe men of the city of SAIS in EGYPT, and was very neceſſary for the ATHENIANS) grew weary, and gaue it ouer in mid way: not for any matters or buſines that trobled him, as Plato ſaid, but only for his age, and becauſe he feared the tediouſneſſe of the worke. For otherwiſe he had leyſure enough, as appeareth by theſe verſes where he ſaith:

I grow old, and yet I learne ſtill.

And in another place where he ſaieth,

Now Venus yeelds me ſweete delights, and Bacchus lends me comfort ſtill: the Muſes eke, refresh my ſprights, and much relieue my weary will.
Theſe be the pointes of perfect eaſe, which all mens mindes oft times do pleaſe.

Plato afterwards for beautifying of the ſtory and fables of the Iles of ATLANTIDES, was deſirous to dilate them out at length, as if he would by way of ſpeach haue broken vp a field or lay land of his owne, or that this gift had deſcended to him of right from Solon. He began to raiſe vp a ſtately front vnto the ſame, and encloſed it with high walles, and large ſquared courts at the entry thereof: ſuch was it, as neuer any other worke, fable or poeticall inuention had euer ſo notable, or the like. But becauſe he began a litle too late, he ended his life before his work, leauing the readers moſt ſorrowfull for that was left vnwritten, then they toke pleaſure in that they found written. For euen as in the city of ATHENS, the temple of Iupiter Olympian only remained vnperfect: ſo the wiſedome of Plato (amongeſt many goodly matters of his that haue come abroad) left none of them vnperfect, but the only tale of the Iles ATLANTIDES. Solon liued long time after Piſiſtratus had vſurped the tyranny, as Heraclides Ponticus writeth. Howbeit Phanias Epheſian writeth, that he liued not aboue two yeares after. For Piſiſtratus vſurped tyrannicall power in the yeare that Comias was chiefe gouernour in ATHENS. And Phanias writeth, that Solon died in the yeare that Hegeſtratus was gouernour, which was the next yeare after that. And where ſome ſay, the aſhes of his body were after his death ſtrawed abroade through the Ile of SALAMINA: that ſeemeth to be but a fable, and altogether vntrue. Neuertheleſſe it hath bene written by many notable authors, and amongeſt others, by Ariſtotle the Philoſopher.

The end of Solons life.

THE LIFE OF PVBLIVS

Valerius Publicola.

NOW we haue declared what Solon was, we haue thought good to compare him with Publicola, to whom the ROMAINE people for an honour gaue that ſurname: for he was called before Publius Valerius, deſcended from that auncient Valerius, who was one of the chiefeſt workers and meanes, to bring the ROMAINES and the SABINES that were mortall enemies, to ioyne together as one people. For it was he that moſt moued the two Kings to agree, and ioyne together. Publicola being deſcended of him, whileſt the Kings did rule yet at ROME, was in very great eſtimation, as well for his eloquence as for his riches: vſing the one rightly and freely for the maintenaunce of iuſtice, and the other liberally and curteouſly, for the reliefe of the poore. So that it was manifeſt, if the Realme came to be conuerted into a publicke ſtate, he ſhould be one of the chiefeſt men of the ſame. It chanced that King Tarquine ſurnamed the proude, being come to the crowne by no good lawfull meane, but contrarily by indirect and wicked waies, and behauing him ſelfe not like a King, but like a cruell tyrant; the people much hated and deteſted him, by reaſon of the death of Lucretia (which killed her ſelfe for that ſhe was forcibly rauiſhed by him) and ſo the whole city roſe and rebelled againſt him. Lucius Brutus taking vpon him to be the head and captaine of this inſurrection and rebellion, did ioyne firſt with this Valerius: who did greatly fauour and aſſiſt his enterpriſe, and did helpe him to driue out king Tarquine with all his houſe and family. Now whileſt they were thinking that the people would chooſe ſome one alone to be chiefe ruler ouer them, in ſtead of a king: Valerius kept him ſelfe quiet, as yelding willingly vnto Brutus the firſt place, who was meeteſt for it, hauing bene the chiefe authour and worker of their recouered liberty. But when they ſaw the name of Monarchy (as much to ſay, as ſouerainty alone) was diſpleaſant to the people, and that they would like better to haue the rule deuided vnto two, and how for this cauſe they would rather chooſe two Conſuls: Valerius then beganne to hope, he ſhould be the ſecond perſon with Brutus. Howbeit this hope failed him: For againſt Brutus will, Tarquinius Collatinus (the husband of Lucretia) was choſen Cõſul with him: not becauſe he was a man of greater vertue, or of better eſtimation then Valerius. But the noble men of the city fearing the practises of the Kings abroade, which sought by all the faire and flattering meanes they could to returne againe into the citie: did determine to make such a one Consull, whom occasion forced to be their hard and heauie enemie, perswading themselues that Tarquinius Collatinus would for no respect yeeld vnto thē. Valerius tooke this matter grieuously, but they had a mistrust in him, as if he would not do any thing he could, for the benefit of his countrie: notwithstanding he had neuer any priuate iniurie offered him by the tyrants. Wherefore, he repaired no more vnto the Senate to pleade for priuate men, and wholy gaue vp to meddle in matters of state: in so much as he gaue many occasion to thinke of his absence, and it troubled some men much, who feared least vpon this his misliking and withdrawing, he would fall to the Kings side, and so bring all the citie in an vprore, considering it stoode then but in very tickle termes. But when Brutus, who stood in iealousie of some, would by oth be assured of the Senate, and had appointed them a day solemnely to take their othes vpon the sacrifices: Valerius then with a good cheerefull countenaunce came into the market place, and was the first that tooke his oth he would leaue nothing vndone that might preiudice the Tarquines, but with all his able power he would fight against them, and defend the liberty of the city. This oth of his maruellously reioyced the Senate, and gaue great assuraunce also to the Consuls, but specially, because his deedes did shortly after performe his wordes. For there came ambassadours to ROME which brought letters from king Tarquine, full of sweete and lowly speaches to win the fauour of the people, with commission to vse all the mildest meanes they could, to dulce and soften the hardened harts of the multitude: who declared how the King had left all pride & cruelty, and ment to aske nought but reasonable things. The Consuls thought best to giue them open audience, and to suffer them to speake to the people. But Valerius was against it, declaring it might perill the state much, and deliuer occasion of new sturre vnto a multitude of poore people, which were more affraide of warres, then of tyranny. After that, there came other ambassadours also, which saide that Tarquine would from thenceforth for euer giue ouer and renounce his title to the kingdome, and to make any more warres, but besought them only, that they would at the least deliuer him and his friends their money and goods, that they might haue wherwithall to keepe them in their banishment. Many came on a pace, and were very ready to yeeld to this request, and specially Collatinus, one of the Consuls who did fauour their motion. But Brutus that was a fast and resolute man, and very fierce in his heart, ranne immediatly into the market place, crying out that his fellow Consull was a traytour, and contented to graunt the tyraunts matter, and meanes to make warre vpon the city, where in deede they deserued not so much, as to be relieued in their exile. Hereupon the people assembled together, and the first that spake in this assembly, was a priuat man called Gaius Minutius, who speaking vnto Brutus, and to the whole assembly, said vnto them. O noble Consul and Senate, handle so the matter, that the tyraunts goods be rather in your custody to make warre with them, then in theirs, to bring warre vpon your selues. Notwithstanding the ROMAINS were of opinion, that hauing gotten the liberty, for which they fought with the tyrants: they should not disappoint the offered peace, with keeping backe their goods, but rather they should throw their goods out after them. Howbeit this was the least part of Tarquines intent, to seeke his goods againe: but vnder pretence of that demaund, he secretly corrupted the people, and practised treason, which his ambassadours followed, pretending only to get the Kings goods and his fauourers together, saying, that they had already sold some part, and some part they kept, and sent them daily. So as by delaying the time in this sort with such pretences, they had corrupted two of the best and auncientest houses of the city: to wit, the family of the Aquilians, whereof there were three Senatours: and the family of the Vitellians, whereof there were two Senatours: all which by their mothers, were Consul Collatinus nephewes. The Vitellians also were allied vnto Brutus, for he had maried their own sister, and had many children by her. Of the which the Vitellians had drawen to their string, two of the eldest of them, because they familiarly frequented together, being cosin germains: whom they had intised to be of their conspiracy, allying them with the house of the Tarquines, which was of great power, & through the which they might perswade themselues to rise to great honour and preferment by meanes of the Kings, rather then to trust to truſt to their fathers wilfull hardneſſe. For they called his ſeueritie to the wicked, hardneſſe: for that he would neuer pardon any. Furthermore Brutus had fained himſelfe madde, and a foole of long time for ſafetie of his life, becauſe the tyrantes ſhould not put him to death: ſo that the name of Brutus onely remained. After theſe two young men had giuen their conſent to be of the confederacie, and had ſpoken with the Aquilians: they all thought good to be bound one to another, with a great and horrible othe, drinking the bloude of a man, and ſhaking hands in his bowels, whom they would ſacrifice. This matter agreed vpon between them, they met together to put their ſacrifice in execution, in the houſe of the Aquilians. They had fitly pickt out a darke place in the houſe to do this ſacrifice in, and where almoſt no body came: yet it happened by chaunce, that one of the ſeruants of the houſe called Vindicius, had hidden him ſelfe there, vnknowing to the traitours, and of no ſet purpoſe, to ſpie and ſee what they did, or that he had any manner of inckling thereof before: but falling by chaunce vpon the matter, euen as the traitours came into that place with a countenance to do ſome ſecret thing of importance, fearing to be ſeene, he kept him ſelfe cloſe, and lay behinde a coffer that was there, ſo that he ſawe all that was done, and what they ſaid and determined. The concluſion of their counſell in the ende was this, that they would kill both the Conſuls: and they wrote letters to Tarquinius aduertiſing the ſame, which they gaue vnto his ambaſſadours, being lodged in the houſe of the Aquilians, & were preſent at this concluſion. With this determination they departed from thence, and Vindicius came out alſo as ſecretly as he could, being maruellouſly troubled in minde, and at a maze how to deale in this matter. For he thought it dangerous (as it was in deed) to go and accuſe the two ſonnes vnto the father (which was Brutus) of ſo wicked and deteſtable a treaſon, and the nephewes vnto their vncle, which was Collatinus. On the other ſide alſo, he thought this was a ſecret, not to be imparted to any priuate perſon, and not poſſible for him to conceale it, that was bounde in duetie to reueale it. So he reſolued at the laſt to go to Valerius to bewraye this treaſon, of a ſpeciall affection to this man, by reaſon of his gentle and courteous vſing of men, giuing eaſie acceſſe and audience vnto any that came to ſpeake with him, and ſpecially for that he diſdained not to heare poore mens cauſes. Vindicius being gone to ſpeake with him, and hauing tolde him the whole conſpiracie before his brother Marcus Valerius, and his wife, he was abaſhed and fearefull withall: whereupon he ſtaied him leaſt he ſhould ſlip away, and locked him in a chamber, charging his wife to watche the doore, that no body went in nor out vnto him. And willed his brother alſo, that he ſhould go and beſet the Kings palace round about, to intercept theſe letters if it were poſſible, and to ſee that none of their ſeruants fled. Valerius ſelfe being followed (according to his manner) with a great traine of his friends and people that waited on him, went ſtraight vnto the houſe of the Aquilians, who by chaunce were from home at that time: and entring in at the gate, without let or trouble of any man, he found the letters in the chamber, where king Tarquines ambaſſadours laye. Whileſt he was thus occupyed, the Aquilians hauing intelligence thereof, ranne home immediatly, and found Valerius comming out at their gate. So they would haue taken thoſe letters from him by force and ſtrong hand. But Valerius and his company did reſiſt them, and moreouer hudded them with their gownes ouer their heads, and by force brought them (do what they could) into the market place. The like was done alſo in the Kings palace, where Marcus Valerius found other letters alſo wrapt vp in certaine fardels for their more ſafe cariage, and brought away with him by force into the market place, all the Kings ſeruants he found there. There the Conſuls hauing cauſed ſilence to be made, Valerius ſent home to his houſe for this bondman Vindicius, to be brought before the Conſuls: then the traytours were openly accuſed, and their letters redde, and they had not the face to anſwer one worde. All that were preſent, being amazed, hung downe their heads, and beheld the ground, and not a man durſt once open his mouth to ſpeake, excepting a fewe, who to gratifie Brutus, began to ſay that they ſhould baniſh them: and Collatinus alſo gaue them ſome hope, becauſe he fell to weeping, and Valerius in like manner for that he held his peace. But Brutus calling his ſonnes by theyr names: come on (ſaid he) Titus and thou Valerius, why do you not aunſwer to that you are accuſed off? and hauing ſpoken thryſe vnto them to aunſwer, when he ſawe they ſtood mute, and said nothing: he turned him to the sergeants, and said vnto them. They are now in your hands, do iustice. So soone as he had spoken these words, the sergeants layde holde immediately vpon the two young men, and tearing their clothes off their backs, bound their hands behinde them, and then whipped them with roddes: which was such a pittifull sight to all the people, that they could not finde in their hearts to behold it, but turned them selues another waye, because they would not see it. But contrariwise, they say that their owne father had neuer his eye off them, neither did chaunge his austere and fierce countenance, with any pittie or naturall affection towards them, but stedfastly did beholde the punishment of his owne children, vntill they were laied flat on the ground, and both their heads striken off with an axe before him. When they were executed, Brutus rose from the benche, and left the execution of the rest vnto his fellow Consull. This was such an acte, as men cannot sufficiently prayse, nor reproue enough. For either it was his excellent vertue, that made his minde so quiet, or else the greatnesse of his miserie that tooke away the feeling of his sorowe: whereof neither the one nor the other was any small matter, but passing the common nature of man, that hath in it both diuinenesse, and somtime beastly brutishnesse. But it is better the iudgement of men should commend his fame, then that the affection of men by their iudgements should diminish his vertue. For the ROMAINES holde opinion, it was not so great an acte done of Romulus first to build ROME: as it was for Brutus to recouer ROME, and the best liberty thereof, and to renew the auncient gouernment of the same. When Brutus was gone, all the people in the market place remained as they had bene in a maze, full of feare and wonder, and a great while without speaking to see what was done. The Aquilians straight grew bold, for that they sawe the other Consul Collatinus proceede gently, and mildely against them: and so made petition they might haue time giuen them to aunswer to the articles they were accused of, and that they might haue their slaue and bondman Vindicius deliuered into their hands, because there was no reason he should remaine with their accusers. The Consull seemed willing to yeeld thereto, and was ready to breake vp the assembly therevpon. But Valerius said, he would not deliuer Vindicius (who was among the assembly that attended vpon his person) and stayed the people besides for departing away, least they should negligently let those escape that had so wickedly sought to betray their countrie. Vntill he himselfe had layed handes vpon them, calling vpon Brutus to assist him, with open exclamation against Collatinus, that he did not behaue himselfe like a iust and true man, seeing his fellow Brutus was forced for iustice sake to see his owne sonnes put to death: and he in contrarie manner, to please a few women, sought to let go manifest traitours, and open enemies to their countrie. The Consull being offended herewith, commanded they should bring away the bondman Vindicius. So the sergeants making way through the prease, layde hands vpon him to bring him away with them, and began to strike at them which offered to resist them. But Valerius friends stept out before them, and put them by. The people showted straight, & cried out for Brutus: who with this noise returned againe into the market place, and after silence made him, he spake in this wise. For mine owne children, I alone haue bene their sufficient iudge, to see them haue the law according to their deseruings: the rest I haue left freely to the iudgement of the people. Wherefore (said he) if any man be disposed to speake, let him stand vp, and persuade the people as he thinketh best. Then there needed no more words, but onely to hearken what the people cried: who with one voice and consent condemned them, & cried execution, & accordingly they had their heads striken off. Now was Consull Collatinus long before had in some suspition, as allied to the Kings, and disliked for his surname, because he was called Tarquinius: who perceiuing himselfe in this case much hated and mistrusted of the people, voluntarilye yeelded vp his Consulship, and departed the citie. The people assembling then themselues, to place a successour in his roome: they chose Valerius in his roome, without the contradiction of any, for his faithfull trauaile and diligence bestowed in this great matter. Then Valerius iudging that Vindicius the bondman had well deserued also some recompence, caused him not only to be manumissed by the whole graunt of the people, but made him a free man of the citie besides: and he was the first bondman manumissed, that was made citizen of ROME, with permission also to giue his voice in all elections of officers, in any company or tribe he would be enrolled in. Long time after that, and very lately, Appius to currie fauour with the common people, made it lawfull for bondmen manumisſed, to giue their voices alſo in elections, as other citizens did: and vnto this day the perfect manumiſſing and freeing of bondmen, is called Vindicta, after the name of this Vindicius, that was then made a free man. Theſe things thus paſſed ouer, the goods of the Kings were giuen to the ſpoile of the people, and their palaces were raced and ouerthrowne. Now amongſt other lands, the goodlieſt part of the field of Mars was belonging vnto king Tarquine: the ſame they conſecrated forthwith vnto the god Mars, and not long before they had cut downe the wheat thereof. The ſheaues being yet in ſhocks in the field, they thought they might not grinde the wheate, nor make any commoditie of the profit thereof: wherfore they threw both corne & ſheaues into the riuer, & trees alſo which they had hewen downe & rooted vp, to the end that the field being dedicated to the god Mars, ſhould be left bare, without bearing any frute at all. Theſe ſheaues thus throwne into the riuer, were caried downe by the ſtreame not far from thence, vnto a forde and ſhallowe place of the water, where they firſt did ſtaye, and did let the other which came after, that it could go no further: there theſe heapes gathered together, and lay ſo cloſe one to another, that they began to ſincke and ſettle faſt in the water. Afterwards the ſtreame of the riuer brought downe continually ſuch mud and grauell, that it euer increaſed the heape of corne more and more in ſuch ſorte, that the force of the water could no more remoue it from thence, but rather ſoftly preſſing and driuing it together, did firme and harden it, and made it growe ſo to land. Thus this heape riſing ſtill in greatneſſe and firmneſſe, by reaſon that all that came downe the riuer ſtaied there, it grewe in the end, and by time to ſpred ſo farre, that at this day it is called the holy Iland in Rome: in which are many goodly temples of diuerſe gods, and ſundry walkes about it, and they call it in Latine, Inter duos pontes: in our tongue, betweene the two bridges. Yet ſome write, that this thing fell not out at that time when the field of the Tarquines was conſecrated vnto Mars: but that it happened afterwards, when one of the Veſtall Nunnes, called Tarquinia, gaue a field of hers vnto the people, which was hard adioyning vnto Tarquines field. For which liberalitie and bountie of hers, they did graunt her in recompence many priuiledges, and did her great honour beſides. As amongſt others, it was ordained, that her word and witneſſe ſhould ſtand good, and be allowed, in matters iudiciall: which priuiledge, neuer woman beſides her ſelf did enioy. By ſpecial grace of the people alſo, it was granted her, that ſhe might mary if ſhe thought it good: but yet ſhe would not accept the benefit of that offer. Thus you heare the report how this thing happened. Tarquinius then being paſt hope of euer entring into his kingdome againe, went yet vnto the Thvscans for ſuccour, which were very glad of him: and ſo they leauied a great armie together, hoping to haue put him in his kingdome againe. The Conſuls alſo hearing thereof, went out with their armie againſt him. Both the armies preſented themſelues in battell raye, one againſt another, in the holy places conſecrated to the gods: whereof the one was called the wood Arſia, and the other the meadowe Æſuuia. And as both armies began to giue charge vpon each other, Arruns the eldeſt ſonne of king Tarquine, and the Conſull Brutus encountered together, not by chance, but ſought for of ſet purpoſe to execute the deadly fode and malice they did beare each other. The one, as againſt a tyraunt and enemie of the libertie of his countrie: the other, as againſt him that had bene chiefe authour and worker of their exile and expulſion. So they ſet ſpurres to their horſes, ſo ſoone as they had ſpyed each other, with more furie then reaſon, and fought ſo deſperately together, that they both fell ſtarke dead to the ground. The firſt onſet of the battell being ſo cruell, the end thereof was no leſſe bloudie: vntill both the armies hauing receiued and done like damage to each other, were parted by a maruellous great tempeſt that fell vpon them. Now was Valerius marueloully perplexed, for that he knew not which of them wanne the field that day: ſeeing his ſouldiers as ſorowfull for the great loſſe of their men lying dead before them, as they were glad of the ſlaughter and victorie of their enemies. For, to viewe the multitude of the ſlaine bodies of either ſide, the number was ſo equall in fight, that it was very hard to iudge, of which ſide fell out the greateſt ſlaughter: ſo that both the one and the other viewing by the eye the remaine of their campe, were perſwaded in their opinion, that they had rather loſt then wun, coniecturing a farre off the fall of their enemies. The night being come, such things fell out, as may be looked for after so terrible a battell. For when both campes were all laied to rest, they say the wood wherein they lay incamped, quaked and trembled: and they heard a voyce say, that onely one man more was slaine on the THSCANS side, than on the ROMAINES part. Out of doubt this was some voice from heauen: for the ROMAINES thereupon gaue a shrill shout, as those whose hearts receiued a new quickening spirit or courage. The THVSCANS on the contrarie part were so afraide, that the most part of them stole out of the campe, and scattered here and there: and there remained behinde about the number of fiue thousand men, whom the ROMAINES tooke prisoners euery one, & had the spoile of their campe. The carkasses were viewed afterwards, and they found that there were slaine in that battell, eleuen thousand and three hundred of the THVSCANS: and of the ROMAINES, so many lacking one. This battell was fought (as they say) the last day of Februarie, and the Consull Valerius triumphed, being the first of the Consuls that euer entered into ROME triumphing vpon a charret drawne with foure horses, which sight the people found honorable and goodly to behold, and were not offended withall (as some seeme to report) nor yet did enuie him for that he began it. For if it had bin so, that custome had not bin followed with so good acceptation, nor had continued so many yeares as it did afterwards. They much commended also the honor he did to his fellow Consul Brutus, in setting out his funerals and obsequies, at the which he made a funerall oration in his praise. They did so like and please the ROMAINES, that they haue euer since continued that custome at the buriall of any noble man, or great personage, that he is openly praised at his buriall, by the worthiest man that liueth among them. They report this funerall oration is far more ancient then the first, that was made in GREECE in the like case vnlesse they will confirme that which the orator Anaximenes hath written, that the manner of praising the dead at their funerals, was first of all instituted by Solon. But they did most enuie Valerius, and beare him grudge, because Brutus (whom the people did acknowledge for father of their liberty) would neuer be alone in office, but had procured twise, that they should appoint Valerius fellow consul with him. This man in contrariwise (said the people) taking vpon him alone the rule and soueraignty, sheweth plainly he wil not be Brutus successour in his Consulship, but Tarquinius self in the kingdom. For to great purpose was it to praise Brutus in words, and to follow Tarquinius in deeds: hauing borne before him selfe only all the maces, the axes and the rods, when he commeth abroade out of his owne house, which is far greater, & more stately, then the kings palace which he himselfe ouerthrew. And to say truly, Valerius dwelt in a house a little too sumptuously built and seated, vpon the hanging of the hill called mount Velia: & because it stood high, it ouerlooked all the market place, so that any man might easily see from thence what was done there. Furthermore, it was very ill to come to it: but when he came out of his house, it was a maruellous pompe and state to see him come downe from so high a place, and with a traine after him, that caried the maiestie of a Kings courte. But herein Valerius left a noble example, shewing how much it importeth a noble man and magistrate, ruling weighty causes, to haue his eares open to heare, and willingly to receiue free speache in steed of flatteries, and plaine troth in place of lyes. For, being enformed by some of his friends how the people misliked and complained of it, he stood not in his owne conceit, neither was angry with them: but forthwith set a world of workmen vpon it, early in the morning before breake of day, and commanded them to pluck downe his house, and to race it to the ground. Insomuch as the next day following, when the ROMAINES were gathered together in the market place, and saw this great sodaine ruine, they much commended the noble acte and minde of Valerius, in doing that he did: but so were they angry, and sory both, to see so faire and stately a built house (which was an ornament to the citie) ouerthrowne vpon a sodaine. Much like in comparison to a man, whom through spite and enuie they had vniustly put to death and to see their chiefe magistrate also, like a stranger and a vagabond, compelled to seeke his lodging in another mans house. For his friends receiued him into their houses, vntill such time as the people had giuen him a place, where they did build him a newe house, farre more orderly, and nothing so stately and curious as the first was, and it was in the same place, where the temple called Vicus Publicus standeth at this day. Now because he would not onely reforme his perſon, but the office of his Conſulſhippe, and alſo would frame himſelfe to the good acceptation and liking of the people: where before hee ſeemed vnto them to be fearefull, he put away the carying of the axes from the roddes, which the ſergeants vſed to beare before the Conſull. Moreouer when he came into the market place, where the people were aſſembled, he cauſed the roddes to be borne downewardes, as in token of reuerence of the ſoueraigne maieſtie of the people: which all the magiſtrates obſerue yet at this day. Now in all this humble ſhewe and lowlineſſe of his, hee did not ſo much imbaſe his dignitie and greatneſſe, which the common people thought him to haue at the firſt: as he did thereby cut off enuie from him, winning againe as much true authoritie, as in ſemblance hee would ſeeme to haue loſt. For this made the people willinger to obey, and readier to ſubmit themſelues vnto him: inſomuch as vpon this occaſion he was ſurnamed Publicola, as much to ſay, as the people pleaſer. Which ſurname he kept euer after, and we from henceforth alſo writing the reſt of his life, will vſe no other name: for he was contented to ſuffer any man that would, to offer him ſelfe to aske the Conſulſhippe in Brutus place. But he yet not knowing what kinde of man they would ioyne fellowe Conſull with him, and fearing leaſt through enuie or ignorance, the party might thwart his purpoſe and meaning: employed his ſole power and authoritie whileſt he ruled alone, vpon high and noble attempts. For firſt of all he ſupplyed vp the number of Senatours that were greatly decayed, becauſe King Tarquine had put ſome of them to death not long before, and other alſo had bene lately ſlaine in the warres: in whoſe places he had choſen new Senatours, to the number of a hundred three ſcore and foure. After that, he made newe decrees and lawes, which greatly did aduance the authoritie of the people. The firſt lawe gaue libertie to all offenders, condemned by iudgement of the Conſuls, to appeale vnto the people. The ſecond, that no man vpon paine of death ſhould take vpon him the exerciſe of any office, vnleſſe he had come vnto it by the gift of the people. The third was, and all in fauour of the poore, that the poore citizens of ROME ſhould pay no more cuſtome, nor any impoſt whatſoeuer. This made euery man the more willing to giue himſelfe to ſome craft or occupation, when he ſawe his trauell ſhould not be taxed, nor taken from him. As for the law that he made againſt thoſe that diſobeyed the Conſuls, it was found to be ſo fauourable to the cōmunaltie, as they thought it was rather made for the poore, than for the rich and great men. For the offenders and breakers of that law, were condemned to pay for a penaltie, the value of fiue oxen, and two muttons. The price of a mutton was then, ten oboles, and of an oxe, a hundred oboles. For in thoſe dayes, the ROMAINES had no ſtore of coined money, otherwiſe, they lacked no ſheepe, nor other rother beaſts. Hereof it came, that to this day they call their riches or ſubſtance, Peculium, becauſe Pecus ſignifieth ſheepe and muttons. And in the olde time the ſtampe vpon their money was an oxe, a mutton, or a hogge: & ſome of them called their childrē Bubulci, which ſignifieth cowheards: others Caprarij, to ſay goateheards: and others Porcij, as you would ſay, ſwineheardes. Now though in all his other lawes, he was very fauourable and temperate toward the people: yet in that moderation, ſometimes he did ſet grieuous paines and puniſhments. For he made it lawfull to kill any man without any accuſation, that did aſpire to the kingdome, and he did ſet the murderer free of all puniſhment: ſo he brought forth manifeſt proofe, that the partie ſlaine, had practiſed to make himſelfe King. As being impoſſible a man ſhould pretend ſo great a matter, and no man ſhould find it: and contrariwiſe being poſſible, albeit he were ſpyed, that otherwiſe he might attempt it, by making himſelfe ſo ſtrong, that he needed not paſſe for the law. In this caſe he gaue euery man libertie by ſuch act or meane, to preuent him if he could of diſcretion: who by ſtrength otherwiſe ſought to aſpire to reigne. They greatly commended him alſo for the law that he made touching the treaſure. For being very neceſſarie that euery priuate citizen ſhould according to his abilitie, bee contributer to the charges and maintenance of the warres: he himſelfe would neither take ſuch collection into his charge, nor ſuffer any man of his to meddle with the ſame, nor yet that it ſhould be laide in any priuate mans houſe, but he did ordeine that Saturnes temple ſhould be the treaſurie thereof. This order they keepe to this preſent day. Furthermore, he graunted the people to chuſe two young men Queſtores of the ſame, as you would ſay the treaſurers, to take the charge of this money:

and the two first which were chosen, were Publius Veturius, and Marcus Minutius, who gathered great summes of money together. For numbring the people by the polle, there were found a hundred and thirtie thousande persons which had payde subsidie, not reckoning in this account, orphans, nor widowes, which were excepted from all payments. After he had established all these things, he caused Lucretius (the father of Lucretia) to be chosen fellowe Consull with him, vnto whom, for that he was his auncient, hee gaue the vpper hande, and commaunded they should carrie before him the roddes, which were the signes of the chiefe magistrate: and euer since they haue giuen this honour vnto age. But Lucretius dying not long after his election, they chose againe in his place Marcus Horatius, who helde out the Consulshippe with Publicola the rest of the yeare. Nowe about that time King Tarquine remained in the countrie of THVSCANE, where he prepared a seconde armie against the ROMAINES, and there fell out a maruellous straunge thing thereupon. For when hee raigned king of ROME, he had almost made an ende of the building of the temple of Iupiter Capitolin, and was determined (whether by any oracle receiued, or vpon any fantasie it is not knowen) to set vp a couch of earth baked by a potter, in the highest place of the temple, and hee put it out to be done by certaine THVSCAN workemen of the citie of VEIES: but whilest they were in hand with the worke, he was driuen out of his Realme. When the workemen had formed this couch, and that they had put it into the furnace to bake it, it fell out contrarie to the nature of the earth, and the common order of their worke put into the furnace. For the earth did not shut and close together in the fire, nor dryed vp all the moisture thereof: but rather to the contrarie it did swell to such a bignesse, and grew so hard and strong withall, that they were driuen to breake vp the head and walles of the furnace to get it out. The soothsayers did expound this, that it was a celestiall token from aboue, and promised great prosperitie and increase of power vnto those, that should enioy this couch. Whereuppon the VEIANS resolued not to deliuer it vnto the ROMAINES that demaunded it, but aunswered that it did belong vnto King Tarquine, and not vnto those that had banished him. Not manie dayes after, there was a solemne feast of games for running of horses in the citie of VEIES, where they did also many other notable actes, worthy sight according to their custome. But after the game was playde, he that had wonne the bell, being crowned in token of victorie as they did vse at that time, brought his couch & horses faire and softly out of the shew place and sodainely the horse being affrayde vpon no present cause or occasion seene, whether it was by chance, or by some secret working from aboue, ranne as they had bene mad with their couch to the citie of ROME. The couch driuer did what he could possible at the first to stay them, by holding in the raynes, by clapping them on the backes, and speaking gently to them: but in the ende, perceiuing he could doe no good, and that they would haue their swinge, he gaue place to their furie, and they neuer linne running, till they brought him neere to the Capitoll, where they ouerthrewe him and his couch, not farre from the gate called at this present, Ratumena. The VEIANS wondering much at this matter, and being affrayde withall: were contented the workmē should deliuer their couch made of earth vnto the ROMAINES.

Lucretius & Publicola Consuls.

Publicola and Marcus Horatius Consuls.

Now concerning Iupiter Capitolins temple, king Tarquine the first (which was the sonne of Demaratus) vowed in the warres that he made against the SABYNES, that he would build it. And Tarquine the proude, being the sonne of him that made this vowe did build it: howbeit he did not consecrate it, because he was driuen out of his Kingdome before hee had finished it. When this temple was built and throughly finished, and set forth with all his ornaments: Publicola was maruellously desirous to haue the honour of the dedication thereof. But the noble men and Senatours enuying his glorie, being very angrie that he could not content himselfe with all those honours that he had receiued in peace, for the good lawes he had made, & in warres for the victories he had obteined and well deserued, but further that he would seeke the honour of this dedication, which nothing did pertaine vnto him: they then did egge Horatius, and perswaded him to make sute for the same. Occasion fell out at that time, that Publicola must haue the leading of the ROMAINES armie into the fielde: in the meane time, while Publicola was absent, it was procured that the people gaue their voyces to Horatius, to consecrate the temple, knowing they could not so well haue brought it to passe he being present.

ſent. Other ſay, the Conſuls drewe lots betweene them, and that it lighted vpon Publicola to leade the armie againſt his will, and vpon Horatius to conſecrate this temple, which may be coniectured by the thing that fortuned in the dedication thereof. For all the people being aſſembled together in the Capitoll with great ſilence, on the fifteenth day of the moneth of September, which is about the new moone of the moneth which the GRECIANS call Metagitnion: Horatius hauing done all the ceremonies needefull in ſuch a caſe, and holding then the doores of the temple, as the vſe was euen to vtter the ſolemne wordes of dedication: Marcus Valerius, the brother of Publicola, hauing ſtoode a long time there at the temple doore, to take an oportunitie to ſpeake, beganne to ſay a lowde in this wiſe. My lorde Conſull, your ſonne is dead of a ſickeneſſe in the Campe. This made all the aſſembly ſorie to heare it, but it nothing amaſed Horatius, who ſpake onely thus much. Caſt his bodie then where you will for me, the thought is taken. So he continued on to ende his conſecration. This was but a deuiſe and nothing true, of Marcus Valerius, onely to make Horatius leaue off his conſecration. Horatius in this ſhewed him ſelfe a maruellous reſolute man, were it that hee ſtreight found his deuiſe, or that he beleeued it to be true: for the ſodaineneſſe of the matter nothing altered him. The very like matter fell out in conſecrating of the ſecond temple. For this firſt which Tarquine had built and Horatius conſecrated, was conſumed by fire in the ciuill wars: and the ſecond was built vp againe by Sylla, who made no dedication of it. For Catulus ſet vp the ſuperſcription of the dedication, becauſe Sylla died before he could dedicate it. The ſecond temple was burnt againe not long after the troubles and tumultes which were at ROME, vnder Vitellius the Emperour. The third in like manner was reedified and built againe by Veſpaſian, from the ground to the toppe. But this good happe he had aboue other: to ſee his worke perfected and finiſhed before his death, & not ouerthrowen as it was immediatly after his death. Wherein he did farre paſſe the happineſſe of Sylla, who dyed before he could dedicate that he had built: and the other deceaſed before hee ſawe his worke ouerthrowen. For all the Capitoll was burnt to the ground incontinently after his death. It is reported the onely foundations of the firſt temple, coſt Tarquinius fortie thouſand Pondos of ſiluer. And to gilde onely the temple which we ſee now in our time, they ſay all the goods and ſubſtance that the richeſt citizen of ROME then had, will come nothing neere vnto it: for it coſt aboue twelue thouſand talents. The pillers of this temple are cut out of a quarrie of marble, called pentlike marble, and they were ſquared parpine, as thicke as long: theſe I ſaw at ATHENS. But afterwardes they were cut againe, and poliſhed in ROME, by which doing they got not ſo much grace, as they loſt proportion: for they were made too ſlender, and left naked of their firſt beautie. Now he that would wonder at the ſtately building of the Capitoll, if he came afterwardes vnto the palace Domitian, and did but ſee ſome galerie, porch, hall, or horte houſe, or his concubines chambers: he would ſay (in my opinion) as the Poet Epicharmus ſayd of a prodigall man.

How oft Iupiter Capitolins temple was burnt and built againe.

How much was ſpent in building the Capitoll.

It is a fault, and folly both in thee to laſh out giftes, and prodigall rewardes: For fond delights, without all rule that be, regarding not what happens afterwardes.

So might they iuſtly ſay of Domitian. Thou art not liberall, nor deuout vnto the goddes: but it is a vice thou haſt to loue to build, and deſireſt (as they ſay of olde Midas) that all about thee were turned to gold, and precious ſtones. And thus much for this matter. Tarquine after that great foughten battell wherein he loſt his ſonne (that was ſlaine by Brutus in fighting together hand to hande) went to the citie of CLVSIVM, vnto king Claras Porſena: the mightieſt prince that raigned at that time in all ITALIE, and was both noble & a courteous prince. Porſena promiſed him aide: and firſt of all he ſent to ROME to ſummone the citizens to receiue their King againe. But the ROMAINES refuſing the ſummones, he ſent forthwith an Herauld to proclaime open warres againſt them, and to tell them where, and when he would meete them: and then marched thitherwardes immediatly with a great armie. Publicola now being abſent, was choſen Conſull the ſecond time, and Titus Lucretius with him. When he was returned home againe to ROME, becauſe he would exceede king Porſena in greatneſſe of mind, Domitians mad building humor.

Porſena proclaimeth wars with Rome.

Publicola and Titus Lucretius Conſuls.

he began to build a citie called SIGLIVRIA, euen when the King with all his armie was not farre from ROME: and hauing walled it about to his maruellous charge, he sent thither seuen hundred citizens to dwell there, to shew that he made litle account of this war. Howbeit Porsena at his comming did giue such a lustie assault to the mount Ianiculum, that they draue out the souldiers which kept the same: who flying towards ROME, were pursued so harde with the enemies, that with them they had entered the town, had not Publicola made a saly out to resist them. Who began a hotte skirmish hard by the riuer of Tyber, & there sought to haue staied the enemies to follow any further: which being the greater nũber, did ouerlay the ROMAINES, and did hurt Publicola very sore in this skirmish, so as he was caried away into the citie in his souldiers armes. And euen so was the other Consull Lucretius hurt in like case: which so discouraged and frayed the ROMAINES, that they all tooke them to their legges, & fled towards the citie. The enemies pursued them at their heeles as far as the wodden bridge: so that the citie was in maruellous hazard of taking vpon the sodaine. But Horatius Cocles, and Herminius, and Lucretius, two other of the chiefest noble young men of the citie, stood with them to the defence of the bridge, and made head against the enemie. This Horatius was surnamed Cocles (as much to say, as one eye) because he had lost one of them in the warres. Howbeit other writers say, it was because of his flat nose which was so suncke into his head, that they saw nothing to part his eyes, but that the eye browes did meete together: by reason whereof the people thinking to surname him Cyclops, by corruption of the tongue they called him (as they say) Cocles. But howsoeuer it was, this Horatius Cocles had the courage to shew his face against the enemy, and to keepe the bridge, vntil such time as they had cut & broken it vp behind him. When he saw they had done that, armed as he was, & hurt in the hippe with a pike of the THVSCANS, he leaped into the riuer of Tyber, and saued himselfe by swimming vnto the other side. Publicola wondring at this manly act of his, perswaded the ROMAINES straight, euery one according to his abilitie, to giue him so much as he spent in a day,: & afterwards also he caused the common treasurie to giue him as much lande as he could compasse about with his plow in a day. Furthermore he made his image of brasse to be set vp in the temple of Vulcane, comforting by this honour his wounded hippe, whereof he was lame euer after. Now whilest King Porsena was hottely bent, very straightly to besiege ROME, there begane a famine among the ROMAINES: and to encrease the danger, there came a new armie out of THVSCANE, which ouerranne, burnt, and made waste, all the territorie of ROME. Whereupon Publicola being chosen Consull, then the third time, thought he should neede to doe no more to resist Porsen brauely, but to be quiet only, and to looke well to the safe keeping of the citie. Howbeit spying his oportunitie, he secretly stole out of ROME with a power, and did set vpon the THVSCANS that destroyed the countrie about: and ouerthrew & slew of them, fiue thousand men. As for the historie of Mutius, many do diuersely report it: but I will write it in such sort, as I thinke shall best agree with the trueth. This Mutius was a worthie man in all respectes, but specially for the warres. He deuising how he might come to kill King Porsena, disguised himselfe in THVSCANS apparell, and speaking Thuscan very perfectly, went into his campe, and came to the Kinges chayre, in the which he gaue audience: and not knowing him perfectly, he durst not aske which was he, least he should be discouered, but drew his sworde at aduenture, and slew him whom he tooke to be King. Vpon that they layde holde on him, and examined him. And a panne full of fire being brought for the King that entended to doe sacrifice vnto the goddes, Mutius held out his right hand ouer the fire, and boldly looking the King full in his face, whileste the flesh of his hand did frye off, he neuer chaunged hewe nor countenance: the King wondering to see so straunge a sight, called to them to withdrawe the fire, and he himselfe did deliuer him his sword againe. Mutius tooke it of him with his left hand, whereupon they say afterwardes, he had giuen him the surname of Sceuola, as much to say, as left handed, and tolde him in taking of it. Thou couldest not Porsena for feare haue ouercomed me, but now through courtesie thou hast wonne me. Therefore for good will I will reueale that vnto thee, which no force, nor extremitie could haue made mee vtter. There are three hundred ROMAINES dispersed through thy campe, all which are prepared with like minds to followe that I haue begunne, only gaping for opportunitie to put it in practise.

The noble acts of Mutius Sceuola.

How Mutius came by the name of Sceuola.

The

The lot fell on me to be the first to breake the Ise of this enterprise: and yet I am not sory my hand failed to kill so worthy a man, that deserueth rather to be a friend then an enemy vnto the ROMAINES. Porsena hearing this, did beleeue it, and euer after he gaue the more willing eare to those that treated with him of peace: not so much (in my opinion) for that he feared the three hundred lying in wait to kill him, as for the admiration of the ROMAINES noble minde and great courage. All other writers call this man, Mutius Scæuola: howbeit Athenodorus surnamed Sandon, in a booke he wrote vnto Octauia, Augustus sister, saieth that he was also called Opsigonus. But Publicola taking king Porsena not to be so daungerous an enemy to ROME, as he should be a profitable friend and allie to the same: let him vnderstand that he was contented to make him iudge of the controuersie betweene them & Tarquine. Whom he did many times prouoke to come and haue his cause heard before king Porsena, where he should iustifie to his face, that he was the naughtiest and most wicked man of the world, and that he was iustly driuen out of his countrey. Tarquine sharpely answered, that he would make no man his iudge, and Porsena least of all other, for that hauing promised him to put him again in his Kingdome, he was now gone from his word, and had changed his minde. Porsena was very angry with this aunswer, iudging this a manifest token that his cause was ill. Wherefore Porsena being sollicited againe by his owne sonne Aruns, who loued the ROMAINES, did easily grant them peace vpon condition: that they should redeliuer backe againe to him the lands they had gotten before within the country of THVSCAN, with the prisoners also which they had taken in this war, and in lieu thereof he offered to deliuer to them againe the ROMAINS, that had fled from them vnto him. To confirme this peace, the ROMAINS deliuered him hostages, tenne of the noblest mens sonnes of the city, and so many of their daughters: among which was Valeria, Publicolaes owne daughter. Peace being thus concluded, Porsena brake his army, and withdrew his strengh, trusting to the peace concluded. The ROMAINES daughters deliuered for hostages, came down to the riuers side to wash them, in a quiet place where the streame ran but gently, without any force or swiftnes at all. When they were there, and saw they had no guard about them, nor any came that way, nor yet any botes going vp nor downe the streame: they had a desire to swim ouer the riuer, which ran with a swift streame, and was marueilous deepe. Some say, that one Clelia swam the riuer vpon her horse backe, and that she did imbolden and incorage the other to swim hard by her horse side: and recouering the other bancke, and being past all daunger, they went and presented them selues before Publicola the Consul. Who neither commended them, nor liked the part they had plaid, but was marueilous sory, fearing least men would iudge him lesse carefull to kepe his faith, then was king Porsena: and that he might suspect the boldnesse of these maidens, was but a crafty sleight deuised of the ROMAINES. Therefore he tooke them all againe, and sent them immediatly vnto King Porsena. Whereof Tarquine hauing intelligence, he laide an ambush for them, that had the conduction of them. Who so soone as they were past the riuer, did shew them selues, & brake vpon the ROMAINES: they being farre fewer in number then the other, did yet very stoutly defend thē selues. Now whilest they were in earnest fight together, Valeria Publicolaes daughter, and three of her fathers seruaunts, escaped through the middest of them, and saued them selues. The residue of the virgines remained in the middest among their swords, in great daunger of their liues. Aruns king Porsenaes sonne aduertised hereof, ranne thither incontinently to the rescue: but when he came the enemies fled, and the ROMAINES held on their iourney to redeliuer their hostages. Porsena seeing them againe, asked which of them it was that beganne first to passe the riuer, and had encouraged the other to follow her. One pointed him vnto her, and told him her name was Clelia. He looked vpon her very earnestly, and with pleasaunt countenaunce, and commaunded they should bring him one of his best horses in the stable, and the richest furniture he had for the same, and so he gaue it vnto her. Those which hold opinion that none but Clelia passed the riuer a horse backe, doe alledge this to proue their opinion true. Other doe deny it, saying that this THYSCAN king, did only honor her noble courage. Howsoeuer it was, they see her image a horse backe in the holy streets, as they goe to the pallace: and some say it is the statue of Valeria, other of Clelia. After Porsena had made peace with the ROMAINES, in breaking vp his campe, he shewed his noble minde vnto them in many other things, and specially in that he commaunded his souldiers they should cary nothing but their armour and weapon onely, leauing his campe full of corne, victuals, and other kinde of goods. From whence this custome came, that at this day when they make open sale of any thing belonging to the common weale, the sergeant or common crier crieth, that they are king Porsenas goods, and taken of thankefulnesse and perpetuall memory of his bounty and liberality towardes them. Further, Porsenas image standeth adioyning to the pallace where the Senate is vsed to be kept, which is made of great antique worke. Afterwardes the SABINES inuading the ROMAINES territory with a great force, Marcus Valerius Publicolaes brother, was then chosen Consul, with one Posthumius Tubertus. How-beit all matters of waight and importaunce passed by Publicolaes counsell and authority, who was present at any thing that was done: and by whose means Marcus his brother wanne two great battells, in the last whereof he slew thirteene thousand of his enemies not losing one of his owne men. For which his victories, besides the honour of triumphe he had, the people also at their owne charges, built him a house in the streete of mount Palatine, and graunted him moreouer that his doore should open outwardes into the streete, where all other mens doores did open inwards into their house: signifying by grant of this honour and priuiledge, that he should alwaies haue benefit by the common weale. It is reported that the GRECIANS doores of their houses in olde time, did all open outwards after that fashion, and they do coniecture it by the comedies that are played. Where those that would goe out of their houses, did first knocke at their doores, and make a noise within the house, least in opening their doore vppon a sodaine, they might ouerthrow or hurt him that taried at the streete doore or passed by the way: who hearing the noyse, had warning straight to auoide the daunger. The next yeare after that, Publicola was chosen Consul the fourth time, because they stood in great doubt that the SABINES and LATINES would ioyne together to make warres vpon them: besides all this, there was a certaine superstitious feare ranne through the city, of some ill happe toward it, because most part of the women with childe were deliuered of vnperfect children, lacking some one limme or other, and all of them came before their time. Wherefore Publicola looking in some of Sybillues bookes, made priuat sacrifice vnto Pluto and did set vp againe some feasts and solemne games that were left off, and had bene commaunded before time to be kept by the oracle of Apollo. These meanes hauing a litle reioyced the citie with good hope, because they thought that the anger of the goddes had bene appeased: Publicola then began to prouide for the daungers that they were threatned withall by men, for the newes was brought him that their enemies were vp in all places, and made great preparation to inuade them. Now there was at that time amongst the SABINES, a great rich man called Appius Clausus, very strong and actiue of body, and otherwise a man of great reputation and eloquence, aboue all the rest of his countrey men: but notwithstanding he was much enuied, he could not auoide it, being a thing common to great men. He went about to stay those intended warres against the ROMAINES. Whereupon, many which before tooke occasion to murmur against him, did now much more increase the same: with saying he sought to maintain the power of the ROMAINES, that afterwards by their aide he might make him selfe tyrant and King of the countrey. The common people gaue easie eare vnto such speaches, and Appius perceiuing well enough how the souldiers hated him deadly, he feared they would complaine and accuse him. Wherfore being well backed and stood to by his kinsemen, friends, and followers, he practised to make a sturre among the SABINES, which was the cause of staying the warres against the ROMAINES. Publicola also for his part was very diligent, not only to vnderstand the originall cause of this sedition, but to feed on further and encrease the same, hauing gotten men meete for the purpose, which caried Appius such a message from him. The Publicola knew very well he was a iust man, and one that would not be reuenged of his citizens to the generall hurt of his countrey, although the iniuries he receiued at their hands, did giue him iust occasion to doe it: neuertheless if he had any desire to prouide for his safetie and to repaire to ROME, leauing them which causeles wished him so much euill, they would both openly and priuatly receiue him with that due honour which his vertue deserued, and the worthinesse of the ROMAINE people required. Clausus hauing long and many times considered this matter with himself, resolued that it was the best way he could take, making vertue of necessity; and therefore being determined to do it, he did procure his friends to do as he did, and they got other also vnto them, so that he brought away with him out of the countrey of the SABINES, fiue thousand families with their wiues and children (of the quietest & most peaceable people among the SABINES) to dwell at ROME. Publicola being aduertised thereof before they came, did receiue them at their comming to ROME with great ioy, and all maner of good curteous entertainement. For at their first comming, he made them all and their families free citizens, and assigned vnto euery person of them two iugera of land, (which contained one acre, one roode, eleuen pole, and 69. parts of a pole) by the riuer of Tyber: and vnto Appius selfe he gaue 25. iugera (to wit, 16. acres and a half, 4. pole and 76. parts of a pole) and receiued him into the number of the Senatours. And this came he first vnto the gouernment of the common weale in ROME, where he did so wisely behaue himselfe, that in the end he came to be the chiefest man of dignity and authority in ROME, so long as he liued. After his death, he left behind him the family of the Claudians, descending from him: which for honor, and worthines, gaue no place to the noblest family in ROME. But now the sedition amongst the SABINES being pacified, by the departure of those that were gone to ROME: the seditious gouernors would not suffer those that remained to liue in peace, but still cried out, it were too much shame for them, that Clausus being a fugitiue, and become an enemy, should honor their enemies abroad, that being present durst not shew so much at home, and that the ROMAINES should escape vnreuenged, who had done them such apparaunt wrongs. So they raised great force and power, and went and encamped with their army neare the city of FIDENES, and laid an ambush hard by ROME, in certaine hidden and hollow places, where they put a two thousand choise footmen, very well armed, and did appoint the next morning to send certaine light horsemen to runne and pray to ROME gates: commaunding them, that when the ROMAINES came out of the city to charge them, they should seeme leysurely to retire, vntill they had drawen them within daunger of their ambush. Publicola receiuing full intelligence of all their intention, by a traytour that fled from them vnto him, made due preparation to encounter with their priuy ambush, and so deuided his army in two parts: for he gaue his son in law Posthumius Balbus, three thousand foootemen, whom he sent away by night, commaunding them the same night to take the hilles, in the bottome whereof the SABINES were laid in ambush. Lucretius, fellow Consull with Publicola, hauing the lightest and lustiest men of the city, was appointed to make head against the vauncurriers of the SABINES that minded to approch the gates. And Publicola with the rest of the army, marched a great compasse about to inclose his enemies behind. The next morning betimes, by chaunce it was a thicke miste, and at that present time Posthumius comming downe from the hilles, with great shouts, charged them that lay in ambush. Lucretius on the other side, set vppon the light horsemen of the SABINES: and Publicola fell vpon their campe. So that of all sides the SABINES enterprise had very ill successe, for they had the worst in euery place, & the ROMAINS killed them flying, without any turning again to make resistance. Thus the place which gaue them hope of best safety, turned most to their deadly ouerthrow. For euery one of their companies supposing the other had bene whole and vnbroken, when a charge was giuen vpon them, did straight breake, and neuer a company of them turned head toward their enemy. For they that were in the campe, ran toward them which lay in ambush: and those which were in ambush on the contrary side, ran towards them that were in campe. So that in flying, the one met with the other, & found those, towards whom they were flying to haue bene safe, to stand in as much neede of helpe as themselues. That which saued some that were not slaine, was the city of FIDENES, which was neare the campe, and specially saued those which fled thither. But such as came short of the city, and could not in time recouer it, were all slaine in the field, or taken prisoners. As for the glory of this honourable victory, albeit the ROMAINES were wont to ascribe all such great notable matters to the speciall prouidence and grace of the goddes, yet at that time notwithstanding, they did iudge that this happy successe fell out by the wise foresight and valiantnesse of the captaine. For euery man that had serued in this iourney, had no other talke in his mouth, but that Publicola had deliuered their enemies into their handes, lame, and blinde, and as a man might say, bound hand and feete to kill them at their pleasure. The people were marueilously enriched by this victory, aswell for the spoile, as for the raunsome of the prisoners that they had gotten. Now Publicola after he had triumphed, and left the gouernment of the city to those, which were chosen Consuls for the yere following: died incontinently, hauing liued as honorably and vertuously all the daies of his life, as any man liuing might doe. The people then tooke order for his funerals, that the charges thereof should be defrayed by the city, as if they had neuer done him any honour in his life, and that they had bene still debters vnto him for the noble seruice he had done vnto the state and common weale whilest he liued. Therfore towards his funerall charges, euery citizen gaue a peece of money called a Quatrine. The women also for their part to honour his funerals, agreed among them selues to mourne a whole yeare in blacke for him, which was a great and honourable memoriall. He was buried also by expresse order of the people, within the city, in the streete called Velia; and they graunted priuiledge also vnto all his posterity, to be buried in the selfe same place. Howbeit they doe no more bury any of his there. But when any die, they bring the corse vnto this place, and one holding a torch burning in his hand, doth put it vnder the place, and taketh it straight away againe, to shew that they haue liberty to bury him there, but that they willingly refuse this honour: and this done, they cary the corse away againe.

NOW presently to compare these two personages together, it seemeth they both had one vertue in them: which is not found in any other of their liues which we haue written of before. And the same is that the one hath bene a witnes, and the other a follower of him, vnto whom he was like. So as the sentence that Solon spake to king Croesus, touching Tellus felicity and happines, might haue better bene applied vnto Publicola, then to Tellus: whom he iudged to be very happy, because he died honourably, he had liued vertuously, and had left behinde him goodly children. And yet Solon speaketh nothing of his excellency or vertue in any of his poems: neither did he euer beare any honorable office in all his time, nor yet left any children that caried any great fame or renowme after his death. Whereas Publicola so long as he liued, was alwaies the chiefe man among the ROMAINS, of credit and authority: and afterwards since his death, certaine of the noblest families, and most auncient houses of ROME, in these our daies, as the PVBLICOLES, the MESSALES, and the VALERIANS, for six hundred yeares continuance, doe referre the glory of the nobility and auncientry of their house vnto him. Furthermore, Tellus was slain by his enemies, fighting valiantly liantly like a worthy honeſt man. But Publicola died after he had ſlaine his enemies: which is farre more great good hap, then to be ſlaine. For after he as generall had honourably ſerued his countrie in the wars, and had left them conquerers, hauing in his life time receiued all honours and triumphes due vnto his ſeruice: he attained to that happy end of life, which Solon accompted and eſteemed, moſt happie and bleſſed. Alſo in wiſhing manner, he would his end ſhould be lamented to his praiſe, in a place where he confuteth Mimnermus, about the continuance of mans life, by ſaying:

Let not my death without lamenting paſſe, but rather let my friends bewaile the ſame: VVhoſe grieuous teares, and cries of out alas, may oft reſound the Eccho of my name.

If that be good hap, then moſt happy maketh he Publicola: for at his death, not only his friends and kinſfolks, but the whole city alſo, and many a thouſand perſons beſides, did bitterly bewaile the loſſe of him. For all the women of ROME did mourne for him in black, and did moſt pitifully lament his death, as euery one of thē had loſt either father, brother or husband.

True it is, that I couet goods to haue:
but yet ſo got as may me not depraue.

Solon ſaieth this, becauſe vengeance followed ill gotten goods. And Publicola tooke great heed, not onely to get his goods moſt iuſtly, but had regarde that thoſe which he had, he ſpent moſt honeſtly in helping the needie. So that if Solon was iuſtly reputed the wiſeſt man, we muſt needs confeſſe alſo that Publicola was the happieſt. For what the one deſired for the greateſt and moſt perfect good, a man can haue in this world: the other hath wunne it, kept it, and vſed it all his life time, vntill the hower of his death. And thus hath Solon honoured Publicola, and Publicola hath done like vnto Solon, ſhewing himſelfe a perfect example and looking glaſſe, where men may ſee how to gouerne a popular ſtate: when he made his Conſulſhip voide of all pride and ſtately ſhew, and became himſelfe affable, courteous, and beloued of euerie body. So tooke he profit by many of his lawes. As when he ordained, that the people only ſhould haue authoritie to chooſe and create all common officers and magiſtrates, and that they might appeale from any iudge to the people: as Solon when he ſuffered them to appeale vnto the iudges of the people. In deed Publicola did not create any new Senate, as Solon did: but he did augment the firſt number, with as many perſons almoſt as there were before. He did alſo firſt erect the office of Quæſtores, for keeping of all fines, taxes, and other collections of money. Becauſe the chiefeſt magiſtrate, if he were an honeſt man, ſhould not for ſo light an occaſion be taken, from the care of better and more waighty affaires: and if he were wickedly giuen and ill diſpoſed, that he ſhould haue no ſuch meane or occaſion to worke his wicked will, by hauing the treaſure of the citie in his hands, and to command what he liſt. Moreouer in hating the tyrantes, Publicola therein was farre more ſharpe and terrible. For Solon in his lawes puniſhed him that went about to make himſelfe a tyrant, yet after he was conuicted thereof by lawe: but Publicola ordained that they ſhould kill him, before the lawe did paſſe on him, that ſought to be King. And where Solon iuſtly and truly vaunteth himſelfe, that being offered to be King and Lord of ATHENS, and that with the whole conſent of the citizens: yet he did notwithſtanding refuſe it. This vaunte and glorie is as due vnto Publicola: who finding the dignitie of a Conſull tyrannicall, he brought it to be more lowly and fauourable for the people, not taking vpon him all the authoritie he might lawfully haue done. And it ſeemeth that Solon knew before him, what was the true and direct way to gouerne a common weale vprightly. For he ſaieth in one place:

Both great and ſmall of power, the better will obaye:
if we too litle or too much, vpon them do not lay.

Publicola reuiued the office of Quæſtores.

The diſcharging of debts was proper to Solon, which was a full confirmation of libertie. For litle preuaileth lawe to make equalitie among citizens, when debts do hinder the poore people to enioy the benefit thereof. And where it ſeemeth that they haue moſt libertie, as in that they may be choſen iudges and officers, to ſpeake their opinion in the counſell, and giue their voices alſo: there in deed are they moſt bound and ſubiect, becauſe they do but obaye the rich, in all they doe commaund. But yet in this acte there is a thing more wonderfull, and worthie to be noted. That commonly discharging of debts, was wont to breed great tumults and seditions in common weales. And Solon hauing vsed it in a very good time (as the Phisitian ventring a dangerous medecine) did appease the sedition already begun, and did vtterly quenche through his glory, and the common opinion they had of his wisdome and vertue, all the infamie and accusation that might haue growne of that acte. As for their first entrie into the gouernment, Solons beginning was farre more noble. For he went before, and followed not another: and himselfe alone without any others helpe, did put in execution the best, and more part of all his notable and goodly lawes. Yet was Publicolaes end and death much more glorious and happie. For Solon before he dyed, saw all his commonwealth ouerthrowne: but Publicolaes commonweale continued whole as he left it, vntill the broile of ciuill warres began againe among them. Solon, after he had made his lawes, and written them in wodden tables, leauing them without defence of any man, went his way immediatly out of the citie of ATHENS. Publicola abiding continually in ROME gouerning the state, did throughly stablish and confirme the lawes he made. Furthermore Solon hauing wisely foreseene Pisistratus practises, aspiring to make him selfe King: he could neuer let him for all that, but was himselfe ouercome and oppressed with the tyranny he saw stablished in his owne sight, and in despight of him. Where Publicola ouerthrew and did put downe a mightie Kingdome, that had continued of long time, and was throughly stablished: his vertue and desire being equall with Solons, and hauing had besides fortune fauourable, and sufficient power to execute his vertuous and well disposed minde. But as for warres and marshall deedes, there is no comparison to be made betweene them. For Daimachus Plataian, doth not attribute the warres of the MEGARIANS vnto Solon, as we haue written it: where Publicola being generall of an army, and fighting himselfe in person, hath wonne many great battels. And as for matters of peace and ciuill gouernment, Solon neuer durst present himselfe openly to persuade the enterprise of SALAMINA, but vnder a counterfait madnesse, and as a foole to make sport. Where Publicola, taking his aduenture from the beginning, shewed himselfe without dissimulation, an open enemie to Tarquine, and afterwards he reuealed all the whole conspiracie. And when he had herie the only cause and author of punishing the traitours, he did not only driue out of ROME their persons themselues in person, but tooke from them also all hope of returne againe. Who hauing alwaies thus nobly and valiantly behaued himselfe, without shrinking back, or flying from ought that required force, a manly courage, or open resistance: did yet shew himselfe discreet, where wisedome was requisite, or reason and perswasion needfull. As when he cunningly wanne king Porsena, who was a dreadfull enemie vnto him, and inuincible by force: whom he handled in such good sort, that he made him his friend. Peraduenture some might stand in this and say, that Solon recouered the Ile of SALAMINA vnto the ATHENIANS, which they would haue lost. Publicola to the contrary, restored the lands vnto Porsena againe, which the ROMAINES had conquered before, within the countrie of THVSCAN. But the times in which these things were done, are alwaies to be considered of. For a wise gouernour of a Realme, and politike man, doth gouerne diuersely according to the occasions offred, taking euery thing in his time wherein he will deale. And many times, in letting go one thing, he saueth the whole: and in losing a litle, he gaineth much. As Publicola did, who losing a litle peece of another mans country which they had vsurped, saued by that meanes all that was assuredly his owne. And when as the ROMAINES thought he should do very much for them, to saue their citie onely, he gaue them moreouer, all the goods that were in their enemies campe, which did besiege them. And in making his enemie iudge of his quarrell, he wanne the victorie: winning that moreouer which he would gladly haue giuen to haue ouercome, and haue sentence passe on his side. For the king their enemy did not only make peace with them, but did also leaue them all his furniture, prouision, and munition for the warres: euen for the vertue, manhood, and iustice, which the great wisedome of this Consull perswaded Porsena to beleeue to be in all the other ROMAINES.

THE LIFE OF Themistocles.

THEMISTOCLES parentage did little aduaunce his glorie: for his father Neocles was of small reputation in ATHENS, being of the hundred of Phrear, & tribe of Leontis: of his mother an alien or stranger: as these verses do witnesse, Abrotonon I am, yborne in Thracia, and yet this high good hap I haue, that into Grecia: I haue brought forth a sonne, Themistocles by name, the glory of the Greekish blouds, and man of greatest fame.

Howbeit Phanias writeth, that his mother was not a THRACIAN, but borne in the countrie of CARIA: and they do not call her Abrotonon, but Euterpé. And Neanthes saieth furthermore, that she was of HALICARNASSVS, the chiefest citie of all the Realme of CARIA. For which cause when the strangers did assemble at Cynosargos (a place of exercise without the gate dedicated to Hercules, which was not a right god, but noted an alien, in that his mother was a mortall woman:) Themistocles perswaded diuers youthes of the most honorable houses, to go downe with him, and to annoint themselues at Cynosargos, cunningly thereby taking away the difference between the right & alien sort. But setting a part all these circumstances, he was no doubt allied vnto the house of the Lycomedians: for Themistocles caused the chappell of this family, which is in the village of PHLYES, being once burnt by the barbarous people, to be built vp againe at his owne charges: and as Simonides saieth, he did set it forth and enriche it with pictures. Moreouer euery man doth confesse it, that euen from his childhood they did perceiue he was giuen to be very whote headed, sturring, wise, and of good spirite, and enterprising of him selfe to do great things, and borne to rule weighty causes. For at such dayes and howers as he was taken from his booke, and had leaue to play, he neuer plaied, nor would neuer be idle, as other children were: but they alwayes found him conning some oration without booke, or making it alone by himselfe, and the ground of his matter was euer commonly, either to defend, or accuse some of his companions. Whereupon his schoolemaister obseruing him, oft said vnto him: sure some great matter hangeth ouer thy head my boy, for it cannot be chosen but that one day thou shalt do some notable good thing, or some extreame mischiefe. Therefore when they went about to teache him any thing, only to checke his nature, or to fashion him with good maner and ciuilitie, or to studie any matter for pleasure or honest pastime: he would slowly and careleslie learne of them. But if they deliuered him any matter of wit, and things of weight concerning state: they sawe he would beate at it maruellously, and would vnderstand more then any could of his age and carriage, trusting altogether to his naturall mother wit. This was the cause, that being mocked afterwards by some that had studied humanitie, and other liberall sciences, he was driuen for reuenge and his owne defence, to aunswer with great and stoute words, saying, that in deed he could no skill to tune a harpe, nor a violl, nor to play of a psalterion: but if they did put a citie into his hands that was of small name, weake, and litle, he knew wayes enough how to make it noble, strong, and great. Neuertheless, Stesimbrotus writeth, how he went to Anaxagoras schoole, and that vnder Melissus he studied naturall Philosophie. But herein he was greatly deceaued, for that he tooke no great heed vnto the time. For Melissus was captaine of the SAMIANS against Pericles, at what time he did lay siege vnto the citie of SAMOS. Now this is true, Pericles was much younger then Themistocles, & Anaxagoras dwelt with Pericles in his owne house. Therefore we haue better reason and occasion to beleeue those that write Themistocles did determine to follow Mnesiphilus Phrearian. For he was no professed Orator, nor naturall Philosopher, as they termed it in that time: but made profession of that which then they called wisedome. Which was no other thing, but a certaine knowledge to handle great causes, and an indeuour to haue a good wit and iudgement in matters of state and gouernement: which profession beginning in Solon, did continue, and was taken vp from man to man, as a secte of Philosophie. But those that came sithence, haue mingled it with arte of speache, and by litle and litle haue translated the exercise of deeds, vnto bare and curious wordes: whereupon they were called Sophisters, as who would say, counterfaite wise men. Notwithstanding, when Themistocles began to medle with the gouernment of the commonweale, he followed much Mnesiphilus. In the first part of his youth, his behauiour and doings were very light and vnconstant, as one caried away with a rash head, and without any order or discretion: by reason whereof his manners and conditions seemed maruellously to change, and oftimes fell into very ill fauored euents, as himselfe did afterwards confesse by saying: that a ragged colt oft times prooues a good horse, specially if he be well ridden, and broken as he should be. Other tales which some will seeme to adde to this, are in my opinion but fables. As that his father did disinherite him, and that his mother for very care and sorow she tooke to see the lewde life of her sonne, did kill her selfe. For there are that write to the contrarie, that his father being desirous to take him from dealing in gouernment, did go and shewe him all alongst the sea shore, the shipwracks and ribbes of old gallyes cast here and there, whereof the reckoning was made, and said to him: thus the people vse their gouernours, when they do serue no longer. Howsoeuer it was, it is most true that Themistocles earnestly gaue himselfe to state, and was suddenly taken with desire of glory. For euen at his first entry, because he would set foote before the proudest, he stood at pike against the greatest and mightiest persons, that vsurpe the sway and gouernment, and specially against Aristides, Lysimachus sonne, who euer encountered him, and was still his aduersarie opposite. Yet it seemeth the euill will he conceiued toward him, came of a very light cause. For they both loued Stesilaus, that was borne in the citie of TEOS, as Ariston the Philosopher writeth. And after this iealousie was kindled betweene them, they alwaies tooke contrarie part one against another, not onely in their priuate likings, but also in the gouernment of the commonweale. Yet I am perswaded, that the difference of their manners and conditions, did much encrease the grudge and discorde betwixt them. For Aristides being by nature a very good man, a iust dealer, and honest of life, one that in all his doings would neuer flatter the people, not serue his owne glorie, but rather to the contrary would do, would say, and counsell alwaies for the most benefit & commodity of the commonweale: was oft times enforced to resist Themistocles, & disappoint his ambition, being euer busily mouing the people, to take some new matter in hand. For they report of him, that he was so inflamed with desire of glory, & to enterprise great matters, that being but a very young man at the battel of Marathon where there was no talke but of the worthines[s] of the captai[ns] captaine Miltiades that had wonne the battell: he was found many times solitarily there alone deuising with himself: besides, they say he could then take no rest in the night, neither would go to playes in the day time, nor would keepe cõpany with those whom he was accustomed to be familiar withall before. Furthermore, he would tell them that wondred to see him so in his muses, & changed, and asked him what he ayled that Miltiades victory would not let him sleepe, because other thought this ouerthrow at MARATHON, would haue made an end of all wars. Howbeit Themistocles was of a contrary opinion, & that it was but a beginning of greater troubles. Therefore he daily studied how to preuent them, and how to see to the safetie of GREECE, and before occasion offered, he did exercise his citie in feates of warre, foreseeing what should folow after. Wherfore, where the citizens of ATHENS before did vse to deuide among themselues the reuenue of their mines of siluer, which were in a part of ATTICA called LAVRION: he alone was the first that durst speake to the people, & perswade them, that frõ thenceforth they should cease that distribution among themselues, & employ the money of the same in making of gallyes, to make wars against the ÆGYNETES. For their warres of all GREECE were most cruell, because they were lords of the sea, & had so great a number of ships. This perswasion drue the citizens more easily to Themistocles mind, than the threatning the with King Darius, or the Persians would haue done: who were farre from them, and not feared that they would come neere vnto them. So this opportunitie taken of the hatred & iealousie between the ATHENIANS and the ÆGINETES, made the people to agree, of the said money to make an hundred gallies, with which they fought against king Xerxes, and did ouercome him by sea. Now after this good beginning & successe, he wan the citizes by degrees to bend their force to sea, declaring vnto them, how by land they were scant able to make head against their equals, whereas by their power at sea, they should not only defend themselues from the barbarous people, but moreouer be able to command all GREECE. Hereupon he made them good mariners, & passing sea men, as Plato sayth, where before they were stout and valiant souldiers by land. This gaue his enemies occasion to cast it in his teeth afterwards, that he had taken away from the ATHENIANS the pike & the target, and had brought them to the banke & the ower: and so he got the vpper hand of Miltiades. Who inueyed against him in that, as Stesimbrotus writeth. Now after he had thus his will, by bringing this seruice to passe, whether therby he did ouerthrow the iustice of the cõmon weale or not, I leaue that to the philosophers to dispute. But that the preseruation of all GREECE stood at that time vpon the sea, & that the gallies only were the cause of setting vp ATHENS againe, Xerxes himself is a sufficient witnes, besides other proofes that might be brought therof. For his armie by land being yet whole, & vnfought on, when he saw his armie by sea broken, dispeopled, & sunke, he fled straight vpon it, counselling as it were that he was now too weake to deale any more with the GRECIANS, & left Mardonius his lieutenãt in GREECE, of purpose in my opinion, rather to let that the GRECIANS should not follow him, then for any hope he had to ouercome them. Some write of Themistocles, that he was a very good husband for his owne profit, & carefull to looke to his things: for he did spend liberally, & loued oft to make sacrifices, and honorably to receiue & entertaine straungers: wherfore he had good reason to be careful to get, to defray his charges. Other to the contrary, blame him much, that he was too neere, & miserable. For some say, he would sel presents of meat that were giuen him. He did aske one Philides on a time, which had a breed of mares, a colt of gift: who denying him flatly, he was so angry, that he threatned him ere it were long he would make his houle the herle of wood, with the which PHILIP was taken. Meaning couertly to let him vnderstand, that he would shortly festrike & quarrell betwixt him, & his peareles kinsmen & familiar friends. It is true that he was the most ambitious man of the world. For when he was but a young man, and scarcely known, he carried by intreatie one EVRIPIDES borrue at HERMIONA, an excellent player of the cithrine, & counted at that time the cunningest man in all Artes: to the intent that he would come and teach his art at his house: and all was, no more, but that many people being desirous to heare him play, would aske for his house, & come thither to him. And one yeare when he went vnto the feast & assembly of the playes Olympicall, he would needes keepe open house for all commers, haue his tents richly furnished, and a great number of seruants & all other furniture, only to ouercome with Cimon. This was doubtly spighted the GRECIANS, who thought Themistocles expences fit for Cimons countenance, and abilitie, because he was a young gentleman, and of a noble house: but for him that was but a new come man, & would beare a greater port, then either became his calling or abilitie, they thought it not onely vnallowable in him, but meere presumption and vaine glorie. Another time he defrayed the whole charges of a tragedie which was playd openly: and being set out therein to haue won the prise, and the ATHENIANS being maruellous desirous of the honour in such playes, he caused this victorie of his to be painted in a table, which he did dedicate and set vp in a temple, with this inscription. Themistocles Phrearian defrayed the charges: Phrynicus made it: Adimantus was chiefe ruler. Yet notwithstanding he was well taken of the common people, partly because he would speake to euery citizen by his name, no man telling him their names: and partly also because he shewed himselfe an vpright iudge in priuate mens causes. As one day he aunswered the Poet Simonides, borne in CHIO, who did request an vnreasonable matter at his hands, at that time when he was gouernor of the citie. Thou couldest be no good Poet, Simonides, if thou diddest sing against the rules of musicke: neither my selfa good gouernour of a citie, if I should do any thing against the law. And mocking the same Simonides another time, he told him he was but a foole to speake ill of the CORINTHIANS, considering they were lords of so great & strõg a city. Likewise he was not wise to make himself to be drawen, being so deformed & ill fauoured. But being growen in credite, and hauing won the fauour of the people, he was such an enemie to Aristides, that in the end he made him to be expulsed and banished ATHENS, for 5. yeres. When newes were brought that the king of PERSIA was onwards on his iourney & comming downe to make wars vpon the GRECIANS: the ATHENIANS consulted whom they should make their generall. And it is reported, that all their cõmon counsellers which were wont to speake in matters, fearing the daunger, did draw backe, saue an orator called Epicydes, Euphemides sonne, very eloquent in speech, but somewhat womanish, faint hearted, and gredie of money, offred himselfe to sue for this charge, and had some hope to obtaine it. Wherefore Themistocles fearing all would not be well, if it fell to this man to be general of the armie, he bought out Epicydes ambitiõ with ready money, & so made him let fall his sute. It fell out Themistocles was greatly cõmended, about that was done to the interpreter, that came with the king of PERSIANS ambassadours, & demanded the empire of the GRECIANS both by sea & land, that they should acknowledge obedience to the King. For he caused him to be taken, & put to death by a cõmon consent, for vsing the Greeke tongue in the seruice & commandement of the barbarous people. It was a notable thing also, that at his motion, Arthmius borne at ZELEA, was noted of infamy, both he, his children, & all his posterine after him, because he brought gold from the king of PERSIA, to corrupt & win the GRECIANS. But the greatest & worthiest act he did in those parts, was this; that he pacified all ciuill wars among the GRECIANS, perswading the cities to leaue off their quarrels vntill the warre were done in the which they say Chilenus Arcadian did helpe him more then any other man. He being now chosen generall of the ATHENIANS, went about presently to imbarke his citizens into gallyes, declaring to them they should leaue their citie, and go meete with the barbarous King by sea, so farre from the coast of GREECE as they could: but the people did not thinke that good. Wherefore he led great numbers of souldiers by land, into the countries of THESSALIA with the LACEDÆMONIANS, to keepe the passage & entry into THESSALIA, against the barbarous people, which countries stood yet sound to GREECE, and not reuolted to the MEDES. Afterwards the GRECIANS comming from thence without any act done, and the THESSALIANS also being won somewhat on the Kings side, for that all the whole countrie vnto BOEOTIA was at the deuotion & goodwill of the barbarous people: then the ATHENIANS began to find, how Themistocles opinion to fight by sea was very good. Wherupon they sent him with their nauie to the citie of ARTEMISIUM, to keepe the straight. There the other GRECIANS would haue had the LACEDÆMONIANS, and their admirall Eurybiades to haue had the authoritie & commandement of the rest. But the ATHENIANS would not set sayle vnder any other admirall then their owne, because their's were the greatest number of ships in the armie, and aboue all the other GRECIANS. Themistocles foreseeing the danger that was likely to fall out amongst themselues, did willingly yeeld the whole authoritie vnto Eurybiades, & got the

ATHENIANS to agree vnto it: assuring them, that if they behaued themselues valiantly in these wars, the other GRECIANS of their owne accord would afterwards submit themselues vnto their obedience. Hereby it appeareth, that he only of all other was at that time, the originall cause of the sauing of GREECE, and did most aduance the honor & glory of the ATHENIANS, by making them to ouercome their enemies by force, and their friends & allyes with liberalitie. In the meane time, Eurybiades seeing the barbarous fleete riding at anker, all alongest the Ile of APHETES, with such a great number of ships in the vaward, he began to be affraid. And vnderstanding moreouer, there were other 200. sayle that went to cast about the Ile of SCIATHE, & so to come in: he presently would haue retyred further into GREECE, & would haue drawen neerer vnto PELOPONNESVS, to the end their armie by sea might be neere their armie by land, as thinking it vnpossible to fight with king Xerxes power by sea. Whereupon the inhabitants of the Ile of EVBOEA, fearing least the GRECIANS would to the spoile of the enemy, they caused Themistocles secretly to be spoken with all, & sent him a good summe of mony by one called Pelagō. Themistocles tooke the mony, as Herodotus writeth, & gaue it to Eurybiades. But there was one Architeles amōgst the ATHENIANS, captain of the galley called the holy galley, that was much against Themistocles intended purpose: who hauing no money to pay his mariners, did what he could that they might depart with speede from thence. Themistocles shurred vp then his souldiers more against him then before, insomuch as they went aboord his galley, & tooke his supper frō him. Architeles being maruellous angry & offēded withal, Themistocles sent him both bread & meat in a pannier, & in the bottome therof he had put a talent of siluer, bidding him for that night to sup with that, & the next morning he should prouide for his mariners, or els he would cōplaine, & accuse him to the citizens that he had taken money of the enemies. Thus it is written by Phanias Lesbiā. Moreouer these first fights in the straite of EVBOEA, betweene the GRECIANS, & the barbarous people, were nothing to purpose to end the wars betweene them. For it was but a taste giuen vnto the, which serued the GRECIANS turne very much, by making them to see by experience, & the manner of the fight, that it was not the great multitude of ships, nor the pompe & sumptuous setting out of the same, nor the proud barbarous shouts & songs of victorie that could stand them to purpose, against noble harts and valiant minded souldiers, that durst grapple with them, and come to hand strokes with their enemies: and that they should make no reckoning of all that brauery & brags, but should sticke to it like men, and lay it on the iacks of them. The which (as it seemeth) the poet Pindarus vnderstood very well, when he said touching the battell of ARTEMISIVM:

The stout Athenians, haue now foundation layed, vnto the libertie of Greece, by these assaults assayed.

For out of doubt the beginning of victorie, is to be hardie. This place ARTEMISIVM is a part of the Ile of EVBOEA, looking towards the North, about the citie of ESTIEA, lying directly ouer against the country which sometimes was vnder the obedience of the PHTHIOTES, and specially of the citie of OLIZON. There is a little temple of Diana, surnamed ARTEMISIA tall, round about the which there are trees, and a compasse of pillars of white stone, which when a man rubbes with his hande, they shew of the colour and sauour of saffron. And in one of those pillers there is an inscription of lamentable verses to this effect.

When boldest bloods of Athens by their might, has ouercome the numbers infinite of Asia: they then in memorie, of all their deedes, and valiant victorie began to build this noble monument and to Diana the same they did present, for that they had the Medes in wise subdued and with their blood their hardy hands embrued.

There is a place seene also vpon that coast at this day, a good way into the lande, in the middest whereof are great sands full of blacke dust as ashes: and they think that they burne in that place all dead bodies and olde shippe wracked. Newes being brought what had beene done in the countrie of THERMOPYLES, how that king Leonidas was dead, & how that Xerxes had won that entrie into GREECE by land: the GRECIANS then brought their whole armie by sea more into GRECE, the ATHENIANS being in the rereward in this retyred manner whose hearts were lift vp with the glorie of their former valiant deedes. Now Themistocles passing by those places where he knew the enemies ships were like full vpon the lee shore for harborow: he did ingraue certaine wordes spoken vnto the IONIANS, in great letters in stone, which he found there by chaunce, or purposely brought thither for that purpose, where there was very good harbour for ships, and fit places also to lie in. These were the words, that the IONIANS should take the GRECIANS parts being their founders and auncesters, and such as fought for their libertie: or at the least they should trouble the armie of the barbarous people, and do them all the mischiefe they could, when the GRECIANS should come to fight with them. By these wordes he hoped either to bring the IONIANS to take their part, or at the least he should make the barbarous people iealous & mistrustfull of them. Xerxes being already entred in the vppermost part of the prouince of DORICA, into the countrie of PHOCIDA, burning and destroying the townes and cities of the PHOCIANS: the other GRECIANS lay still and suffered the inuasion, notwithstanding the ATHENIANS did request them to meete with the barbarous armie in BOEOTIA, to saue the country of ATTICA, as before they had done when they went by sea to ARTEMISIVM. But they would not hearken to it in no wise, & all was because they were desirous they should draw to the straite of PELOPONNESVS, & there they should assemble the whole strength & power of GRECE within the barre of the same, to make a strong substantiall wall from the one sea to the other. The ATHENIANS were very angry at this deuise, & were halfe discouraged & out of hart, to see themselues thus forsaken & cast off, by the rest of the GRECIANS. For it was out of all speech that they alone should fight against so many thousands of enemies: & therfore their only remedy was, to leaue their citie and to get them to the sea. The people were very vnwilling to listen hereunto, making their reckoning it was needles to be carefull to ouercome, or to saue themselues, hauing once forsaken the temples of their goddes, & the graues of their parents. Wherfore Themistocles seeing that neither reason, nor mans perswasion could bring the people to like his opinion: he began to frame a deuise (as men doe vse sometimes in tragedies) and to threaten the ATHENIANS with signes from heauen, with oracles & answers from the goddes. And the occasion of Minerua dragon serued his turne for a celestial signe and token, which by good fortune did not appeare in those daies in the temple as it was wont to do: & the priests found the sacrifices which were daily offered to him, whole & vntouched by any. Wherefore being enformed by Themistocles what they should doe, they spread a brute abroad amongest the people, that the goddesse Minerua, the protector and defendor of the citie, had forsaken it, pointing them the way vnto the sea. And againe he wanne them by a prophecie, which commaunded them to saue themselues in wals of wood: saying, that the walles of wood did signifie nothing els but ships. And for this cause he said, Apollo in his oracle called SALAMINA diuine, not miserable nor vnfortunate, because it should giue the name of a most happy victorie which the GRECIANS should get there. And so at the last they following his counsell, he made this decree, that they should leaue the citie of ATHENS to the custodie of the goddesse Pallas, that was lady & gouernour of the country, & that all those which were of age to carie any weapon should get them to the gallyes: and for the rest, that euery man should see his wife, children, & bondme placed in some sure place as well as he could. After this decree was past & authorized by the people, the most part of them did conuey their aged fathers & mothers, their wines and little children, into the citie of TROEZEN, where the TROEZENIANS receiued them very louingly & gently. For they gaue order that they should be entertained at the common charge, allowing them a piece two obules of their money a day, and suffered the young children to gather fruite where they found it, and further more did hire schoolemasters at the charge of the common wealth, to bring them vp at schooles. He that was the penner of this decree, was one called Nicagoras. The ATHENIANS at that time, had no common money, but the Senate of the Areopagites, as Aristotle sayth, furnished euery soldier each eight drachmas, which was the onely meane that the gallyes were armed. Yet Clidemus writeth, that this was a craft deuised of Themistocles. THEN when the king came downe vnto the hauen of PIREA, he made as though Pallas (on the which that Atalanta head was graued) had bene lost, and was not found with the image of the goddesse: and sending to seeke for it he ransacked euery corner of the gallyes, and found a great deale of stuffe which priuate persons had hidden amongest their tackle. This money was brought ouer vnto the people, and by this meanes the soldiers that were shipped had wherewithall, to prouide them of necessarie things. When time came that they were to depart the hauen, and that all the city of ATHENS had taken sea: one way it was a pitty to behold them. Another way it made all sorts to wonder, that considered the boldnesse and courage of those men, which before sent away their fathers and mothers from them, and were nothing moued at their teares, cries, shrikes, & imbracinges of their wiues, their children, and departures, but stoutly and resolutely held on their course to SALAMINA. Notwithstanding, there were many old citizens left still of necessity in ATHENS, because they could not be remoued for very extream age, which sturred many with compassion toward them. There was besides, a certaine pitty that made mens hearts to yerne, when they saw the poore doggs, beasts, and cattell run vp and downe bleating, mowing, and howling out a loud after their masters, in token of sorrow, when they did imbarke. Amongst these, there goeth a strange tale of Xanthippus dog, who was Pericles father: which for sorrow his maister had left him behinde him, did cast him selfe after into the sea, and swimming still by the gallies side wherein his maister was, hee held on to the Ile of SALAMINA, where so soone as the poore curre landed, his breath failed him, and died presently. They say, at this day the place called the dogs graue, is the very place where he was buried. These were straunge acts of Themistocles, that beholding the ATHENIANS sory for the absence of Aristides, & fearing least of spite he taking part with the barbarous nation, might haue bene the ruine and destruction of the state of GREECE, being banished fiue yeares also before the wars by Themistocles procurement: that he did set forth a decree, that al those which had bene banished for a time, might returne home againe, to do, to say, and to giue counsel to the citizens in those things, which they thought best for the preseruation of GREECE. And also where Eurybiades being generall of the GRECIANS whole army by sea, for the worthinesse of the city of SPARTA, but otherwise a rancke coward at time of neede, would in any case depart from thence, & retire into the goulfe of PELOPONNESVS, where all the army of the PELOPONNESIANS was by land assebled: that Themistocles withstood him, and did hinder it all he could. At that time also it was, that Themistocles made so notable answers, which specially are noted and gathered together. For when Eurybiades said one day vnto him, Themistocles, those that at playes & games do rise before the company, are whistled at. It is true, said Themistocles: but those that tary last so, do neuer win any game. Another time Eurybiades hauing a staffe in his hand lift it vp, as though he would haue striken him. Strike and thou wilt, said he, so thou wilt heare me. Eurybiades wondring to see him so patient, suffered him then to say what he would. Then Themistocles began to bring him to reason: but one that stood by, said vnto him. Themistocles, for a man that hath neither city nor house, it is an ill part to will others that haue, to forsake all. Themistocles turning to him, replied. We haue willingly forsaken our houses and wals, said he, cowardly beast that thou art, because we would not become slaues for feare to lose things, that haue neither soule nor life. And yet our city I tell thee is the greatest of all GREECE: for it is a fleete of two hundred gallies ready to fight, which are come hither to saue you if you list. But if you will needes goe your waies and forsake vs the second time: you shall heare tell ere it be long, that the ATHENIANS haue another free city, and haue possessed againe as much good land, as that they haue already lost. These wordes made Eurybiades presently thinke, and feare, that the ATHENIANS would not goe, and that they would forsake them. And as another Eretrian was about to vtter his reason against Themistocles opinion: he could not but answere him. Alas, and must you my maisters talke of warres to, that are like to a Sleeue? In deede you haue a sword, but you lacke a heart. Some write, that whilest Themistocles was talking thus from his galley, they spied an owle flying on the right hande of the shippes which came to light on one of the mastes of the gallies: and that hereupon all the other GRECIANS did agree to his opinion, and prepared to fight by sea. But when the fleete of their enemies shippes shewed on the coastes of ATTICA, hard by the hauen Phalericus, and couered all the riuers thereabouts, as farre as any body could see, and that king Xerxes him selfe was come in person with all his army by land, to campe by the sea side: so that his whole power both by land and sea might be seene in sight: then the GRECIANS had forgotten all Themistocles goodly persuasions, and beganne to incline againe to the PELOPONESIANS, considering how they might recouer the gulfe of PELOPONNESVS, and they did grow very angry, when any man went about to talke of any other matter. To be ſhort, it was concluded that they ſhould ſaile away the next night following, and the maiſters of the ſhippes had order giuen them to make all thinges ready for them to depart. Themiſtocles perceiuing their determination, he was maruellous angry in his minde, that the GRECIANS would thus diſperſe themſelues aſunder, repairing euery man to his owne city, and leauing the aduantage which the nature of the place, and the ſtraight of the arme of the ſea, where they lay in harbor together, did offer them: and ſo he bethought himſelfe how this was to be holpen. Sodainely the practiſe of one Sicinus came into his minde, who being a PERSIAN borne, and taken priſoner before in the warres, loued Themiſtocles very well, and was ſchoolemaiſter to his children. This Sicinus he ſecretly ſent vnto the king of PERSIA, to aduertiſe him that Themiſtocles (generall of the ATHENIANS) was very deſirous to become his maieſties ſeruaunt, and that he did let him vnderſtand betimes, that the GRECIANS were determined to flie: and therefore that he wiſhed him not to let them eſcape, but to ſet vppon them, whileſt they were troubled and affraide, and fatre from their army by land, to the end that vpon a ſodaine he might ouerthrow their whole power by ſea, Xerxes ſuppoſing this intelligence came from a man that wiſhed him well, receiued the meſſenger with great ioy, and thereuppon gaue preſent order to his captaines, by ſea, that they ſhould imbarke their men into the other ſhippes at better leyſure, and that preſently they ſhould put out with all poſſible ſpeede, two hundred ſaile to followe the GRECIANS in the taile, to ſhut vp the foreland of the ſtraight, and to compaſſe the Iles all about, that not one of his enemies ſhippes might eſcape: and ſo it fell out. Then Ariſtides (Lyſimachus ſonne) being the firſt that perceiued it, went to Themiſtocles tent, though he was his enemy, and through his onely meanes had bene baniſhed before, as ye haue heard: and calling him out, told him how they were enuironed. Themiſtocles, who knew well enough the goodneſſe of this man, being very glad he came at that time to ſeeke him out, declared vnto him the pollicy he had vſed by the meſſage of Sicinus, praying him to put to his helpe to ſtay the GRECIANS, and to procure with him, conſidering his word had more authority among them, that they would fight within the ſtraight of SALAMINA. Ariſtides commending his great wiſedome, went to deale with the captaines of the other gallies, and to procure them to fight. For all this, they would not credite that he ſaid, vntill ſuch time as there arriued a galley of TENEDIENA, whereof one Panetius was captaine, who being ſtolen out of the hoſte of the barbarous army, brought certaine newes, that the ſtraight out of doubt was ſhut vp. So that beſides the neceſſity which did vrge them, the ſpite which the GRECIANS conceiued thereof, did prouoke them to hazard the battell. The next morning by breake of day, King Xerxes placed himſelfe on a mariuelous high hill, from whence he might diſcerne his whole fleete, and the ordering of his army by ſea, aboue the temple of Hercules, as Phanodemus writeth. Which is the narrow way or channell betwixt the Ile of SALAMINA, and the coaſt of ATTICA: or as Herodotus ſaith, vppon the confines of the territories of MEGARA, aboue the point which they commonly call the hornes. There Xerxes ſet vp a throne of golde, and had about him many ſecretaries to write all that was done in the battell. But as Themiſtocles was ſacrificing vnto the goddes in his galley that was admirall, they brought to him three yong priſoners, faire of complexion, richly arrayed with gold and iuels, whom they ſaide were the children of Sandauce the kings ſiſter, and of prince Antarctus. So ſoone as Euphrantides the ſoothſayer had ſeene them, and at their arriuall obſerued there roſe a great bright flame out of the ſacrifice, and at the very ſelfe ſame inſtant that one on his right hand had ſneeſed: he tooke Themiſtocles by the hand, and willed him to ſacrifice all thoſe three priſoners vnto the god Bacchus, ſurnamed Omeſtes, as much to ſay, as the cruell Bacchus: for in doing it, the GRECIANS ſhould not only be victorious, but they ſhould haue the victory ouer their enemies. Themiſtocles wondred much, to heare ſo ſtraunge and terrible a commaundement of the ſoothſaier. Neuertheles, the common ſort following his cuſtome, which is, to promiſe ſafety ſooner in the greateſt dangers, & moſt deſperate caſes, by ſtrange and vnreaſonable, rather then by reaſonable and ordinary meanes: they beganne to call vpon the god with one voice, and bringing the three priſoners neare vnto the altar, they compelled him to performe the ſacrifice in that ſort as the ſoothſaier had appointed.

appointed. Phanias Lesbian, an excellent Philosopher, and well seene in stories and antiquities, reporteth this matter thus. As for the number of the shippes of the barbarous nauy: Aeschylus the poet, in a tragedy which he intituled the PERSIANS, knowing certainly the troth, saieth thus:

King Xerxes had a thousand shippes I know, amongest the which, two hundred were (I trow) and seuen: which all the rest did ouer saile with swifter course. This is without en faile.

Xerxes king of Persia had a thousand ships.

The ATHENIANS had nine score, in euery one of the which there were eighteen souldiers, whereof foure of them were archers, and all the rest armed men. Themistocles also did with no lesse skill & wisdome choose his time & place to fight, forbearing to charge his enemies, vntil the howr was come, that of ordinary custom the sea wind arose, and brought in a rough tide within the channell, which did not hurt the GRECIAN gallies, being made low and snug, but greatly offended the PERSIAN gallies, being high cargged, heauy, & not yare of steredge, and made them lie sidelong to the GRECIANS, who fiercely set vpon them, hauing alwaies an eie to Themistocles direction, that best foresaw their aduantage. At the same time, Ariamenes, Xerxes admirall, a man of great valure & worthiest of the Kings brethren, bestowed arrowes and darts as it were from the wals of a castle, charging the gally of Aminias Decelian, and Sosicles Pedian, which were ioyned and grappled with him, and fiercely entring the same, was by them valiantly receiued vpon their pikes, and thrust ouer bord into the sea. Whose body floting amongst other shipwracks ARTEMISIA knowing, caused to be caried to king Xerxes. Now whilest this battell stoode in these termes, they say that there appeared a great flame in the element toward the city of ELEVSIN, and that a loude voice was heard through all the plaine of THRIASIA vnto the sea, as if there had bene a number of men together, that had sung out aloud, the holy song of Iacchus. And it seemed by litle and litle, that there rose a cloud in the aire from those which sang: that left the land, and came and lighted on the gallies in the sea. Other affirmed, that they saw armed men, which did reach out their hands from the Ile of AEGINA, towards the GRECIAN gallies: and they thought they were the AEACIDES, for whose helpe they all praid before the battell was begunne. The first man of the ATHENIANS that tooke any of the enemies ships, was Lycomedes, a captaine of a gally: who hauing taken very rich furniture and flags, did afterwards consecrate them to Apollo laurell: as ye would say, victorious. The other GRECIANS in the front being equally in number with the barbarous ships, by reason of the straightnes of the arme of the sea wherin they fought, and so straightned as they could not fight but by one & one, whereby the BARBARIANS disorderly laide one another aboord, that they did hinder themselues with their ouer multitude: & in the end were so sore presled vpon by the GRECIANS, that they were constrained to flie by night, after they had fought and maintained battell, vntill it was very darke. So that the GRECIANS won that glorious and famous victory: of the which may truely be affirmed that, as Simonides saieth:

Ariamenes Xerxes admirall.

The Grecians victory of the Persians nauy by sea.

VVas neuer yet, nor Greeke nor barbarous crew that could by sea, so many men subdew: Nor that obtainde, so famous victorie in any fight, against their enemie.

Thus was the victory wonne through the valiantries and courage of those that fought that battell, but especially through Themistocles great policy and wisdome. After this battell Xerxes being madde for his losse, thought to fill vp the arme of the sea, and to passe his army by land, vpon a bridge, into the Ile of SALAMINA. Themistocles, because he would feele Aristides opinion, told him as they were talking together, that he thought best to goe and occupy the straight of HELLESPONT with the army by sea, to breake the bridge of shippes which Xerxes had caused to be made: to the end, said he, that we may take ASIA into EVROPE. Aristides liked not this opinion, for we haue (said he) fought all this while against this barbarous King, who thought but to play with vs: but if we shut him within GREECE, and bring him to fight of necessity to saue his life: such an enemy that commandeth so great an army, will no more stand still as a looker on, and set at his ease vnder his golden pauilion, to see the passime of the battell, but will proouе euery way, and be him ſelfe in euery place at all aſſaies to ſaue him ſelfe from ſuch a ſtraight and daunger. Thus with politicke care and foreſight, he may eaſely amend his former fault committed by negligence, and doe well enough, when he ſhall ſee his life and Kingdome both depend vppon it. Therefore Themiſtocles, I would thinke not beſt to breake his bridge at all, which he hath cauſed to bee made; but rather if wee could, to build another to it, to driue him out of EVROPE as ſoone as we could. Themiſtocles then replied: Seeing you thinke this were good to be done, we muſt all lay our heades together, to deuiſe how he may be forced to come out as ſoone as we could. They breaking off with this reſolution, Themiſtocles ſent immediately one of the Kings Eunuches, called Arſaces, that was one of the groomes of his chamber, whom he found out amongeſt the priſoners, and by him he ſent this meſſage vnto the King. That the GRECIANS hauing wonne the battell of him by ſea, had decreed in their counſell, how they would goe to the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, to breake the bridge of the ſhippes he had cauſed to be made there. Whereof he thought good to aduertiſe him for the good will he did beare him, and to the end he might bethinke him betimes, to get him away to the ſea within his owne dominion, and ſo paſſe backe againe into ASIA as ſoone as he could, whileſt he gaue order to his allies and confederates, to ſtay following him at the poope. The barbarous King vnderſtanding theſe newes, was ſo affraid, that he hoiſed away with all poſſible ſpeede. The further foreſight and great wiſedome of Themiſtocles, and Ariſtides, in marine cauſes, did manifeſtly appeare afterwards in the battell the GRECIANS fought before the city of PLATEA, againſt Mardonius, king Xerxes lieutenant: who hauing but a ſmall power of the King his ſoueraignes there, did yet put the GRECIANS to great diſtreſſe, and in hazard to haue loſt all. Of all the townes and cities that fought in the battell, Herodotus writeth, that the city of ÆGINA wanne the fame for valiantneſſe aboue the reſt: and of priuat men, among the GRECIANS, Themiſtocles was iudged the worthieſt man: although it was ſore againſt their wils, becauſe they enuied much his glory. For after the battell done, all the captaines being gotten into the ſtraight of PELOPONNESVS, and hauing ſworne vppon the altar of their ſacrifices, that they would giue their voices after their conſciences, to thoſe they thought had beſt deſerued it: euery one gaue him ſelfe the firſt place for worthines, & the ſecond vnto Themiſtocles. The LACEDÆMONIANS caried him into SPARTA, where they iudged the honour and dignity to their admirall Eurybiades: but the wiſdome and policy they attributed to Themiſtocles. In token thereof they gaue him an oliue braunch, and the goodlieſt coche that was in their city: and moreouer they ſent three hundred of their luſty youthes to accompany him, and conduct him out of their countrey. They ſay, at the next feaſtes and aſſemblies of the playes Olympicall that were made after this victory, when Themiſtocles was once come into the ſhew place where theſe games were playde, the people looked no more on them that fought, but all caſt their eies on him, ſhewing him to the ſtrangers which knew him not, with their fingers, and by clapping of their handes did witneſſe how much they eſteemed him. Whereat he him ſelfe tooke ſo great delight, that he confeſſed to his familiar friends, he then did reape the fruite and benefit of his ſundry and painefull ſeruices he had taken in hand, for the preſeruation of GREECE. So ambitious was he of nature, and couetous of honour, as we may eaſily perceiue by certaine of his deedes and notable ſayings they haue noted of him. For being choſen admirall of ATHENS, he neuer diſpatched any cauſe priuate or publicke, how ſoeuer they fell out, vntill the very day of his departure, and taking ſhipping: and all becauſe that men ſeeing him rid much buſineſſe at once, and to ſpeake with ſo many perſons together, they ſhould eſteeme him to be the notabler man, and of the greater authority. Another time he walked vppon the ſands by the ſea ſide, beholding the dead bodies of the barbarous people, which the ſea had caſt vp vpon the ſhore: and ſeeing ſome of them that had on ſtill their chaines of golde, and bracelets, he paſſed by on his way, but ſhewed them yet to his familiar friend that followed him, and ſaide vnto him: take thou thoſe, for thou art not Themiſtocles. And vnto one Ariſtophares, who in his youth had bene a goodly yong boy, and at that time did cornefully behaue him ſelfe vnto him, making no reckoning of him: and now that he ſaw him in authority came to ſee him, he ſaide. O my young ſonne, and friend we are both euen at one time (but too late) growen wiſe. He ſaide the ATHENIANS did not eſteeme esteeme of him in time of peace: but when any storme of warres were towardes, and they stoode in any daunger, they ranne to him then, as they runne to the shadowe of a plane tree, vpon any sodaine raine: and after fayre weather come againe, they cut away then the braunches, and boughes thereof. There was a man borne in the Ile of SERIPHA, who being fallen out with him, did cast him in the teeth, that it was not for his worthinesse, but for the noble citie wherein he was borne, that he had wonne such glorie. Thou sayest true sayde he: but neither should I euer haue wonne any great honour, if I had bene a SERIPHIAN, nor thou also if thou haddest bene an ATHENIAN. An other time one of the Captaines of the citie, hauing done good seruice vnto the common weale, made boast before Themistocles, and compared his seruice equall with his. Themistocles to aunswere him, telde him a pretie tale. That the working day brauled on a time with the holy day, repining against her, that he laboured for his liuing continually, and how she did nothing but fill her bellie, and spend that they had gotten. Thou hast reason saide the holy day. But if I had not bene before thee, thou hadst not bene here now. And so, if I had not bene then: where had you my masters bene now? His owne sonne was a little too sawsie with his mother, and with him also, bearing himselfe ouer-boldly of her good will, by meanes of her cockering of him. Whereupon being merrily disposed, he would say that his sonne could doe more then any man in all GREECE. For, saieth he, the ATHENIANS commaunde the GRECIANS, I commaund the ATHENIANS, my wife commaundeth me, and my sonne commaundeth her. Moreouer because he would be singular by himselfe aboue all other men: hauing a peece of land he would sell, he willed the crier to proclaime open sale of it in the market place, and with all he should adde vnto the sale, that his land lay by a good neighbour. Another time, two men being suters to his daughter, he preferred the honester before the richer, saying: he had rather haue to his sonne in lawe a man that lacked goods, then goods to lacke a man. These were Themistocles pleasant conceits and aunswers. But after he had done all these things we haue spoken of before, he tooke in hand to builde againe the citie and walles of ATHENS, and did corrupt the officers of LACEDÆMONIA with money, to the end they should not hinder his purpose, as Theopompus writeth. Or as all other say when he had deceiued them by this subtiltie, he went vnto SPARTA as ambassadour, sent thither of purpose vpon the complaints of the LACEDÆMONIANS, for that the ATHENIANS did inclose their citie againe with walles, who were accused vnto the counsell of SPARTA, by an orator called Poliarchus, who was sent thither from the ÆGINETES, of purpose to prosecute this matter against the ATHENIANS. Themistocles stoutely denied it to them, and prayed them for better vnderstanding of the trothe, they would send some of their men thither to see it. This was but a fetch onely to winne by this delaye, the ATHENIANS so much more time to raise vp their walles, and that the ATHENIANS should keepe as hostages for surety of his personne, those they should send to ATHENS, to bring backe the report thereof: and so it fell out. For the LACEDÆMONIANS being enformed of the troth as it was, did him no hurt, but dissembling the misliking they had to be thus abused by him, sent him away safe and sound. Afterwardes he made them also mend and fortifie the hauen of PIRÆA, hauing considered the situation of the place, and all to encline the city to the sea. Wherein he did directly contrary to all the counsell of the auncient kinges of ATHENS: who seeking (as they say) to withdraw their people from the sea, and to accustome them to liue vppon the land, by planting, sowing, and plowing their grounds, did deuise and giue out abroad, the fable they tell of the goddesse Pallas. And that is this, how she contending with Neptune about the patronage of the countrey of ATHENS, brought forth and shewed to the iudges the oliue tree, by meanes whereof she preuailed, and obtained the preheminence. Euen so Themistocles did not ioyne the hauen of PIRÆA, vnto the city of ATHENS, as the Comicall poet Aristophanes sayeth: but rather ioyned the city vnto the hauen PIRÆA, and the land vnto the sea. By this meanes he made the people strong against the nobility, and brought the comminalty to waxe bolder then they were before, by reason the rule and authoritie fell into the handes of saylers, mariners, pilots, shippemaisters, and such kinde of seafaring men: so as the pulpit where all the oracles were made, ſtoode in the market place of PNYX, and did looke towardes the ſea. But the thirt tyrants that came in afterwardes, did remooue it, and turne it towardes the lande: holdi opinion to be ſtrong by ſea, was it that did maintaine the authoritie of the popular ſta And that contrariwiſe they which liue by the labour and toyle of the earth, doe more wi lingly like the gouernement of Nobilitie. Themiſtocles called to minde another matter al of greater importance, to make the citie of ATHENS of a greater power by ſea. For aft the retire of Xerxes, and that all the fleete and nauie of the GRECIANS wintered in th hauen of PAGASES: he ſaide one day in an open aſſembly of the people, that he ha thought of a thing which would be very profitable and beneficiall for them, but it was no to be tolde openly. The people willed him then to impart it to Ariſtides: and if he thoug it good, they would execute it ſpeedily. Themiſtocles then tolde Ariſtides: the thing he had conſidered of, was to burne the Arcenall where the GRECIANS nauie lay, and to ſe on fire all their ſhippes. Ariſtides hearing his purpoſe, returned to the people, and told them: how nothing could be more profitable, but with all more vniuſt, then that which Themiſtocles had deuiſed. The ATHENIANS then willed Ariſtides it ſhould be let alone altogether. Furthermore when the LACEDÆMONIANS had exhibited their petition to the counſell of the Amphictyons (that is the generall counſell of all the ſtates of GRECE aſſembled) how the townes and cities of GRECE which had not bene parties with the GRECIANS to the league, againſt the barbarous people, ſhould be put off wholly from this counſell. Themiſtocles doubting of the ARGIVES, the THESSALIANS, and the THEBANS alſo ſhould by this meanes be exempted, that the LACEDÆMONIANS would be then the greater number in voices, and by this meanes might do what they would in this counſell: he ſpake ſo conſideratly for the cities which they would haue thus diſcharged, that he made the petitioners in the aſſembly vtterly to change their opinion. Declaring, how there were but one and thirtie cities compriſed onely the league, and yet that ſome of them were very weake and ſmall: and how it were no reaſon, that reiecting all the reſt of GRECE, the greatest authoritie of this counſell ſhould fall into the hands of two or three of the chiefeſt cities alone. For this cauſe chiefly the LACEDÆMONIANS did euer beare him extreame hatred, and did ſet vp Cimon all they could, to be alwayes aduerſarie oppoſite vnto him, and as it were to beard him in all matters of ſtate, and the gouernment of ATHENS. They procured him be ſides the ill will and diſpleaſure of all the friends and confederates of the ATHENIANS, for that he went ſayling ſtill too and fro alongſt the Iles, exacting money of the inhabitants of the ſame. And this is to be knowne by the matter propounded by him to the ANDRIANS (of whom he would haue had money) and by the aunſwer they made him, as Herodotus writeth. Which was, how he had brought them two mightie gods: Loue, and Force. And they anſwered him again, that they alſo had two great goddeſſes, which kept them from giuing of him any money: Pouerty, and Impoſſibility. And to make this good also Timocreon the Rhodian Poet galled him to the quicke, when he ſharpely taunted him, for calling many home againe for money that were baniſhed: and how for coueteouſneſſe of money he had betraied, and forſaken his hoſte and friend. The verſes wherein this matter is mentioned, are to this effect.

VVho liſt commend worthy Pauſanias, Zanthippus or good Leotychides yet ſhall I ſeeme but light thereof to paſſe, compared with valiant Ariſtides.
For yet was nay, the like in Athens towne, nor neuer ſhall come none of like renowne.
Themiſtocles by right and due deſert, is hated of Latona, for his lies,
and for he bare a traytrous wicked heart, who like a wretch, and niggard did deuiſe, for ſmall reward, his hoſt Timocreon to holde out of his countrey Ialiſon.

He tooke for bribe (vniustly yet therewhile) of readie coyne three talents fayre and bright, reuoking such as pleas'd him, from exile, and banishing full many a worthy wight.
Or putting them to death, without cause told, he gaie thereby, great heapes of coyne and gold.
But in the end (ô right reward for such) this bribing wretch, was forced for to hold, a tipling booth, most like a clowne or smuch, at holy feastes and pastimes manifold, which were amongest the people in those dayes Istmiciane folke, did vse the like alwayes.
And there he serued, his gests with cold meat still, whilest they that tasted of his cookerie, gan wish that they (to ease their wearie will) had neuer lined to see the trecherie, of false Themistocles, and that he might no longer liue, which wrought them such despight.

After this, he did more openly blase him to the world, when he was banished and condemned: in a song that had beginning thus:

O Muse, let these my verses be dispers'd, throughout all Greece, since they deserue no lesse:
and since the truth which is in them rehears'd, deserueth fame, whom no man should suppresse.

They say the cause was, why this Timocreon was banished: the friendship which he had with the Barbarous people, and for giuing them intelligence. Whereof Themistocles was one that iudicially condemned him. Wherefore when Themistocles himselfe was accused afterwards of the same fault, Timocreon then made these verses following against him.

Timocreon was not without his phere, which did confer with Medes priuely, Since others mo, the selfe same blame might beare, no foxes lurke in dennes as well as I.

Besides these verses, Themistocles owne citizens for the ill will they bare him, were contented to heare him ill spoken of. Therfore while he sought waies to redresse all this, he was driuen to vse such meane, which more increased their hatred toward him. For in his orations to the people, he did oft remember them of the good seruice he had done them: and perceyuing how they were offended withall, he was driuen to say. Why, are ye weary so oft to receiue good by one man? Many of them were very angry with him also, when he surnamed Diana (in the dedication of her temple he made vnto her) Aristobule, as much to say, as the good counseller: meaning thereby, how he had giuen graue and wise counsell, both vnto his city, and to all the rest of the GRECIANS. He built this temple also neare his house, in a place called Melita, where the hang-men doe cast the dead bodies of those that were executed, and throw the ragges and halters endes of those that were hanged, or otherwise put to death by law. There was also in our daies in the temple of Diana Aristobule, a litle image of Themistocles, which shewed plainly, that he was not only wise, and of a noble mind, but also of a great maiesty and countenance in the face. In the end the ATHENIANS banished him ATHENS for fiue yeares, because they would plucke downe his ouergreat courage and authority, as they did vse to serue those, whose greatnes they thought to be more, then common equality that ought to be among citizens would beare. For this manner of banishment for a time, called Ostracismon, was no punishment for any fault committed, but a mitigation and taking away of the enuy of the people, which delighted to plucke downe their stomacks that too much seemed to exceede in greatnes: and by this meanes they tooke away the poison of his malice, with diminishing his glory & honor. So Themistocles being banished ATHENS, went to dwell in ARGOS. In this meane season, Pausanias trechery fell out, which gaue his enem occasion to lye heauie on his backe. But he which became his accuser, and was partner of treason, was one called Leobotes (Alcmeons sonne) borne in a village called AGRAVLA. Besi this, the SPARTANS also did sit on his skirtes, & charged him sorely. For Pausanias neuer fore reuealed to Themistocles the treason he had purposed, although hee was his very fami friend. But after he sawe Themistocles was banished, and did take his exile very vnpacient Pausanias reuealeth his treason vnto Themistocles. then Pausanias was bolde to open his treason to him, to procure him to take his part, shewed him the letters the king of PERSIA had written to him, and all to stirre him vp agai the GRECIANS, as against vngratefull and vnnaturall people. Howbeit Themistocles sho him off, and told him plainely he would be no partner of his treason. Notwithstanding, neuer reuealed it to any liuing creature, nor discouered the practise he intended: hoping ther he would haue giuen it ouer, or that shortly it would appeare by some other me considering he so fondly aspired to thinges of great daunger, and without purpose or p bilitie. After Pausanias was condemned, and had suffered paines of death for the same: found amongest his papers, certaine writings and letters, which made Themistocles to be Themistocles suspected of treason. sore suspected. Whereupon the LACEDÆMONIANS on the one side cryed out of him: & enemies and ill willers at ATHENS accused him on the other side. To the which he made swere by letters from the beginning, and wrote vnto the people, it was not likely that he(sought all the waies to rule, and was not borne to serue, neither had any minde thereto) w euer haue thought in his head, to sell his owne libertie, and the GRECIANS also vnt Barbarous people their enemies. Notwithstanding this purgation of his) the people b procurement of his enemies, sent to apprehend him, and to bring him before the states o GRECE, to be iudged by that counsell. Whereof Themistocles hauing intelligence in time Themistocles fled into the Ile of Corphu. did conueigh himselfe into the Ile of CORCYRA, because the citie there was greatly behol him, for certaine pleasure in time past he had done them. For they being at sute and with the CORINTHIANS, he tooke vp the matter betweene them, and gaue iudgeme their side, & condemned the CORINTHIANS to pay them twenty talents damages: & di down an order, that they should occupy the Ile of LEVCADIA in common together, as gre that had bene inhabited with the people, aswell of the one citie, as of the other. From thenc fled to Epirus, whither being followed by the ATHENIANS, and the LACEDÆMONIANS, was compelled to venter himselfe vpon a doubtfull and very dangerous hope. For he w to yeelde himselfe into the hands of Admetus, king of the MOLOSSIANS. Who hauing he to fore made certaine requests vnto the ATHENIANS, and being shamefully denyed them meanes of Themistocles (who then was at his chiefest height and authority) the king was The manner of supplication among the Molossians. vtterly offended with him: and it was likely in deed, that if he could then haue hands on him, he would haue bene reuenged of him throughly. Howbeit feeling the p misery of his exile, he thought he might lesse feare the Kings olde quarrell and displea when the fresh hate and enuy of his countreymen. Whereupon he went vnto King Ad tus, trusting to his mercy, and became an humble suter to him in a strange extraordinary For he tooke the Kings litle young sonne in his armes, and went and kneeled downe b the altar in his chappell: which humble manner of suing the MOLOSSIANS take to be effectuall, and such as they dare not deny nor refuse. Some say that Queene Phthia her the Kings wife, did enforme him of this their countrey custome and manner, and brought litle sonne also neare vnto the altar. Other write also, that it was Admetus himselfe that tau and shewed him this enforcing manner of petition, only for a cloke to excuse himselfe to t that should come to demaund Themistocles of him: that by duetie of religion he wa straightly bound and restrained, that he might not deliuer him out of his protection. In meane time, Epicrates Anharnian found the meanes secretly to conuay Themistocles wife children out of ATHENS, and did send them priuily vnto him: whereupon he was afterwa accused, and put to death, vpon Cimons accusation and motion, as Stesimbrotus writeth. W not remembring those matters I know not how, or making as though Themistocles had remembred him selfe doth say, that Themistocles sailed into SICILE, where he sought to ry Hierons daughter, the tyrant of SYRACVSA, promising him if he would let him haue he would assure him to conquer all GREECE for him, and to bring them vnder his obedience. But Hieron refusing this offer, Themistocles went from thence into ASIA: but that is not likely. For Theophrastus writeth in his booke intituled of Kingdoms, that Hieron hauing sent certain running horses to the feast of games Olympicall, & hauing set vp a maruellous rich and sumptuous tent there: Themistocles made an oration to the GRECIANS, declaring vnto them how they should teare the tyrants tent in peeces, and not to suffer his horses to runne with other swift and light horses, and to carie away the pryse in those holy games. Thucydides againe declareth, how he went vnto the other sea, and imbarked in the citie of PYDNE, being knowen of neuer a man in the shippe, vntill such time as the winde began to carie them into the Ile of NAXOS, which the ATHENIANS by chaunce did beseige at that time, where being afeard to be set on land, he was forced to bewray himselfe to the master of the shippe, and the masters mate, and wrought them, what with faire words and what with threates (by saying he would accuse them to the ATHENIANS, that they did not ignorantly receiue him in, but hyred for money) so as he compelled them to sayle on further, and to carie him into ASIA. As for his goods, his friendes saued the most part of them, and sent them into ASIA to him. But for those that came to light, and were confiscate vnto the state: Theopompus writeth, they did amount to the value of one hundred talents. And Theophrastus sayth, but to some fiue hundred only. So that all his goods was not worth three talents, when he began to gouerne the estate of the common weale. When he came vnto the cuse of CYMA, he perceiued that all the coastes by sea were laide for him to apprehend him, and that he had many spials vpon him: among the which, there were two speciall noted men, Argoieles, and one Pythodorus, the reward being very great, for me that could get their gaine any way they could. For the king of PERSIA had proclaimed by sound of trumpet, two hundred talents to him that brought him Themistocles. Whereupon he fled vnto a litle towne of AEOLIA, called ALEA, where no body knew him, but his host only, called Nicogenes: who was the richest man of all the AEOLIANS, and knew all the noble men of authoritie that were about the king of PERSIA. Themistocles continued hidden certaine dayes in his house: at which time, on a night after the fact of a sacrifice, one Olbius, schoolemaister to Nicogenes children, by some secret working of the gods, suddenly fell beside himselfe, and began to sing these verses out alowde.

Do thou beleeue, what so the night thee tels and giue thy voice, thy counsell and conceipes Vnto the night, in darksomnesse that dwels, therein also thy victorie awaits.

The next night following, Themistocles being fast a sleepe in his bed, dreamed that a snake wound it selfe round about his bellie, and glided vpwards to his necke, vntill it touched his face, and suddenly then it became an Eagle, and imbraced him with his winges: and so at length did lift him vp into the aire, and carried him a maruellous way off, vntill he thought he saw a golden rodde (such as Heraulds vse to carry in their handes) whereuppon the Eagle did set him, and so was deliuered of all this feare and trouble he thought him selfe in. The troth was, Nicogenes had this deuise in his head, how he might bring him safe to the King of PERSIANS coure. The barbarous nations for the most part (and specially the PERSIANS) are of a very strange nature, and maruellous iealous ouer their women, and that not onely of their wiues, but also of their bond women and concubines: which they keepe so straightly locked vp, that no man euer seeth them abroade at any time, but are alwaies like housedoues kept within doores. And when they haue any occasion to go into the countrey, they are caried in close coches couered all about, that no man can looke into them. Themistocles was conueied into one of these coches dresst after this manner, and had warned men to answer those they met by the way, that asked whom they carried: how it was a young GRECIAN gentlewoman of the countrey of IONIA, which they carried to the court for a noble man there. Thucydides, and Charon Lampsacenian say, he went thither after the death of Xerxes, and spake with his sonne there. But Ephorus, Dino, Clitarchus, Heraclides, and many other write, that he spake with him selfe. Yet notwithstanding it appeareth that Thucydides wordes doe best agree with the chronicles and tables, recording the succession of times, although they be of no great certaintie. Themistocles being come now to the swordes point (as it were) and to the extremitie of his daunger: did first present himselfe vnto one Artabanus, Colonell of a thousand footmen, and sayd vnto him, Sir, I am a GRECIAN borne, and desire to speake with the King: I haue matters of importance to open to his maiestie, and such as I know he will thankefully receiue. Artabanus aunswered him in this manner. My friend sir straunger, the lawes and customes of men are diuerse, and some take one thing for honest others some another thing: but it is most honestly for all men, to keepe and obserue the lawes and manners of their owne countrie. For you GRECIANS haue the name to loue libertie and equalitie aboue all things: and for vs amongst all the goodly lawes and customes we haue, we esteeme this aboue the rest; to reuerence and honour our King, as the image of the god of nature, who keepeth all things in their perfect life and state. Wherefore, if thou wilt fashion thy selfe after our manner to honour the King, thou mayest both see him, and speake with him: but if thou haue another minde with thee, then must thou of necessitie vse some other person for thy meane. For this is the manner of our country: the King neuer giueth audience to any man, that hath not first honoured him. Themistocles hearing what he sayd, answered him againe. My lord Artabanus, the great good will I beare vnto the King, and the desire I haue to aduaunce his glorie and power, is the onely cause of my present repaire vnto his court: therefore I meane not onely to obey your lawes (since it hath so pleased the goddes to raise vp the noble empire of PERSIA vnto this greatnesse) but will cause many other people also to honour the King, more then there do at this present. Therefore let there be no stay, but that my selfe in person may deliuer to the King that I haue to say vnto him. Well, saied Artabanus, whom shall we say thou art? For by thy speeche it seemeth thou art a man of no meane state and condition. Themistocles aunswered him: as for me Artabanus, none shall know before the King himselfe. Thus doth Phanias report, and Eratosthenes, in his bookes he wrote of riches; adding further, how Themistocles had access vnto this Artabanus, being recommended to the King by a woman of ERATRIA, whom the King kept. Themistocles being brought in his presence, after he had presented his humble duties and reuerence to him, stood on his feete, and sayd neuer a word, vntill the King commaunded the interpreter to aske him what he was? and he aunswered: May it please your maiestie, ô noble King: I am Themistocles the ATHENIAN, a banished man out of my countrie by the GRECIANS, who humbly repaire hither to your highnes, knowing I haue done great hurt to the PERSIANS, but I persuade my selfe I haue done them far more good then harme. For I it was that kept the GRECIANS back they did not follow you, whē the state of GREECE was deliuered from thraldome, and my natiue countrie from danger, and that I knew I should then in good state to pleasure you. Now for me, I finde all mens good wils agreeable to my present misery and calamity: for I come determined, most humbly to thanke your highnes for any grace and fauour you shall shew me, and also to craue humble pardon, if your maiestie be yet offended with me. And therefore licence me (most noble king) to beseech you, in taking mine enemies the GRECIANS for witnesses of the pleasures I haue done the PERSIAN nation, you will of your princely grace vse my hard fortune, as a good occasion to shew your honorable vertue, rather then to satisfie the passion of your heate and choller. For in saueing my life, your maiesty saueth an humble suter that put him selfe to your mercy: and in putting me to death, you shall rid away an enemy of the GRECIANS. Hauing spoke thus these words he said further, That the goddes by diuerse signes and tokens had procured him to come and submit him selfe vnto him, and tolde the King what vision he had seene in his dreame in Cybeles house: and declared also the oracle of Iupiter Dodonian, who had commaunded him that he should goe vnto him that was called as a god, and how he thought it was the person of his maiestie, because that god and he in troth were called both great Kings. The King hauing thus heard him speake, gaue him then no present answer againe, notwithstanding he marueilously wondred at his great wisedome and boldnes. But afterwards, amongest his familiars the King saide, he thought him selfe very happy to meete with the good fortune of Themistocles comming to him: and so besought his great god Arimanius, that he would alwaies send his enemies such mindes, as to banish the greatest and wisest men amongest them.

The Persians honour their King as the image of the god of nature.

Themistocles talke with the king of Persia.

It is reported also he did sacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes therfore, and disposed himselfe presently to be merry. Insomuch as dreaming in the night, in the middest of his dreame he cried out three times together for ioy: I haue Themistocles the Athenian. The next morning the King hauing sent for the chiefest lordes of his court, he made Themistocles also to be brought before him: who looked for no goodnes at all, specially when he saw the soul-diers warding at the court gates, giue him all countenance and language both, when they beheld him, and vnderstood his name. Moreouer Aspanes, one of the captaines, as Themistocles passed by him going to the King, (who was set in his chayre of state, and euery man keeping silence) softly sighing, sayed vnto him, O thou Greekish serpent, subtill and malicious: the Kings good fortune hath brought thee hither. Neuertheles when he came to the King, & had once againe made him a very humble and low reuerence: the King saluted him, & spake very curteously to him, saying, I am now your debtor of two hundred talents, for presenting yourselfe. It is good reason I should deliuer you the money promised him that should haue brought you: but I giue you a further warrant, be bold, I charge you, and speake your mind freely, say what you thinke of the state of GRAECIA. Themistocles then answered him, That mens words did properly resemble the stories and imagery in a peece of arrasse for both, in the peece and in the other, the goodly images of either of them are seene, when they are vnfolded and layed open.
Contrariwise they appeare not, but are lost, when they are shut vp & close folded. Wherevpon he sayed to the king, he must needes require some further time of answer. The King liked his comparison passingly well, & willed him to, appoint his owne time. Themistocles craued a yere: in which time hauing prettily learned the Persian tongue, he afterwards spake to the King himselfe without any interpreter. So, such as were no courtiers, thought he only talked with the King of matters of GRAECIA. But because the chaunge and alteration of the court fell out great at that time, the noble men imagined he had bene so bold to common with the King of them also. Thereupon they greatly enuied him, & afterwards murmured much against him. For in-deede the King did honour Themistocles aboue all other strangers whatsoeuer they were. On a time the King had him out a hunting with him, he made him see his mother, with whom he grew familiar, and by the King sowne commaundement he was to heare the disputations of the wise men of PERSIA touching secret philosophie, which they call magike. Demaratus the LACEDAEMONIAN being at that time in the court of PERSIA, the king willing him to aske what gift he would, he besought the King to grant him this fauour, to licence him to go vp & down the citie of SARDIS with his royall hat on his head as the Kings of PERSIA do. Mi-thropastes, the Kings cosin, taking him by the hand sayd vnto him Demaratus, the kings hatte thou demaundest, and if it were on thy heade, it would couer but litle wit: Naye though Iupiter did geue thee his lightning in thy hande, yet that would not make thee Iupiter. But the king gaue him so sharpe a repulse for his vnreasonable request, & was so angrie with him for it, that it was thought he would neuer haue forgeuen him: howbeit Themistocles was so earnest a suter for him, that he brought him into fauour againe. And the report goeth, that the kings successours which haue bene since that time, vnder whom the PERSIANS haue had more dealings with the GRAECIANS, then in former dayes: when they would retaine any great state or personage of GRAECIA into their seruice, they wrote vnto him, and promised him they would make him greater about them then euer was Themistocles about Xerxes. That which is written of him, doth also confirme it. For he being stept vp to great countenaunce and au-tority, & followed with great traines of suters after him by reason of his greatnes: seeing him self one daye very honorably serued at his table, & with all sortes of daintie meates, he turned him to his childrē, & sayed vnto them, My sonnes, we should haue bene vndone, if we had not bene vndone. The most writers do agree, that he had giuen him the reuenue of three cities for his al-lowāce of bread, wine & victuals: to wit, MAGNESIA, LAMPSACVS, & MYVNTA. But Neather Graecenia, & Phanias, do adde two other cities more, PERCOTA, & PALESCEPSIA: the one to defray his charges of apparel, & the other for his lodging. Afterwards Themistocles going into the low countries towards the sea, to take order against the practises of the GRAECIANS: there was a PERSIAN lord called Epixies (gouernour of the high PHRYGIA) that had laid a traine to kill him (hauing of long time hired certaine murderers of PISIDIA to doe it), so soone as he should come into a towne of his gouernment, called the Lyons head. But as he slept one day in his house in the after noone, the mother of the goddes appeared vnto him, and sayed, Themistocles, go not to the Lyons head, for feare thou meete with the Lyon: and for this warning, I do aske thy daughter Mnesiptolema for my seruant. Themistocles waking sodainly out of his dreame, made his prayer vnto the goddesse, and turning out of the high way, reached another compasse about. After wardes hauing passed that towne, he tooke his lodging being benighted: but one of the beastes which carried his tent, fell by the way, vnfortunately in a riuer, and all his arras and tapestry hangings being throughly wet, his seruantes were driuen to lay them out a drying, by moone light. The Pisidians that lay in wayt, and could not discerne by moone light that they were hangings layed out to dry, thought it had bene the very tent Themistocles selfe did lye in: whereupon they went vnto it with their swords drawne in their hands, hoping to haue taken him sleeping. But when they were come thither, and began to lift vp a peece of the hangings: some of the people of Themistocles (which kept watch) perceiuing them, ran vpon them, and tooke them. So Themistocles hauing escaped this danger, wondred greatly at the fauor of the goddesse which had appered vnto him. In recopence whereof, when he was in the citie of MAGNESIA, he built a temple vnto Dindymena, and made his daughter Mnesiptolema priorelle of the same. As he passed by the citie of SARDIS for his recreation, he went to visit the temples, and offerings that had bene giuen there. So he saw an image of a mayden in copper, in the temple of the mother of the gods, being two yardes high, which they called the Hydrophora: as much to say, as the watercarier. And it was a statue, which himselfe had heretofore dedicated and caused to be made, with the fines of those that had payed forfeytures, for stealing or turning away the water course at ATHENS, at such time as he was maister surueyer of the water workes and conduites there. Wherfore, whether Themistocles was sory to see his goodly image a prisoner in the handes of the Barbarous people, or that he would shew vnto the ATHENIANS the greatnes of his credit and authoritie through all the Kings dominions: he spake to the gouernour of LYDIA, and prayed him for his sake that he would send his image againe to ATHENS. But this Barbarous gouernour was very angry with his request, and told him he would aduertise the King thereof. Then Themistocles began to be afeard, and was driuen to recke to the gouernours women and concubines, whome he got with money to intreat him, and so made faire weather again with the gouernour. But fro thence forth he tooke better garde of himselfe in all his iourneys, greatly fearing the enuie of the Barbarous people. For he progressed not vp and downe ASIA, as Theopompus writeth, but lay a long time in the citie of MAGNESIA, quietly enioying the Kings gracious guts bestowed on him: where he was honoured and reuerenced for one of the greatest persons of PERSIA, whilest the King was els where occupied in the affaires of the high prouinces of ASIA, & had no leysure to thinke vpo those of GREECE. But when newes was brought him, that EGYPT was rebelled, by meanes of the fauour and assistance of the ATHENIANS, and that the GRECIANS gallies did couer the seas euen vnto the Ile of CYPRVS, and vnto the coastes of CILICIA, and that Cimon had all the sea in subiection: that made him then to bend all his thoughts how to resist the GRECIANS, that their greatnes might not turne to his harme. Then commissions went out to leauy men, to assemble captaines, and to dispatch poastes vnto Themistocles at MAGNESIA, with the Kings letters, straightly charging him to haue an eye to the GRECIANS doings, and moreouer that he should faythfully keepe his promise he had made to him. But he, to shew that he neither maliced his citizens, nor was mooued with the desire of greatnes and authoritie he might haue growne vnto in those watres, or else for that he thought the Kings expectation would proone to a greater matter, then he could ende or wade through, considering GREECE was full at that time of famous captaines, and that Cimon amongst the rest had marueilous good fortune, and that it should be a reproach to him to staine the glorie of so many noble actes, so many triumphes, and so great victories as Cimon had done and wonne: he tooke a wise resolution with himselfe, to make such an end of his life, as the fame thereof deserued, for he made a solemne sacrifice vnto the goddes, & feasted at the same all his friends. And after he had taken his leaue of them all, he dranke bulles bloud, as most men thinke (or as other say), poyson, which dispatcheth a man in foure and twentye howers, and so ended his dayes in the citie of MAGNESIA, after he had liued threescore & fiue yeres, & the most part of them alwayes in office, and great charge. It is written, that the King of PERSIA vnderstãding the cause and manner of his death, did more estcome him afterwards, then he did before, and that euer after he continued to vse his friends and familiars in very good sort. For he left children behind him, which he had of Archippe (Lysanders daughter) of the towne of ALOPECIA: Archeptolis, polyeuctus, and Cleophantus, of whom Plato the philosopher maketh mention, saying that he was a good man at armes, but otherwise that there was no goodnes in him. His other sonnes that were elder, as Neocles, died being bitten with a horse: and as for Diocles another sonne, his grandfather Lysander did adopt him for his sonne. He had many daughters, of the which Mnesiptolema (which he had by a second wife) was maried vnto her halfe brother Archeptolis, for they were not both of one venter. Another called Italia, was maried vnto one Panthides of CHIO. Syharis, vnto Nicomedes an ATHENIAN. And Nicomacha, vnto Pharsicles, Themistocles nephewe: vnto whom her brethren did marry her within the citie of MAGNESIA, after the death of their father. This Pharsicles did bring vp ASIA, which was the yongest of all his daughters. Furthermore his sumptuous tumbe standeth yet in the market place of MAGNESIA. But that Andocides writeth of his bones, in a booke he made to his friendes, is not to be credited, which was: that the ATHENIANS hauing found the ashes of his bones, did cast them vp into the ayer, as a deuise to sturre vp the noble men against the people. And Phylarchus in his historie (much like vnto the fayned subtilties of a tragedie) bringeth in I cannot tell what Neocles and Demopolis, for Themistocles sonnes, to moue the readers with compassion. Howbeit no man is so simple, but will iudge it straight a very fayning and deuise. Diodorus the cosmographer also in a booke he hath written of tumbes and monuments sayeth, by coniecture, rather then of any certen knowledge: that alongst the hauen of PIRAEA, coming towards the head of Alcimus, there is a forelande in forme of an elbowe, within the which when they haue doubled the poynt, the sea is alwaies calme, and there they finde a great and long foundation or base, vpon the which there is as it were the forme of an alter, and that is (sayeth he) Themistocles tumbe. And he supposeth that Plato the comicall poet doth witnesse it in these verses:

Thy graue is set and plast, commodiously, where passengers and marchants that come by may visite thee, and where it may regard, all such as seeke that port to be their warde.
Sometimes also, it may reioyce to see, the bloudy fightes, vpon the sea that be.

Honours done to Themistocles after his death.

And furthermore, those of MAGNESIA did institute certen honours vnto the issue of Themistocles, which continue yet vnto this day. And in my time, another Themistocles also of ATHENS did enioy the same honours, with whom I was familiarly conuersant in the house of Ammonius the philosopher.

The ende of Themistocles life.

THE LIFE OF Furius Camillus.

AMONGST many great matters which are ſpoken of this Furius Camillus, this ſeemeth moſt ſtraunge and wonderfull aboue the rest. That he hauing borne the chiefeſt offices of charge in his countrie, and hauing done many notable and worthy deedes in the ſame: was one that was choſen fiue times Dictator, and had triumphed foure times, and had wonne himſelfe the name and title of the ſecond founder of ROME, and yet neuer came to be Conſul. But the onely cauſe thereof was, that the common weale of ROME ſtoode then in ſuch ſtate and ſort. The people were then at diſſention with the Senate.

Why Camillus neuer came to be Conſul.

They would chuſe no more Conſuls, but other kinde of gouernours whom they called Tribuni militares: theſe did all things with like power & authoritie as the Conſuls, yet were they nothing ſo odious vnto the people, by reaſon of the number that was of them. For it was ſome hope to them that could ill beare the rule of the ſmall number of nobilitie, that the gouernment of the ſtate being put into ſixe, and not into two officers hands, their rule would be the eaſier, and tollerabler. Now Camillus being at that time in his beſt credit and authoritie, and in the prime and glorie of his doings, did not deſire to be made Conſul without the goodwill of the people, although whileſt he was in authoritie, there were many times Conſuls created. But to all other offices and dignities, he was called, and choſen. He behaued himſelfe in ſuch ſort, that when he was alone, he made his authoritie common to other: and when he had companions and aſſociates, the glorie of all redounded to himſelfe alone. The cauſe whereof was his modeſtie on the one ſide, for he commaunded euer without enuie: and his great wiſdome and ſufficiencie on the other ſide, for the which all others willingly gaue him place and yeelded to him. The houſe of the Furians being at that time of no great fame, he was the firſt that beganne to ſet himſelfe forwards. For in a great battell which was fought againſt the Æques and Volſces, he being but a priuate man at armes vnder the Dictator Poſthumius Tubertus, was the firſt that riding out of the army, aduaunced himſelfe and gaue the charge. And being runne into the thigh at that time with a ſtaffe broken vpon his thigh, he plucked the truncheon out and retired not for all that: but giuing charge againe vpon the ſtouteſt of the enemies, he fought it out ſo valiantly to the encouraging of other, that he was the chiefe cauſe they turned their backes. Whereupon, to requite his ſeruice done at that time (beſides other honours honours they did him) they made him Censor: an office at that time of great preheminence & dignitie. In his office of Censorship, he did two notable acts. The one very honest: when he brought men that were not maried, to marry the womē whom the wars had left widows which were in number many. To this he got thē partly by persuasiō, & partly by threatnings, to set roūd fines vpō their heads that refused. The other very necessary: in that he brought the orphanes to be contributories, vnto taxes, & subsidies, which before payed nothing. The cause therof was, the continuall warres, about the which the common weale sustained great charges: but specially about the siege of the citie of the VEIANS (which some cal VENETANIANS) that was a very sore burden to thē at that time. For it was the capital citie of all THVSCAN, the which for store of armour, & nūber of soldiers, was nothing inferiour to the cittie of ROME. For the VEIANS being growē to stomake & courage in time, by reasō of their wealth & prosperitie, & for the sundry great battels they had fought against the ROMAINES, that contēded with them for glory & empire: and now it fel so out, that they finding themselues weakned by many great ouerthrowes, which they had receiued of the ROMAINES, they did let fall their former peacocks brauery & ambitiō, to bid them battell any more in the fielde. Howbeit the inhabitants of the cittie of VEIES hauing raised the walles & made very great high rāpers, began to fortifie themselues, & made good prouision for armour & munition, besides store of corne, shotte, & other necessary things: they valiantly, & without feare of any thing, defended the siege of the ROMAINES, that cōtinued a long time, & was no lesse hard & painful vnto thē that did besiege, then it was vnto those that were besieged. For where the ROMAINES were wont beforetime to keepe their houses in the winter season, and the field only in the summer time: that was the first time they were compelled by the captaines and Tribuni militares, to build fortes, and to entrench their campe with a wall, euen in their enemies country, and to winter abroad as they were wont to lye in the campe in sōmer. Now this siege had continued seuen yeres together. The captaines were burdened that they did not their duties, nor stood manfully to their charge: whereupon in the end they were discharged, and other captaines placed in their roomes to follow the siege. Amōg those, Camillus was one, whom then the second time they created Tribunus militaris. Who notwithstanding did nothing then in that siege, becaūse it was his happe by lot, to make warrs vpon the PHALERIANS and, the CAPENATES. These people whilest the ROMAINES were occupied other where, had inuaded their countrie and done them great harme, during the time of their warre with the THVSCANS. But Camillus hauing ouerthrowne a great number of them in the fielde, had the rest in chase, and draue them to take their cittie, and did shut them vp within their owne walles. The chaunce that happened at the lake of ALBANVS, about the time the THVSCAN warres were greatest, did maruellously amate the ROMAINES, being no lesse wonderfull, thē the most straunge and vncredible thing that could be told by man. For they could not finde out the cause of it by common reason, nor any naturall ground: considering it was in the later end of Autumne, and sommer was ended, and that there had not bene much raine, nor notable sowth windes. And although there are many lakes, many brookes, and riuers, many springs, and other waters in ITALIE: yet some of them dried vp altogether, other ranne but faintly by reason of the drought, and all the riuers then were (as they are wont to be cōmonly in sommer) very lowe, and there was scant any water. But the lake ALBANVS contrariwise, that cometh from no other place, neither runneth any whither out of it selfe, being enuironned all about with hilles and mountaines, and where the earth is good: beganne to swell, and rise to euery mans sight, without any cause at all (but secret and hidden vnto the goddes alone) and went allwayes increasing alongest those hilles sides, vntill such time as it came to be euen with the hight of the highest mountaine, gathering vpwardes still without any waues or tempest of weather at all. This at the first, made poore sheepeheardes and heardemen, keeping their cattell thereaboutes, maruellously afrayde. But at the lengh when the earthe and the waight of one of the hilles (which kepte in the lake as a walle, from running ouer into the fielde) beganne to breake by reason of the wayght, and great quantitie of water, that ranne straight with a maruellous extreame force and violence ouer all the arable landes and groundes planted with trees, and so tooke his course into the sea: the ROMAINES then not alone, but the whole inhabitants of ITALY were wonderfully affrayde, and iudged that it was some signe and prognostication of some wonderful thing to come. And there was no other newes currante in the campe, which lay at siege of the cittie of VEIES: insomuch as the very brute of it flewe ouer the walles of the cittie, vnto them that were besieged. And as it happeneth very ofte in long sieges, that those which lye in campe do often times talke with them that are besieged: there was a ROMAINE who fell acquainted, and commonly vsed to talke familiarly with one of the citie, who could tell of many olde and straunge things done and happened, and was very skilfull aboue any other in the cittie, in the arte of diuination, or soothsaying. The ROMAINE then told him one day the violent breaking out of the lake ALBANVS, and perceiuing that the other after he had heard him, was as merrie as a pye at the matter, and that he gibed at their siege: he told him further, that this wonderfull chaunce was not onely happened vnto the ROMAINES at that time, but that they had beene acquainted with many other farre more straunge then this, which he would very willingly open vnto him, to see if there were any remedy, that though the affaires of the common weale had but hard successe, yet he would procure that his owne priuate matters might prosper wel with him. The VEIAN answered them, he would heare them with a good will, gaue good eare vnto him, hoping to haue heard some great secret. So the ROMAINE training him on still from one matter to another, holding on his way, vntill he saw he was a good distance off from the gates of the cittie, he sodainly caught hold on him, and by strong hand caried him away with him, and with helpe of other souldiers which came running out of the campe vnto him, he brought him to the captaines. The VEIAN seeing himselfe thus forcibly vsed, and knowing also that fatall destiny cannot be auoyded, beganne to declare vnto the ROMAINES, the auncient oracles and propheses touching the fortune of their cittie: by which it was reported vnto them, that the cittie of VEIES should neuer be taken, vntill the enemie had caused the water of the lake ALBANVS (which should breake out) to be brought backe againe, and to turne it some other way from thence, that it should not fall into the sea. This was caried vnto the Senate at ROME, to be consulted of in the counsell: & there it was determined they should send to the oracle of Apollo, at the cittie of DELPHES, and aske him what they should do therein. So thither were sent great and notable men, Cossus Licinius, Valerius Potitus and Fabius Ambustus: who hauing ended their iorney by sea, and receiued answere to that they demaunded, returned home againe, and amongest other oracles they brought one that sayed thus. That through negligence they had omitted some auncient ceremonies in the holy dayes of the Latines. And another willed them, that they should by all possible means they could, keepe the water of the lake ALBANVS that it fell not into the sea, and should (if it were possible) bring it backe againe into his old place: if not, that yet they should cut as many trenches and ditches as might be, that it might be drunke vp in the middest of the fields. When these oracles were vnderstanded, the prieستes prepared all things for diuine seruice, and the people went about the water of the lake to turne it againe. After these things were done, the Senate in the tenth yere of the warres against the VEIANS, put off all those which did beare office, and created Camillus Dictator, who named for generall of the horse men Cornelius Scipio. And before he went in hand with any thing, he made a vow vnto the goddesse that if it pleased them to graunt a happy ende of these warres, in honour of them he would celebrate great playes, and build a temple vnto the goddesse which the ROMAINES call Matuta: which seemeth to be her whom we call Leucothea, considering the ceremonies done at these sacrifices. For they cause a chambermayde to enter into her temple, and there they box her about the eares. Then they put her out of the temple, and do embrace their brothers childrē rather then their owne. They make many other ceremonies, and they are much like vnto those that are done vnto Bacchus nurces, and to the misfortunes that chaunced vnto Ino, by reason of her husbands concubine. After all these vowes and prayers made, he entred with his armie into the FALISSIANS territories, whom he ouerthrew in a great battell, together with the CAPENATES also, which came to aide them. From thence he went to the siege of the cittie of VEIES, where perceiuing to take it by assault, was not to be wonne without great daunger: he beganne to vndermine it (finding the earth all about very minable) and all so deepe, that the enemies could perceiue nothing. Now when his mining fell out according to his good hope, he gaue an assaulte to the walles in all places alike about the citie at one instant, to bring out all the inhabitants of the citie to man the walles. Whilest they were all thus vpon the walles to make defence: Camillus souldiers entred secretly through the mines within the castell, hard by the temple of Iuno: which was the chiefe Church of all the citie, and whereunto the cittizens had most deuotion. They say that euen at that present time the generall of the THVSCANS did sacrifice vnto the goddes, and that his foothsaier hauing considered the intrels of the beasts offered vp in sacrifice, cried out aloude, that the goddes gaue the victorie vnto him, which should happen to come vpon them in this sacrifice. The ROMAINES which were within the mine hearing this, brake the earth incontinently, and leaped out, crying, and making noise with their weapons: wherewith the enemies were so astonied, that they fled vpon it, and so the ROMAINE stooke the intrels and caried them vnto Camillus. And these be euen much like the Poets tales and fables. Howbeit Camillus hauing by this meanes taken the citie, and seeing from the toppe of the castell the infinite goods and riches within the citie, which the souldiers spoiled and made hauoke of, he wept for very pitie. And when those that were about him tolde him he was a happie man: he lift vp his hands vnto heauen, and made this praier. O mightie god Iupiter, and you ô goddes, which see and iudge mens good and ill works: you know right well, that we haue not willingly (without wrong and cause offered vs) begunne this warre, but iustly, and by compulsion, to be reuenged of a citie, our enemie, which hath done vs great iniuries. But if to counteruaile this our great good prosperitie, and victorie, some bitter aduersitie and ouerthrowe be predestined vnto vs: I beseech you then (most mercifull goddes) in sparing our citie of ROME, and this her armie, you will (with as litle hurte as may be) let it all fall and light vpon my person alone. And as he had spoken these words, and was turning on his right hand (according to the manner of the ROMAINES after they haue prayed vnto the goddes) he fell downe flat before them all. The standers by taking this fall for an ill token, were somwhat troubled with the matter: but after he got vp on his feete againe, he tolde them that the thing he requested of the gods was happened vnto him. And that was, a little hurte, in exchange of a great good fortune. So the whole citie being spoiled and rifled, he was also desirous to carie Iunos image to ROME, to accomplish the vowe he had made. And hauing sent for workemen for this purpose, he did sacrifice first vnto the goddesse, beseeching her to accept well of the ROMAINES good will, and that she would willingly vouchsafe to come and dwell with the other gods, who had the protection of the citie of ROME. Some say, that the image aunswered, she was contented. But Liuius writeth that Camillus made this praier, as he touched the image, and that the assistants answered she was contented, and would go with a good will. Yet they which do affirme, it was the image selfe that spake, do fauour this miracle, grounding their proofe vpon the opinion of the fortune of ROME: the which, from so base and meane beginning had impossibly attained vnto so high glory and power as it had, without the singular fauour of the goddes, and that hath manifestly appeared vnto the world, by sundry great proofes and examples. They bring forth also such other like wonders. As, that images haue heretofore let fall drops of swet from them: that they haue bene heard to sighe: that they haue turned: and that they haue made certaine signes with their eyes, as we finde written in many ancient stories. And we could our selues also tell such like wonders, which we haue heard men of our time affirme, which are not vncredible, nor lightly to be condemned. But for such matters, it is as daungerous to giue too much credit to them, as also to discredit them too much, by reason of the weakenesse of mans nature, which hath no certaine bounds, nor can rule it selfe, but runneth somtimes after vanity and superstition, and otherwhile also despiseth and contemneth holy and diuine matters: and therefore the meane is the vertue, and not to go too farre in this, as in all other things besides, it is the best. Now Camillus, whether his late enterprise performed, in winning a citie that stood out with ROME, and held siege with them ten yeares together, had put him into an ouerweening or conceipt of him selfe: or that the words of the people, which did blesse and praise him, had made him looke high, and presume vpon himselfe, more then became the modestie of a ciuill magistrate, and gouernour of the common weale, & one that was subiect to the law: he shewed a stately triumphe, set forth with all rich furniture, & specially for that himselfe was caried through ROME vpon his triumphant cha ret drawne with foure faire white coursers. This, neuer captaine nor general before him dur vndertake to do, neither any euer after him attempted it: for they thinke it as a sacred carria and onely meete for the king, and father of the gods. This bred him much enuie amongst his cittizens, which had not bene acquainted with so great statelinesse. There was another occa on also that made them mislike him much: which was, because he stood against the lawe p forth that they should deuide the citie of ROME. For the Tribunes of the people did set out a Edict, that the Senate & people of ROME should be deuided into two parts: and that those whom the lotte should fall, should abide still in ROME, and the other should go dwell in th new wunne citie of VEIES. These were the reasons to perswade this: that both the one an the other sort should be richer then they were before, and should more easily keepe their lan and goods from the inuasion of their enemies, by meanes of these two great cities. The peop which were multiplyed now into great numbers, and had serued dutifully and dangerously thought it the best way in the world: Therefore they still cried out, and thronged with gre tumult, about their pulpit for orations, praying that this lawe might be put vnto the voic of the people. But the whole Senate, and wisest cittizens among them, iudging this motion the Tribunes would be the destruction, and not the diuision of the citie of ROME: could in wise abide it should go any further. Whereupon they went and prayed Camillus helpe: wh fearing to bring it to the point, whether the law should passe or no, did alwaies seeke new o casions and lets, still to delay and put off the matter, and stay the confirmation of this law. F these causes, he was hated of the common people. But the originall and apparant cause of t peoples ill will towards him, was for taking from them the tenth part of their spoiles: and was not altogether without some reason, and to say truly the people did him much wrong beare him such malice for that. For before he went to the citie of VEIES, he made a solem vowe to offer the tenth part vnto the gods, of the spoiles of the citie, if he wanne the same. when it was taken and sacked, whether it was that he was lothe to trouble the cittizens, or uing a world of businesse in his head, that he easily forgat his vowe: he suffered the souldi to deuide the spoile amongst them, and to take the benefit to themselues. Shortly after he discharged of his charge, he did enforme the Senate of his vowe. Furthermore, the soothsa ers made report at that very time, how they knew by certaine signes and tokens of their crifices, that the gods were offended for somewhat, and how they must of necessitie be pac ed againe. Whereupon the Senate presently made an order, where it was vnpossible eue man should bring in againe the selfe same things he had gotten, to make a new diuision euery mans share: that euery one therefore vpon his othe should present the tenth part his gaines he had gotten by that bootie. There was great trouble about it. They were uen to vse great extremitie to the poore souldiers (which had trauelled sore, and taken gr paines in the warres) to make them to restore back such a colloppe out of their gaine; a the rather because many of them had already spent it euery penny: and for this trouble, th all cryed out with open mouth against Camillus. But he being set vp, and not knowing oth wise how to excuse himselfe, was forced to bring forth as cold and as vnreasonable an e cuse as he could make, which was: forsooth he had forgotten his vowe he had made. T people notwithstanding were eger still against him, saying: how he had vowed then to of the tenth part of the enemies goods to the goddes, and that nowe he would perform with the tenths of the cittizens goods. Neuertheless, euery man hauing brought that should for his part: it was thought good they should cause a massye cuppe of golde to made, to send to the temple of Apollo at DELPHES. And small store of golde being in t citie of ROME, as the officers of the citie were searching vp and downe to get it: the w men of ROME of their owne voluntarie willes without motion, agreed among themselues that they would depart with all the iewels they had towards the making vp of this offerin which came to the weight of eight talents. In recompence whereof, to honour them with the Senate ordained that they should be praised openly with funerall orations at their b riall, as they did vse at honourable and noble mens obsequies. For before that lawe, it was n

the manner to praise women openly at their funerals. Now there were appointed three of the noblest men of the citie to go to carie this offering, and they sent them out in a galley well manned, stored also with good mariners, & trimly set forth in all triumphing maner: howbeit both in storme, and calme weather, they were in danger of their liues. For after that they had scaped drowning very narrowly by tempest, when the winde was down againe, they fell into another danger, which they escaped also beyond all hope. For hard by the Iles of Æolvs, the galleys of the Liparians fell vpon them, as if they had bene rouers. But when the Liparians sawe they made no resistance, and intreated them, holding vp their hands: they gaue no further charge vpon them, but only fastened their galley vnto theirs. So when they had haled them to the shore, they declared they were pirats, and offered to make port sale of the men and goods, as if they had bene a lawfull prise: and had sold them in deed, had not the wisedom and authoritie of Timesitheus letted them, who was gouernour at that time of the citie, and had great a do to perswade them to let them go. And he did not so leaue them, but sent out certaine of his owne shippes to accompanie them in their iourney, who did helpe them to go and performe their offering. For which curtesie of his, the Romaines afterwards did him great honour at Rome, according to his well deseruing. The Tribunes of the people began now to set a foote against the law for the deuiding of the inhabitants of Rome vnto the citie of Vbies. But the warres of the Falisces fell out happely at that time, whereby the noble men did choose such officers as they would. So they chose Camillus, Tribunus militar is of the souldiers, and fiue other to assist him; the seruice in that case requiring a generall, that caried both authoritie and reputation among them, as an olde experienced souldier in the warres. When the people had confirmed the election, Camillus immediatly entred the territories of the Falisces with the Romaines armie, where he laide siege vnto the citie of the Falerians, being very well fortified, victualed & stored, with all other munition of warre. Knowing therefore that it was no small attempt to winne this citie, and that it would not be done in a short time: he politickely sought (whatsoeuer came of it) to keepe his countrimen occupied about some thing, & to stay them for going home, least by repairing to Rome, they should haue many occasions to rebell, and raise some ciuill dissention. For the Romaines did wisely vse this remedie; to disperse abroad like good phisicians, the humors which troubled the quiet state of their common weale at home. But the Falerians trusting in the situation of their citie, which was very strong in all parts, made so litle accompt of the siege: that those which kept not watch vpon the walles, walked vp and downe in their gownes in the citie, without any weapon about them, and their children went to schoole, the schoolemaister also would commonly leade them abroad out of the citie a walking, to play and passe the time by the towne walles. For the whole citie had one common schoolemaister, as the Grecians also haue, which do bring vp their children from litle ones in company together, because one may be familiarly acquainted with another. This scholemaster spying his time to do the Falerians a shrewd turne, did accustomably take all his scholers out of the city with him, to play not farre from the walles at the beginning, and afterwards brought them into the citie againe after they had played their fill. Now after he had led them abroade thus once or twise, he trained them out euery day a litle further, to make them to be bolde, perswading them there was no danger. But at the length, one day hauing gotten all the citizens children with him, he led them within the watch of the Romaines campe; and there deliuered all his scholers into their hands, and praied them they would bring him vnto their generall. So they did. And when he came before Camillus, he began to tell him that he was schoolemaister vnto all these children, neuertheless that he did more esteeme to haue his grace and fauour, then regard his office he had by this name and title. Camillus hearing what he said, and beholding his treacherous part, he said to those that were about him. Warre of it selfe surely is an euill thing, for in warres many iniuries and mischiefes are done: neuertheless, among good men there is a law and discipline, which doth forbid them to seeke victorie by wicked and traiterous meanes, and that a noble and worthie generall should make warre, and procure victorie, by trusting to his owne valiantnes, & not by anothers vilenesse & villanie. Therefore he commanded his sergeants to teare the clothes off the back of this vile schoolemaster, and to bind his hands behinde him and that they ſhould giue the children roddes and whippes in their hands, to whippe the traitour backe againe into the citie, that had betraied them, and grieued their parents. Now when the FALERIANS heard newes that the ſchoolemaiſter had thus betrayed them, all the citie fell a weeping (as euery man may thinke for ſo great a loſſe) and men and women ranne together one in anothers neck, to the towne walles, and gates of the citie, like people out of their wits, they were ſo troubled. When they came thither, they ſaw their childrē bringing their ſchoolemaiſter back againe, ſtarke naked and bound, whipping of him, and calling Camillus their father, their god, and their ſauiour: ſo that not only the fathers and mothers of the children, but all other the cittizens alſo in generall, did conceiue in themſelues a wonderfull admiration and great loue of the wiſedome, goodneſſe, and iuſtice of Camillus. So that euen preſently they called a counſell, and there it was concluded they ſhould ſend ambaſſadours forthwith vnto him, to put their liues and goods to his mercie and fauour. Camillus ſent their ambaſſadours vnto ROME, where audience being giuen vnto them by the Senate, the ambaſſadours ſayd, Becauſe the ROMAINES preferred iuſtice aboue victorie, they taught them to be better contented to ſubmit themſelues vnto them, then to be their owne men at liberty: confeſſing their vertue did more ouercome them, then any force or power could do. The Senate diſpatched letters vnto Camillus, giuing him commiſſion to do and determine as he thought good. So he hauing taken a certaine ſumme of money of the FALERIANS, did furthermore make peace & league with all the reſt of the FALISCES: and thereupon returned back againe to ROME. But the ſouldiers grudged maruellouſly at it. For they ſtood in hope to haue had the ſacking of the citie. When there was no remedie, but they muſt needes returne home emptie handed, they began to accuſe Camillus to the reſt of the cittizens, as ſoone as they came to ROME, ſaying: he loued not the common people, and how for ſpight he diſappointed their armie of the ſpoile. On the other ſide, the Tribunes of the people began to reuiue the lawe, for the deuiding of the inhabitants of ROME, and were ready to paſſe it by the voices of the people. Camillus not fearing the ill will of the commons, did boldly ſpeake, and do in open preſence, all he could againſt it. So that plainely he was the chiefeſt cauſe, that the people againſt their willes (in treate what they could) were driuen to let it alone. But withall they were ſo ſpightfull againſt him, that notwithſtanding his ſorowe and misfortune for the death of his ſonne (dying of a ſickneſſe) was great: they would not of malice once take pitty or compaſſion of him. The loſſe wherof (albeit he was of a very good & courteous nature) was ſo grieuous, and made him ſo vnquiet: that being accuſed before the people, he ſtirred not once out of his houſe, but was locked vp with the women, which lamented for his ſonne departed. He that did accuſe him, was one Lucius Apuleius, but hearing him that he had ſtolne and taken away, part of the ſpoyle of the THVSCANS: and ſaid they had ſeene certaine braſen gates at his houſe, which had bene brought out of THVSCAN. Now the people were ſo maliciouſly bent againſt him, that euery man might ſee, if they could once take him in a trippe, vpon any aduantage whatſoeuer, they would doubtleſſe haue condemned him. Wherefore calling together his friends and ſouldiers that had ſerued vnder him in the warres, or that had taken charge with him, which were many in number: he earneſtly beſought the, that they would not ſuffer him thus vilely to be condemned, through falſe and vniuſt accuſations laide againſt him, nor to be ſo ſcorned and detained by his enemies. His friends hauing laide their heads together, and conſulted thereupon, made him anſwer: how for his iudgement they could not remedie it, but if he were condemned, they would all ioyne together with a very good will, to helpe to pay his fine. But he being of minde not to beare ſuch an open ſhame and ignominie, determined in choller to leaue the citie, and to exile himſelfe from it. And after he had taken his leaue of his wife and children, bidding them farewell: he went out of his houſe to the gates of the city, and ſaid neuer a word. When he came thither, he ſtayed ſodainly, and returning back againe, he lift vp his hands towards the Capitoll, and made his prayers vnto the gods: that if it were of very ſpight and mallice, and not of iuſt deſeruing, that the common people compelled him thus ſhamefully to forſake the citie, that the ROMAINES might quickly repent them, and in the face of the world might wiſh for him, and haue needs of him. After he had made these prayers againſt the cittizens (as Achilles did againſt the GRECIANS) he went his way, & was condemned for his contempt, in the summe of fifteene thousande Asses of the ROMAINE coyne, which make of Greekish money, a thousand fiue hundred Drachmas of siluer: for an As was a litle peece of money, wherof ten of them made a ROMAINE penny. Howbeit there was not a ROMAINE of any vnderstanding, but beleeued certainly that some great punishmẽt would follow them incontinently, and that the wrong and iniurie they had done him would be quickly requited, with some most sharpe & terrible reuenge, not only vnpleasant to thinke vpon, but further most notable to be spoken of through the world. There fell out so sodainly vpon it, such mischief toward the citie of ROME, and the present time also brought forth such occasion of daunger and destruction therof, to their shame & infamie: that it was vncertaine whether it happened by chaunce, or els it was the handie worke of some god, that would not suffer vertue recompenced with ingratitude, to passe vnreuenged. Their first token that threatned some great mischiefe to light vpon them, was the death of Iulius, one of the Censors: for the ROMAINES doe greatly reuerence the office of a Censor, and esteeme it as a sacred place. The second token that happened a litle before Camillus exile, was: that one Marcus Caditius, a man but of meane qualitie, and none of the Senatours (but otherwise a faire conditioned honest man, and of good conscience) told the Tribuni militares of a thing that was to be well considered of. For he sayde that the night before, as he was going on his way in the newe streete, he heard one call him aloud: and returning backe to see what it was, he sawe no liuing creature, but onely heard a voyce bigger then a mans, which sayd vnto him. Marcus Caditius, goe thy way to morrow morning to the Tribuni militares, and bid them looke quickly for the GAVLES. The Tribunes were merie at the matter, and made but a ieast at his warning, and straight after followed the condemnation of Camillus. Nowe as touching the GAVLES. They came (as they say) of the CELTES, whose countrie not being able to maintaine the multitudes of them, they were driuen to goe seeke other countries to inhabite in: and there were amongst them many thousands of young men of seruice and good souldiers, but yet more women and litle children by a great number. Of these people, some of them went towardes the North sea, passing the mountaines RHENE, and did dwell in the extreme partes of EVROPE. Other of them remained betweene the mountaines PIRENE, & the greatest mountaines of the ALPES, neere vnto the SENONES, and the CELTORII. There they continued a long time, vntill they fortuned in the ende to taste of the wine, which was first brought out of ITALY vnto them. Which drinke they found so good, and were so delighted with it, that sodainely they armed themselues: and taking their wiues and children with them, they went directly towards the ALPES, to goe seeke out the countrie that brought forth such frute, iudging all other countries in respect of that, to be but wilde and barren. It is sayd, that the first man which brought wine vnto them, and that did procure them to passe into ITALY, was a noble man of THVSCAN called Arron, and otherwise of no ill disposed nature: howbeit he was subiect to this misfortune following. He was tutor vnto an orphan child, the richest that was at that time in all the countrie of THVSCAN, and of complexion was wonderfull fayre: he was called Lucumo. This orphan was brought vp in Arrons house of a childe, and though he was growen to mans state, yet he would not go from him, saying he was so well, & to his liking. But in deede the cause was, that he loued his mistresse (Arrons wife) who secretly he had enioyed a long time, and she him, that made him like his continuance there. Howbeit in the ende, loue hauing so possessed them both, that neither part could withdraw from other, much lesse colour that they had long enioyed: the yong man stole her away from him, and kept her still by force. Arron put him in suite, but he preuayled not: for Lucumo ouerweyed him with friends, money, gifts, and charges. But he tooke it so grieuously, that he left his country: and hauing heard talke of the GAVLES, he went vnto them, and was their guide to bring them into ITALY. So they conquered at their first comming all that countrie which the THVSCANS helde in old time, beginning at the foote of the mountaines, and stretched out in length from one sea vnto the other which enuironeth ITALY, as the names themselues doe witnesse. For they call yet that sea which looketh vnto the North, the Adriatick sea: by reason of a citie built sometime by the THVSCANS, which was called Adria. The other, which lieth directly ouer against the South, is called the THVSCAN sea. All that countrie is well planted with trees, and hath goodly pleasant pastures for beastes and cattell to feede in, & is notably watered with goodly running riuers. There was also at that time eighteene fayre great cities in that countrie, all of them very strong and well seated, aswell for to enrich the inhabitants thereof by trafficke, as to make them to liue delicately for pleasure. All these cities the GAVLES had won, and had expulsed the THVSCANS, but this was done long time before. Now the GAVLES being further entred into THVSCAN, did besiege the citie of CLVSIVM. Thereupon the CLVSIANS seeking aide of the ROMAINES, besought them they would send letters and ambassadours vnto these barbarous people in their fauour. They sent vnto them three of the best and most honorable persons of the citie, all three of the house of the Fabians. The GAVLES receiued them very courteously, because of the name of ROME: and leauing to assault the citie, they gaue them audience. The ROMAINE ambassadours did aske them, what iniurie the CLVSIANS had done vnto them, that they came to make wars with them. Brennus king of the GAVLES, hearing this question, smiled, and answered them thus. The CLVSIANS do vs wrong in this: they being but few people together, & not able to occupie much land, do notwithstanding possesse much, and will let vs haue no part with them, that are strangers, and out of our countrie, and stand in neede of seat and habitation. The like wrong was offered vnto you ROMAINES in olde time, by those of ALBA, by the FIDENATES, and the ARDEATES: and not long sithence, by the VEIANS, and the CAPENATES: & partly by the FALISCES & the VOLSCES against whom ye haue taken, & do take armes, at all times. And as oft as they will let you haue no part of their goods, ye imprison their persons, robbe & spoile their goods, and destroy their cities. And in doing this, ye do them no wrong at all, but follow the oldest law that is in the world, which euer leaueth vnto the stronger, that which the weaker cannot keepe and enioy. Beginning with the goddes, and ending with beasts: the which haue this propertie in nature, that the bigger and stronger haue euer the vantage of the weaker & lesser. Therfore, leaue your pittie to see the CLVSIANS besieged, least you teach vs GAVLES to take compassion also of those you haue oppressed. By this answere the ROMAINES knew very well, there was no way to make peace with king Brennus. Wherefore they entred into the citie of CLVSIVM, and incouraged the inhabitants to salie out with them vpon these barbarous people: either because they had a desire to proue the valiantnesse of the GAVLES, or else to shew their owne courage and manhood. So the citizens went out, & skirmished with them hard by the walles: in the which one of the Fabians, called Quintus Fabius Ambustus, being excellently well horsed, and putting spurres to him, did set vpon a goodly bigge personage of the GAVLES, that had aduaunced himselfe farre before all the troupe of his companions. He was not knowen at the first encounter, aswell for the sodaine meeting and skirmishing together, as for that his glistering armour dimmed the eyes of the enemies. But after he had slaine the GAVLE, and came to strip him: Brennus then knew him, and protested against him, calling the goddes to witnesse, how he had broken the law of armes, that comming as an ambassadour, he had taken vpon him the forme of an enemie. Hereupon Brennus foorthwith left skirmishing, and raising the siege from CLVSIVM, marched with his armie vnto ROME gates. And to the end the ROMAINES might know, that the GAVLES were not well pleased for the iniurie they had receiued: to haue an honest colour to beginne warres with the ROMAINES, he sent an Herauld before to ROME, to demaund liuerie of the man that had offended him, that he might punish him according ly. In the meane time, he himself came marching after, by small iourneyes to receiue their answere. The Senate hereupon assembled, and many of the Senators blamed the rashnes of the Fabians: but most of all, the priests called Feciales. For they followed it very earnestly, as a matter that concerned religion, & the honour of the goddes: declaring how the Senate, in discharge of all the residue of the citie of the offence committed, should lay the whole waight and burden of it vpon him alone, that only had done the fact. Numa Pompilius, the iustest and most peaceable of all the Kings of ROME that had bene, was he that first erected the Colledge of these Feciales, and did ordeine that they should be the keepers of peace, and the iudges to heare and allow all the causes, for the which they should iustly beginne any warres. Neuertheless, the Senate in the end turned ouer the ordering of the matter, vnto the whole will and iudgement of the people, before whom the priests Faciales did also accuse Fabius Ambustus. The people made so little account of their propounded religion, and honour of the goddes in that case: that in steede of deliuering of this Fabius vnto the enemie, they did choose him for one of the Tribunes of the souldiers with his brothers. The GAVLES vnderstanding this, were so furious & angry thereat, that they would no longer linger their iorneis, but marched with al speed vnto ROME. The people that dwelt by the high waies where they should passe by, were maruellously affrayd to see the multitude of them, & their braue and vniuersall furniture: and beginning to doubt the furie of their rage, they imagined first of all that they would destroy all the champion countrie before them, and afterwards would take all the strong cities. They cõtrariwise did take nothing at all out of the fields, neither did any hurt or displeasure vnto any bodie: but passing by their cities, cryed out they went to ROME, and would haue no wars but with the ROMAINES, and how otherwise they desired to be friends with al the world. These barbarous people marching on in this wise towards ROME, the Tribunes of the souldiers brought their armie to the field to encounter them. They were no lesse in number then the GAVLES, for they were fortie thousand footmen. Howbeit most part of them were raw souldiers, that had neuer serued in the warres before. They were very careles of the goddes, and dissolute in matters of religion: for they passed neither for good signes in their sacrifices, neither to aske counsell of their soothsayers, which the ROMAINES were religiously wont to do, before they gaue any battell. To make the matter worse, the number of the captaines hauing power & authoritie alike, did asmuch (or more then the rest) disorder and confound their doings. For oft times before, in farre lesser matters and daungers then these, they did vse to chuse speciall officers that had sole and soueraine authoritie, which they called Dictators: knowing very well of how great importance it is, in dangerous times to haue but one head and generall, to commaund all and to haue supreme authoritie of iustice in his hands, and not to be bound to deliuer account of his doings to any. The iniury also which they had too vngratefully done to Camillus, brought great mischiefe & inconuenience then vpon them. For the captaines after him, durst no more cõmand the people roughly, but euer after did flatter them much. When their armie was now brought into the field, they encamped thẽselues by a litle riuer called Allia, about the eleuenth stone frõ ROME, and not farre from the place where the same riuer falleth inter Tyber. Thither came the barbarous armie to them, who ouerthrew them in battell, by their disorder & lack of gouernment. For the left point or wing of their battell was broken off at the first by the GAVLES, who charged them so furiously, that they draue them hedlong into the riuer. The right wing then retiring out of the plaine, before they had any charge giuen, and hauing gotten certaine hilles hard by them: they had litle hurt, & most of them sauing thẽselues, did recouer ROME againe. The rest that escaped after the enemies were wearie of killing, fled by night vnto the citie of VEIES, thinking ROME had bene lost, & all the citie put to the sword. This ouerthrow was on the longest day in sommer, the moone being at the full: and the day before fortuned the great slaughter of the Fabians, of the which were slaine by the THVSCANS in one day 300. all of a name. The very day it selfe was afterwards called Alliade, of the name of the litle riuer, by the which the second ouerthrow was giuen. But for the difference of daies, that some of them are naturally vnfortunate, or that Heraclitus the Philosopher had reason to reproue the Poet Hesiodus, for making some daies good, & some daies ill, as though he vnderstood they were not all of one nature: we haue written & declared our opinion therof in other places. Yet, because the matter deliuereth present occasion to speake of the same, peraduenture it wil not be amisse to alleage a few examples of it only. It fortuned the BOEOTIANS on a time to win two honorable victories, on the first day of the moneth they call Hippodromus (and which the ATHENIANS call Hecatombaeon) that is now the moneth of Iune, by either of the which they did stil restore the GRECIANS to their libertie. The first was the battell of LEVCTRES. The second was the battell of GERASTE, which was 200. yeares before, when they ouercame LATTAMIAS, & the THESSALIANS in battell. The PERSIANS contrarily were ouercome in battell by the GRECIANS, the 6. day of August, at the iorney of MARATHON. The third day, at the battell of PLATEES. And on the selfe same day, neere vnto MYCALA. On the fiue and twentieth day, at the fight of ARBELES, the ATHENIANS wanne the battell by sea, neere vnto the Ile of NAXOS, vnder the charge and gouernment of Chabrias, about the full of the moone, in the moneth of August. And on the twentith of the same moneth, they wanne the battel of SALAMINA: as we haue written more amply in our historie of difference of dayes. The moneth of Aprill also brought to the barbarous people many notable losses. For Alexander the great ouercame the generall of the king of PERSIA, at the fielde of GRANICA, in the saide moneth. The CARTHAGINIANS also were vanquished in CICILE by Timoleon, on the seuen and twentieth day thereof. On which day also it is thought the citie of TROY was taken: as Ephorus, Callisthenes, Damastes, and Phylarchus, haue written in their histories. Now contrariwise, The moneth of Iuly, which the BOEOTIANS call Panemus, hath not bene gratious to the GRECIANS. For on the seuenth day of the same, they were ouethrowen by Antipater at the battell of CRANON, which was their vtter destruction. They had before also lost a battel the same moneth, neere vnto the citie of CHÆRONEA, by king Phillippe. On the same day also, and in the very selfe moneth and yere, those which came into ITALY with king Archidamus were slaine euery one of them, by the barbarous people of the country. The CARTHAGINIANS also feare the seuen & twentieth day of the same moneth, as the day which had before time brought them into many great and sorowfull calamities. Contrarily also, I know very wel, how about the feast of mysteries, the citie of THEBES was destroied by Alexander, & that the ATHENIANS were compelled to receiue a garison of souldiers into their citie, about the twentieth day of August, at which time they made the holy procession of the mysteries of Bacchus. And on the self day the ROMAINES lost their armie, & their generall Cæpio, who was slain by the CIMBRES. And how afterwards vnder the leading of Lucullus, they ouercame king Tigranes, and the ARMENIANS. And that Attalus, & Pompey also, died both on the self same day they were borne. To conclude, infinite examples of men might be brought, vnto whom the like reuolutions of time, there happened notable chaunces of good or ill. But to returne again vnto our historie. The day of this ouerthrow, is one of those which the ROMAINES take one of the vnfortunatest dayes that euer came vnto them. And by reason of that day, they reckon two other dayes of euery moneth very vnfortunate, engendred through feare & superstition, which spreadeth farre (as commonly it doth) vpon such sinister misfortunes. But for this matter, we haue written it more largely & exquisitly in the booke we made, of the ceremonies & customes of the ROMAINES. Now after this battell lost, if the GAVLES had hottely pursued the chase of their flying enemies, nothing could haue saued ROME from being taken, and the inhabitants therof from being put vnto the sword. For the ROMAINES that fled from the battell, brought such a feare vpō those that receiued them, & filled the whole citie of ROME with such grief & trembling: that they wist not what to do. The barbarous people again, beleeuing litle their victorie was so great as it was, fell to make good cheere for so great a ioy receiued, and deuided among them the spoyle of their enemies goods they found in the campe. So gaining time & leasure by this meanes, to the multitude of people that fled out of ROME, to win them some place of safety: & to such as remained still, they left good hope to saue themselues, & to make some prouision for defence. Therupon they all fortified themselues within the Capitoll, & storing it with all kind of victual, armour, & munition, they wholy did forsake the rest of the citie. But the first worke they tooke in hand was this. They did bring into their fort, part of their sacred reliques: and the professed Vestals brought thither also their holy fire, & al other their holy monuments. Some writers say, that they had nothing els in keeping but the sempiternall fire, & were so consecrated by king Numa, who did first institute, that fire should be worshipped, as the beginning of all things. For that it is the most mouing substance that is of all naturall things: notwithstanding, that generation also is a mouing, at the least not done without motion. For we see, that all other substance which lacketh heate remaineth idle, and without action, and sturreth not, no more then doth a dead thing, which craueth the force and heate of fire: as the soule it selfe recouering heate, beginneth somewhat to moue, and disposeth it selfe to doe, and suffer some thing. Wherefore Numa being (as they say) a man of great learning and vnderstanding, who for his wisedome was reported to talke many times with the Muses, did consecrate the same as a most sacred thing, and commanded that they neuer should suffer that fire to goe out, and but keepe it, as they would pre-the liuely image of the eternall God, the only King and maker of the world. Other say, that the fire burned continually there before the holy and sacred things, signifying a kind and maner of purification, which opinion the GRECIANS hold also: howbeit behind the same fire, there were certain hidden things, which in no case any might see, but those holy Vestall Nuns. Many also hold an opinion, that the Palladium of TROY, (as much to say, as Pallas image) is hidden also there, which was brought by Æneas into ITALY. Other doe report also, that Dardanus, at that time when he first beganne to build the city of TROY, brought thither the holy images of the goddes of SAMOTHRASIA, and he did offer them vp there: and how Æneas after the city was taken, did steale them away, and kept them vntill he came to dwell in ITALIE. Some other also, that take vppon them to know more therein then the common sort do, hold opinion, that there are two pipes not very great, whereof the one is empty and standeth open, the other is full and fast locked vp, howbeit they are not to be seene but by these holy Nunnes. Other thinke also, that these imaginers inuented that they spake of their owne heads, because the Vestall Nunnes did cast all that they could put in at that time, into two pipes, which they buried after in the ground, within the temple of Quirinus: and therefore that very place carieth the surname at this day of pipes. Howbeit they caried about them the most precious things they had, and fled alongest the riuer. Where one Lucius Albinus (one of the common people) flying also, and hauing brought away his wife and litle children, and other houshold stuffe he had in a cart, by chance he lighted vpon the Vestall Nunnes in the way. But so soone as he perceiued these holy Nuns (carying the blessed reliques & iewels in their armes, dedicated vnto the seruice of the gods) all alone, and that they were weary with going a foote: he caused his wife and his children to come out of the cart, & tooke down all his goods also, and willed them to get them vp, & flie into some city or towne of GREECE. Thus, me thought I could not wel passe ouer with silence, Albinus reuerence and deuotion he shewed vnto the goddes, in so dangerous a time and pinche of extremity. Furthermore the priests of other goddes, and the most honorablest old men of the city of ROME (that had bene Consuls before time, or had past the honour of triumph) had not the heart to forsake ROME: but putting on all their most holy robes and vestmentes did vow, and as it were willingly sacrificed them selues vnto the fortune that should befall them for the safety of their countrey. And vsing certaine words and prayers which their high Bishop Fabius had taught them, they went euen thus apparelled into the great market place, & did sit them downe there in chaires of iuory, expecting the good will and pleasure of the gods what should become of them. But within three daies after, Brennus came to ROME with his army: who finding the gates of the city all open, and the wals without watch, he doubted some deuise in it, and feared some priuy ambush had bene laid, as one hardly beleeuing to haue found the ROMAINS of so base a mind, as to forsake their city. After being enformed of the troth, he entred into ROME by the gate Collina, & tooke the same litle more then three hundred and three score yeares after it was first builded. If it be true at the least there hath remained any certaine chronicles of those times vnto this present day, considering the trouble and confusion of that time hath made many things more vncertaine then that, doubtfull vnto vs. But so it was, that the rumor ran to GREECE incontinently how ROME was taken, but yet withall somwhat doubtfully and vncertainly. For Heraclides Ponticus (who was about that time) saieth in a certaine booke he wrote of the soule, that there was newes come from the West part, that an army which came from the HYPERBOREANS had taken a city of GREECE called ROME, situated in that countrey ouer the great sea. But I wõder not that Heraclides (who hath written so many other fables and lies) did amplifie the true newes of the taking of ROME, with adding to of his owne deuise, of the HYPERBOREANS, & by the great sea. It is a most true tale, that Aristotle the Philosopher had certain knowledge it was takẽ by the GAVLS: howbeit he saith also it was recouered again afterwards by one called Lucius: where indeed it was, by Marcus Camillus, & not by Lucius. But all this in maner is spokẽ by coniecture. Moreouer Brennus being entred ROME, did appoint part of his souldiers to besiege those which were gottẽ into mount Capitol. And he with the residue of his army, marched on towards the market place, where when he saw the ancient Senators set so grauely in their chaires & spake neuer a word, nor offered once to rise, though they saw their enemies come armed against them, neither chaunged countenance nor colour at all, but leaned softly on their staues they had in their handes, seeming to be nothing afraide nor abashed, but looked one vpon another, he maruellously wondred at it. This their so strange maner at the first did so dampe the GAVLES, that for a space they stoode still, and were in doubt to come neare to touch them, fearing least they had bene some goddes: vntill such time as one of them went boldly vnto Marcus Papyrius, and laid his hand faire and softly vpō his long beard. But Papyrius gaue him such a rappe on his pate with his staffe, that he made the blood run about his eares. This barbarous beast was in such a rage with the blow, that he drew out his sword & slew him. The other souldiers also killed all the rest afterwards: & so the GAVLES continued many daies spoyling and sacking all things they found in the houses, and in the end did set them all a fire, and destroied them euery one, for despite of those that kept the fort of the Capitoll, that would not yeeld vpon their summons, but valiantly repulsed them when they scaled the wals. For this cause they rased the whole city, and put all to the sword that came in their handes, young and old, man, woman, and childe. Now this siege continuing long, and the ROMAINES holding them out very stoutly, victuals beganne to grow scant in the campe of the GAVLES, in so much as they were driuen of force to seeke it abroad without the city. Hereupon they deuided them selues, whereof some remained still with the King at the siege of the Capitoll: and the rest went a forraging and spoyling all the champion countrey and villages there aboutes, scattered as it were by bands and companies, some here, some there, fearing nothing, nor passing vppon watch or ward, they liued in such security of their victory. Howbeit the greatest company amongest them, went by fortune towards the city of ARDEA where Camillus dwelt, liuing like a priuate man, medling with no matters of state from the time of his exile, vntill that present time. But then he began now bethinke him selfe as a man that was in safety, and might haue escaped the handes of his enemies, but rather sought to deuise and finde out all the meanes he could to subdue them if occasion were so offered. Whereupon, considering that the inhabitaunts of ARDEA were enough in number to set vpon them, although faint hearted, and cowardly, by reason of the slouth and negligence of their gouernors and captaines, who had no manner of experience in the warres: hee began to cast out these words among the young men. That they should not thinke the ROMAINS misfortune fell vpon them, through the valiantnes of the GAVLES; but that their calamity (who had refused good counsaile) had happened vnto them by any worth or act of the GAVLES, hauing done nothing for their part to make them cary away the victory: but that they should thinke it was no other thing, but fortune alone, that would needs shew her power. Therefore, that it were now a notable and honourable enterprise (although somewhat dangerous) to driue these straungers and barbarous people out of their countrey, considering that the only end of their victory was, but to destroy and consume as fire, all that fell into their handes. Wherefore if they would but onely take a good lusty heart and courage vnto them, he would with opportunity and place, assure them the victory without any danger. The young men were pleased with these words of life and comfort. Whereupon Camillus went to breake the matter also vnto the magistrats and counsellours: and hauing drawen them by perswasion vnto this enterprise, he armed all that were of age to cary armour, and would not suffer a man to go out of the city, for feare least the enemies (which were not farre off) should haue intelligence of the same. Now after the GAVLES had run ouer all the champion countrey, and were loden with all sorts of spoiles, they did encampe them selues negligently in open fields, and neuer charged watch nor ward: but hauing their full cariage of wine laid them downe to sleepe, and made no noise at all in their campe. Camillus being aduertised thereof by his seuerall skoutes, caused the ARDEANS with as little noise as might bee, forthwith to go out into the fields: and hauing marched somewhat roundly the distance betweene the city and the cāpe of the GAVLES, they came thither much about midnight. Then he made his souldiers make great shouts & cries, & the trūpets to be sounded on euery side, to put a feare in their enemies, who yet with all the loud noise they made, could hardly be made to wake, they were so deadly drunke. Yet there were some notwithstanding, that for feare to be taken tardy, did buffle vp at this sodaine noise: and comming to them selues, fell to their weapons to re-reſiſt Camillus, which were ſlaine by and by. The reſt, and the greateſt nũber of them lay here and there ſcattered in the middeſt of the field without any weapon dead a ſleepe, ſtark drunke with wine, and were put to the ſword and neuer ſtrake ſtroke. Thoſe that fled out of the cãpe that night (which were but few in number) were ouerthrowen alſo the next day, by the horſe men which followed and killed them, as they tooke them ſtraggling here and there in the fields. The brute of this victory was blowen abroad incontinently through all the townes and villages there abouts, which cauſed many yong men to come and ioyne them ſelues to Camillus: but ſpecially the ROMAINES deſired the ſame, that had ſaued them ſelues in the city of VEIES, after the battell loſt at ALLIA, who made their mones amongeſt them ſelues there, ſaying. O goddes what a captaine hath fortune taken from the city of ROME? What honour hath the city of ARDEA by the valiantnes and worthy deedes of Camillus: and in the meane ſeaſon his naturall city that brought him forth, is now loſt and vtterly deſtroyed? We, for lacke of a captaine to leade vs, are ſhut vp here within others wals, and do nothing but ſuffer ITALIE in the meane ſpace to go to ruine and vtter deſtruction before our eies. Why then doe we not ſend to the ARDEANS for our captaine? or why do we not arme our ſelues, to go vnto him? For he is now no more a baniſhed man, nor we poore citizens: ſince our city is poſſeſſed with the foraine power of our hateful enemies. So they all agreed to this counſell, and ſent vnto Camillus to beſeech him to be their captaine, and lead them. But he made anſwer, he would in no caſe conſent vnto it, vnleſſe they that were beſieged in the Capitoll had lawfully firſt confirmed it by their voices. For thoſe (ſaid he) ſo long as they remain within the city, do repreſent the ſtate and body thereof. Therefore if they commanded him to take this charge vpon him, he would moſt willingly obey them: if otherwiſe they miſliked of it, that then he would not meddle againſt their good wils and commaundement. They hauing receiued this anſwer, there was not a ROMAINE amongſt them, but greatly honored & extolled the wiſdome & iuſtice of Camillus: But now they knew not how to make thẽ priuy vnto it, that were beſieged in the Capitoll: for they ſaw no poſſibility to cõuay a meſſenger to them: conſidering the enemies were lords of the city, and laid ſiege to it. Howbeit there was one Pontius Cominius amongſt the yong men (a man of a meane houſe, but yet deſirous of honour and glory) that offered himſelfe very willingly to venter to get in if he could. So he tooke no letters to cary to them that were beſieged, for feare leaſt they might be intercepted, and ſo they ſhould diſcouer Camillus intention: but putting on an ill fauoured gown vpon him, he conuaied certaine peeces of corcke vnder it, and trauelling at noone daies kept on his way without feare vntill he came to ROME, bringing darke night with him. And becauſe he could not paſſe ouer the bridge, for that the barbarous people kept watch vpon it: he wrapped ſuch clothes as he had about his necke) which were not many, nor heauy) & tooke the riuer, & ſwimming with thoſe corcks he had brought, at the length he got ouer to the other ſide where the city ſtood. Then taking vp thoſe lanes alwaies where he thought the enemies were not, ſeeing fire, & hearing noiſe in other places, he wẽt to the gate Carmentale, wher he foũd more ſilence then in other places: on the which ſide alſo, the hill of the Capitoll was more ſteep & vpright, by reaſon of the great rocks that were hard to clime vp vpon. But he digged & crept vp ſo log amongſt thẽ, that he got vp with great paine vnto the wall of the fortres, on the which ſide alſo the enemy kept no watch: & ſaluting the watch of the Capitol, he told thẽ what he was. So they plucked him vp vnto them, & brought him to the magiſtrats that ruled then. Who cauſed the Senate to aſſemble preſently, to whõ he told the news of Camillus victory, which they had not heard of before: & therewith alſo he did declare vnto them, the determination of the ROMAIN ſouldiers that were abroad, which was, to make Camillus their captain & generall, & did perſwade them alſo to grant him the charge, for that he was the only man abroad whõ the citizens gaue their conſents to obay. When they heard this al that were within the Capitol, conſulted thervpon amongſt themſelues, & ſo did chuſe Camillus Dictator, & returned the meſſenger Pontius Cominius backe againe, the ſelfe ſame way he came vnto them. His fortune in returning backe was like vnto his cõming thither: for the enemies neuer ſaw him. And ſo he broght report to them that were abroad, of the Senats decree & conſent, wherof they were all maruellous glad. Thus came Camillus to take this charge of general vpon him, & found there were twẽty thousand good fighting men abroad, and well armed. Then got he further aide also of their allies and confederates, and prepared daily to goe and set vpon the enemies. So was Camillus chosen now Dictator the second time, and went into the city of VEIES where he spake with the ROMAINE souldiers that were there, and leauied a great number of the allies besides, to go fight with the enemies as soone as he could. But whilest Camillus was thus a preparing, certaine of the barbarous people in ROME, walking out by chaunce on that side of the Capitoll where Pontius Cominius had gotten vp the night before: spied in diuers places the printes of his feete and hands, as he had griped & gotten hold, still digging to get vp, and saw the weeds & hearbs also growing vpon the rockes, and the earth in like manner flat troden downe. Whereupon they went presently vnto the King to let him vnderstand the same: who forthwith came to view the place. And hauing considered it well, he did nothing at that time: but when darke night was come, he called a company of the lightest GAVLES together, and that vsed most to dig in mountaines, and said vnto them. Our enemies them selues doe shew vs the way how to take them, which we could not haue found out but by them selues. For they hauing gone vp before vs, doe giue vs easily to vnderstand, it is no impossible thing for vs to clime vp also. Wherefore we were vtterly shamed, hauing already begun well, if we should faile also to end well: and to leaue this place as vnuincible. For if it were easie for one man alone, by digging to clime vp to the height thereof: much lesse is it hard for many to get vp one after another, so that one doe helpe another. Therefore Sirs, I assure you, those that do take paines to get vp shalbe honorably rewarded, according to their iust desert. When the King had spoken these words vnto the GAVLES, they fell to it lustily euery man to get vp: and about midnight, they began many of them to dig, and make steps vp to the rocke one after another, as softly as could possibly, with catching hold the best they could, by the hanging of the rocke, which they found very steepe, but neuertheles easier to clime, then they tooke it at the beginning. So that the formost of them being come to the top of the rocke, were now ready to take the wall, and to set vpon the watch that slept: for there was neither man nor dog that heard them. It chanced then there were holy geese kept in the temple of Iuno, which at other times were wont to be fed till their crops were full: but victuals being very straight and scant at that time euen to find the men, the poore geese were so hard handled, & so litle regarded, that they were in manner starued for lacke of meat. This fowle in deede naturally is very quicke of hearing, and so is she also very fearefull by nature: and being in maner famished with their hard allowance, they were so much the more waking and easier to be afraid. Vpon this occasion therfore, they heard the comming of the GAVLES, and also began to run vp & down and cry for feare: with which noise they did wake those that were within the castle. The GAVLES being bewraied by these foolish geese, left their stealing vpon them, and came in with all the open noise and terror they could. The ROMAINES hearing this larum, euery man tooke such weapon as came first to hand, and they ran sodainely to rescue that place from whence they vnderstoode the noise: among those, the formost man of all was Marcus Manlius, a man that had bene Consul, who had a lusty body, and as stout a heart. His hap being to meete with two of the GAVLES together, as one of them was lifting vp his axe to knocke him on the head, he preuented him, and strake off his hand with his sword, and clapt his target on the others face so fiercely, that he threw him backward downe the rocke: and comming afterwards vnto the wall with others that ran thither with him, he repulsed the rest of the GAVLES that were gotten vp, who were not many in number, neither did any great act. Thus the ROMAINS hauing escaped this danger, the next morning they threw the captaine down the rocks to the castell, who had charge of the watch the night before: and gaue Manlius in recompence of the good seruice he had done, a more honourable then profitable reward, which was this. Euery man of them gaue him halfe a pound of the country wheat, which they call Far, and the fourth part of the measure of wine, which the GRECIANS call Cotile: and this might be about a quart, being the ordinary allowance of euery man by the day. After this repulse, the GAVLES beganne to be discouraged, partly for that their victuals failed them, and durst no more forage abroade in the fieldes for feare of Camillus: and partly also for that the plague came amongest them, being lodged amongest heapes of dead bodies, lying in euery place aboue ground without burial and amongst burnt houses destroyed, where the ashes being blowne very high by the winde and vehemency of heat, did giue a drie piercing aire, that did marueilously poison their bodies when they came to draw in the breath of it. But the greatest cause of all their mischiefe was, the chaunge of their wonted dyet. Who comming out of a fresh countrie, where there were excellent pleasant places to retire vnto, to auoide the discommoditie of the parching heate of the sommer, were now in a naughtie plaine countrie for them to remaine in, in the latter season of the yeare. All these things together did heape diseases vpon them, besides the long continuance of the siege about the Capitoll (for it was then about the seuenth moneth) by reason whereof there grew a maruellous death in their campe, through the great numbers of them that died dayly, and lay vnburied. But notwithstanding all the death and trouble of the GAVLES, the poore besieged ROMAINES were nothing holpen the more, the famine still did grow so fast vpon them. And because they could heare nothing of Camillus, they were growne almost vnto a despaire: and send vnto him they could not, the GAVLES kept so straight watch vpon them in the citie. Whereupon both parties finding themselues in hard state, first the watch of either side began to cast out words of peace amongst themselues: and afterwards by cõsent of the heads, Sulpitius, Tribune of the soldiers, came to parle with Brennus. In which parle it was articled: that the ROMAINES should pay a thousand pound weight of golde, and that the GAVLES should incontinently after the receipt of the same, depart out of their citie, and all their territories. This decree being passed by othe from both, the golde was brought. And when it came to be weyed, the GAVLES at the first priuily began to deale falsely with them: but afterwards they openly staied the ballance, and would not let them weye no more, whereat the ROMAINES began to be angrie with them. Then Brennus, in scorne and mockerie, to despight them more, pluckt off his sword, girdle and all, and put it into the ballance where the golde was weied. Sulpitius seeing that, asked him what he meant by it. Brennus answered him: what can it signifie else, but sorow to the vanquished? This worde euer after ranne as a common prouerbe in the peoples mouthes. Some of the ROMAINES tooke this vile part of theirs in such scorne, that they would needes take the golde from them againe by force, and so returne into their holde, to abide the siege still, as they had done before. Other were of opinion to the contrarie, and thought it best with patience to put vp this scorne of theirs, and not to thinke it was a shame to pay more then they had promised: but onely to pay it by compulsion as they did, by misfortune of time, was to thinke it rather necessary, then honourable. And as they were debating the matter thus, aswell amongst themselues, as with the GAVLES: Camillus came to ROME gates with his armie, and vnderstanding all what had passed betweene them, he commaunded the rest of the armie to marche faire and softly after him in good order, and he in the meane season with the best choise men he had, went before with all speed. Assoone as the other ROMAINES within the citie had spyed him, they shewted out for ioye, and receiued him euery one with great reuerence, without any more words, as their soueraigne captaine and prince, who had power out of them all. And Camillus taking the golde out of the scales, gaue it vnto his men, and commaunded the GAVLES presently to take vp their scales, and to get them going: for, saieth he, it is not the ROMAINES manner to keepe their countrey with golde, but with the sword. Then Brennus began to be angrie, and tolde him it was not honourable done of him, to breake the accorde that had passed betweene them before by othe. Whereunto Camillus stoutly answered him againe, that accorde was of no validitie. For he being created Dictator before, all other officers and magistrates whatsoeuer, and their actes, by his election were made of no authoritie: and seeing therefore they had dealt with men, that had no power of themselues to accorde to any matter, they were to speake to him, if they required ought. For he alone had absolute authoritie to pardon them if they repented, and would aske it: or else to punish them, and make their bodies answer the damages and losse his countrey had by them sustained. These words made Brennus madde as a marche hare, that out went his blade. Then they drew their swords of all sides, and laide lustely one at another as they could, within the houses, and in open streets, where they could set no battell in order. But Brennus soddainly remembring himselfe that it was no euen matche for him, retired with his men about him into his campe, before he had left many of his people. The next night following, he departed out of ROME with all his army, & went to encampe himselfe about a threescore furlong from thence, in the high way that goeth towards the citie of the GABIANS. Camillus with his whole army well appointed, went after him immediatly, & shewed at his campe by the breake of day. The ROMAINES hauing taken heart againe vnto them, did lustily giue them battell: the same continued long, very cruell & doubtfull, vntill the GAVLES at the length were ouerthrowne, and their campe taken with great slaughter. As for those that did escape the furie of the battell, they were killed, some by the ROMAINES selues, who hottely followed the chase after the battell broken: the residue of them, and the greatest part, were slaine by those of the cities and villages neere abouts, that did set vpon them as they fled scatteringly here and there in the fields. And thus was the city of ROME strangely againe recouered, that was before strangely wun and lost, after it had continued seuen moneths in the hands of the barbarous people. For they entred ROME about the fifteenth day of Iuly: and they were driuen out againe, about the thirteenth day of February following. So Camillus triumphed as beseemed him, and as one that had saued and deliuered his countrie out of the hands of their enemies, and set ROME againe at libertie. Those that had bin abroade all the time of this siege, came into ROME againe, following his triumphing chariot: and those that had bene besieged within the Capitoll (looking for no other but to haue died by famine) went and presented themselues before him, and each one embraced other, in weeping wise for ioy. The priests and ministers of the temples also, presented their holy iewels, whole and vndefaced, which some of them had buried in the ground within the citie selfe: and others some had caried away with them, when they fled out of ROME. All these the people did as gladly see, as if the gods themselues had returned home againe into their citie. After they had sacrificed vnto the gods, & rendred them most humble thanks, & had purged their citie, as they had bene taught by men experienced in those matters for satisfaction of the gods: Camillus began againe to builde vp the temples that were there before, harde by the which he built another new one also to the god Aius Locutius, in that very place where Marcus Ceditius heard the voice warne him of the comming of the GAVLES. So by Camillus good diligence, and the priests great paine and trauaile, the situations of these temples were with much a do found out againe. But when they were to builde againe all the rest of the citie, that was wholly burnt, and destroyed to the grounde: the people had no minde to it, but euer shrinked backe, to put any hande to the worke, for that they lacked all things necessarie to beginne the same. Furthermore, weighing their late and long sustained trouble and miseries, they were fitter to take their ease and rest, then to beginne new labour and toyle, to kill their hearts and bodies altogether. For, neither were their bodies able to performe it, nor yet their goods to reache to the charge of it. Wherefore disposing their minds to dwell in the citie of VEIES, which remained whole, vntouched, and furnished of all things to receiue them: they deliuered to the prating Orators (whose tongues did neuer cease to speake plausibilia to the people) trimme occasion to set this matter abroache. So they gaue good eare, and were willing to heare certaine seditious words spoken against Camillus, which were these: That for his priuate ambition he would depriue them of a citie well furnished already, and would against their willes compell them to lodge in their owne houses, wholly burnt and pulled downe. And moreouer, how he would make them to raise vp againe the great ruine the fire had made, to the end the people might call him not onely captaine and generall of the ROMAINES, but the founder of ROME also, and to drowne Romulus honourable title thereof. The Senate considering of this matter, and fearing some tumult among the people: they would not suffer Camillus to leaue his Dictatorship before the end of the yeare, notwithstanding no man euer enioyed that office aboue sixe moneths. Then Camillus, for his part did much endeuour himselfe, to comfort and appease the people, praying them all he could to tarie: and further pointed with his finger vnto the graues of their auncestours, and put them in minde also of the holy places dedicated to the gods, and sanctified by King Numa, or by Romulus, or by other Kings. But amongst many other tokens drawne out of holy and diuine things, he forgate not to bring for example the head of a man found new and fresh, in making the foundations of the Capitoll, if that place by fatall destenie had bene once chosen to be the head and chiefe of all ITALIE. And moreouer, that the holy fier of the goddesse Vesta (which since the warres had bene kindled againe by the holy Vestall Nunnes) would againe come to be put out by them, if they did forsake their naturall citie, besides the great shame and dishonour it would be vnto them, to see it inhabited in time to come by vnknowne strangers, or else to be left a common field and pasture, for beasts and cattell to graze in. Such sorowfull examples and griefes, the honest naturall borne cittizens, did euer blowe into the peoples eares, aswell priuately, as openly. The people againe to the contrarie, did make their hearts to yerne for pittie, when they laide before their eyes their penurie, and pouertie they susteined: and besought them also not to enforce them to gather and ioyne together againe the broken peeces of a spoiled citie (as of a shipwrack that had cast them naked into the sea, hauing onely saued bare life and persons) since that they had another citie neere at hand and ready to receiue them. So Camillus counsell was, that the Senate should consult vpon this matter, and deliuer their absolute opinion herein: which was done. And in this counsell, he himselfe brought forth many probable reasons, why they should not leaue in any case, the place of their naturall birth and countrey: and so did many other Senatours in like case, fauouring that opinion. Last of all, after these perswasions, he commaunded Lucius Lucretius (whose manner was to speake first in such assemblies) that he should stand vp and deliuer his opinion, & that the rest also in order as they sat, should say their mindes. So euery man keeping silence, as Lucretius was ready to speake, at that present time there passed by their counsell house, a captaine with his bande that warded that day, who spake aloude to his ensigne bearer that went formost, to stay, and set downe his ensigne there: for, said he, here is a very good place for vs to warde in. These words being heard vp into the Senate house, euen as they stood all in a doubt and maze what would be the resolution of this matter: Lucretius began to say, that he most humbly thanked the gods, and allowed of the captaines iudgement, and so euery one of the rest in their order, said as much. Moreouer there was a wonderfull change and alteration of minde so dainly among the common people: for euery man did perswade and encourage his fellow liuely to put his hand to this worke. Insomuch as tarying for no diuision or appointing out of streetes, nor setting out euery man his place he should build in: they fell to worke of all hands, euery one chosing that place he liked best, and was most commodious for their building, without any other order or diuision amongst them. Whereupon, they running to this building on a head, the streets were confused on heaps together, & their houses all built out of order and vniformitie. For the report goeth, that the whole citie (aswell common as priuate buildings) was built vp new againe in a yeare. But the surueiors, to whom Camillus had giuen charge to finde out all the holy places where the temples had bin ouerthrowne: as they went about mount Pallatine, they came by chance to the place, where the chappell of Mars had stood, which the GAVLES had wholy burnt and destroyed, as they had done all the rest. They making cleane the place, and surueying euery corner, did finde by chance Romulus augures crooked staffe hidden vnder a great mount of ashes. This staffe is crooked at one of the ends, and they call it Lituus, which soothsayers do vse to quarter out the regions of the element, when they will beholde the flying of birdes to tell of things to come. Romulus that was very skilfull in this arte, did vse this staffe: and after he was taken away from all mens sights, the priests tooke it, and kept it as a holy relique, suffering no creature to laye hands on it. Now they found this staffe whole and vnbroken, where all things else were consumed and perished by fire, they were in a maruellous ioy thereat. For they interpreted this to be a signe of the euerlasting continuance of the citie of ROME. But before they could make an ende of all their building, there grew a new warre againe vpon them. For at one very instant, all the ÆQVES, the VOLSCES, and the LATINES, entred with all their might and maine into the territories of the ROMAINES. The THVSCANS also went then and besieged SVTRIVM, that was in league and amitie with the ROMAINES. The Tribuni militares got them straight to the field with their armie, and encamped about mount Martian. The LATINES besieged them so straightly, that their armie stood in great danger to be ouerthrowne, and they were driuen to send to ROME for a new supply. Thereupon the ROMAINES did choose Camillus Dictator againe the third time. The occasion of this warre is reported two manner of waies: whereof I will declare the first, which I do conceiue to be but a tale. They say the LATINES sent vnto the ROMAINES, to demaund some of their free maides in mariage: which they did either to make a quarrell of warre, or else as desirous indeed, to ioyne both the peoples againe by new mariages. The ROMAINES were amazed very much at this, and sore troubled, as not knowing how to aunswer them, they were so affraid of warres. For they were yet scant new setled at home, and dreaded much least this demaund of their daughters, was but a sommons made to giue them hostages, which they finely cloaked vnder the name of alliance in mariage. Some say that there was in that time a bonde maide called Tutola, or as some say, Philotis, that went vnto the Senate, and counselled them they should send her away with some other faire maides slaues, dressed vp like gentlewomen, and then let her alone. The Senate liked very well of this deuise, and chose such a number of bonde maides as she desired to haue, and trimming them vp in fine apparel, begawded with chaines of golde and iewels, they sent them forth to the LATINES, who were encamped not farre from the citie. When night was come, the other maides hid their enemies swords. But this Tutola, or Philotis (call her as you will) did clime vp to the top of a wilde fig tree, from which she shewed a burning torche vnto the ROMAINES, hauing made shift to hange somwhat behinde her, to keepe the light from sight of the enemies. For this signall the Senate of ROME had secretly appointed her to set vp, which was the cause that the issuing out of the souldiers being commaunded to go out in the night, was full of trouble and tumult. For being pressed by their captaines, they called one another, and there was a great adoo to put them in order of battell. Thus they went to take their enemies sleeping, who nothing mistrusting the same, were slaine the most part of them within their campe. This was done on the fift day of the moneth called then Quintilis, and now is named Iuly: at which time they do yet celebrate a certaine feast in remembrance of that acte. For first of all, going out of the city, they call aloude many of their fellowes names which are most common: as Caius Marcius, and Lucius, shewing thereby how one of them called another after that sort, as they went in great hast out of the citie. Afterwards all the maide seruants of the citie being trimly apparelled, go playing vp and downe the towne, pleasantly iesting with those they meete: and in this sort they make as though they fought together, in token that they did helpe the ROMAINES at that time to destroy the LATINES. Then they are feasted, sitting vnder bowers made with wilde figge tree boughes: and this feast day is called, None Capratine, by reason of the wilde figge tree, (as some thinke) from the top whereof, the bond maide shewed to the ROMAINES the burning torche. For the ROMAINES call the wilde figge tree, Caprificus. Other say, that all these things are done and spoken, in remembrance of the mischance that happened vnto Romulus, when he was taken out of their sight, the same day without the gates of the citie, at which time there rose a sodaine mist and darke cloude. Or as some other say, that there was the eclypse of the sunne: and they holde opinion that the day was named None Capratine, because Capra in the ROMAINE tongue, signifieth a goate. Romulus vanished out of mens sight as he was making an oration vnto his people, neere vnto the place which is called goates pond, as we haue mentioned more at large in his life. The second occasion & beginning of this warre (according to the opinion of most writers) was, that Camillus being chosen Dictator the first time, & knowing that the Tribunes militaires with their army were straightly besieged by the LATINES & VOLSCES: he was enforced to arme all the olde men, who for very age were priuiledged from further seruice in wars. And hauing fetched a great compasse about mount Auentian, because he would not be seene of his enemies, he came to lodge his campe behinde them, where he raised fiers, to make the ROMAINES know that were besieged, how he was come: which as soone as they perceiued, they tooke to them courage againe, and determined to fight. But the LATINES & VOLSCES kept within their campe, & did entrenche and fortifie themselues with a wall of wood, which they laid a crosse, because they saw they were beset both before & behind: & determined to tary the releefe of a new supply, aswel of their own, as of some further aide besides frō the TVSCANS, which thing Camillus perceiuing, & fearing least they should serue him, as he had already handled thē by cōpassing of him again behind: he thought it necessarie to preuent this. So considering the inclosure and fortification of their campe all of wood, and the euery morning commonly, there came a great winde from the side of the mountaines. He made prouision of a number of fire brandes. And leading out his armie into the fields by breake of day, he appointed one part of them to giue charge vpon the enemies on the one side with great noyse and shouting: and he with the other part determined to raise fire on the contrarie side, from whence the winde should come, looking for oportunitie to do the same. When he saw the sunne vp, and the winde beginning to whistle, blowing a good gale from the side of the hils, and that the skirmish was begunne on the other side: then he gaue a signall vnto the companie he led with him, to set vpon the enemies, and made them throw into the inclosure of their campe, diuers pots and dartes with fire, so that the flame finding matter to catch hold of, in this inclosure of wood, and trees laide ouerthwart, did rayse straight an exceeding great flame in the aire, & still got way inwards into the LATINES camp. Whereupon the LATINES being vnprouided of present remedie to quench the flame, and seeing their campe a fire all about their eares: they gathered themselues together at the first in a very small roome. Neuertheless, they were inforced in the end to get them into the field, and there they found their enemies readie armed, and in battell ray. So as few of those escaped that came into the field, and their fellowes that remained within their campe, were burnt to death with fire, vntill the ROMAINES themselues came to quench it for greedines of their spoile and goods. When all this was done, Camillus left his sonne in the campe, to keepe the prisoners & spoiles: and he himselfe, with the rest of the armie, went to inuade his enemies country, where he tooke the citie of ÆQVES. Then after he had ouercome the VOLSCES, he led his armie presently from thence vnto the citie of SVTRIVM. For he had not yet heard of their misfortune. Therefore he hasted himself to aide them, because he thought they were yet besieged by the THVSCANS. But such was their hard fortune, that they had alreadie yeelded vp their citie by composition, & saued no part of their goods, but the very clothes they had on their backs. So being turned out of all they had, they met Camillus by the way as they were wandring abroad, lamenting their miserie, with their wiues and litle yong children: whose misery went to the very hart of Camillus, when he beheld their lamentable state. Furthermore, whe he saw the ROMAINES weepe for pitie also, to see the mone that these vnfortunate people made vnto him, and that it grieued them heartily to behold their great mischaunce: he determined with himselfe not to deferre reuenge, but presently to goe the selfe same day before the citie of SVTRIVM, imagining that he should find the THVSCANS out of order, without keeping watch, and attending nothing but making good cheere, because they had newly taken a wealthy rich citie, where they had left neuer an enemie in the same to hurt them, neither feared any abroad to come neere to assault them. And in deede it fell out rightly as he gessed. For he had not only passed through the territories of the citie, without any intelligence giuen to the enemies within the same: but he was come to the verie gates, and had taken the walles, before they heard any thing of his comming, by reason they neither kept watch nor warde, but were dispersed abroad in the citie, in euery house, eating and drinking drunke together. Insomuch as when they knew their enemies were alreadie within the citie, they were so full fraught with meate and wine, that the most of their wits serued them not so much as to flie, but tarried vntill they were slaine or taken, like beasts in the houses. Thus was the citie of SVTRIVM twise taken in one day. And it chaunced that those which had wonne it, lost it: and those which had lost it, recouered it againe by Camillus meanes. Who deserued both the honour and entrie of triumph into ROME the which wanne him no lesse good will and glorie, then the two first before had done praise, and gotten fame. For euen his greatest enemies that most spighted and enuied his former noble actes, ascribing them rather to fortune that fauoured him, then to his valiantnesse or worthinesse: were forced now by this deede of his to confesse, that his wisedome and valiantnesse deserued praise and commendation to the skies. Camillus of all his enemies had one most bitter to him, which was Marcus Manlius, that was the first man that gaue the GAVLES the repulse that night they had entered the walles of the Capitoll, and had thought to haue taken it: whereupon they gaue him the surname of Capitolinus. He aspiring to be the chiefe of the citie, and finding no direct way to exceede the glorie of Camillus, tooke the broad high way of them that practise tyrannie. For hee beganne to flatter the common people, and specially those that were indebted: he tooke vpon him to defende their causes, and pleaded their case at the barre against their creditours. Sometimes he tooke the debters out of the creditours handes and caried them away by force, that for lacke of ability to pay, were by rigour of the lawe condemned to be bond-slaues. But by this practise, in short time he got him a marueilous number of such needie followers, and poore men, that the noble men and honest citizens were affraide of the insolent parties they played, and of the continuall troubles and tumultes they daily stirred vp in the market place. Therefore suspecting the worst in this case, they did choose Quintus Capitolinus Dictator: who caused the said Manlius immediatly to be apprehended, and committed him to prison. Whereupon the people beganne to chaunge their apparell: which they were neuer wont to doe, but in great and common calamities. But the Senate fearing least some commotion would rise hereupon, they did set him at libertie againe. He being thus out of prison, was no whit the better, nor wiser thereby, but did still stirre vp the commons, more boldly and seditiously, then before. Then was Camillus chosen againe Tribunus militaris, and Manlius was accused in his time of office. But when this matter came to pleading, the sight of the Capitoll troubled his accuser much. For the very place it selfe where Manlius had repulsed the GAVLES by night, & defended the Capitoll, was easily seene from the market place, where the matter was a hearing: and he himselfe pointing with his hand, shewed the place vnto the goddes, and weeping tenderly he laid before them the remembrance of the hazard of his life, in fighting for their safety. This did moue the iudges hearts to pitie, so as they knew not what to do, but many times they did put ouer the hearing of his case vnto another day, and neither would they giue iudgement, knowing he was conuicted by manifest proofes: neither could they vse the seueritie of the law vppon him, because the place of his so notable good seruice was euer still before their eyes. Wherefore Camillus finding the cause of delay of iustice, did make the place of iudgement to be remoued without the citie, into a place called the wood Petelian, from whence they could not see the Capitoll. And there the accusers gaue apparent euidence against him: & the iudges considering all his wicked practises, conceaued a iust cause to punish him, as he had deserued. So they gaue sentence of death against him: that he should be caried to the mount Capitoll, and there to be throwne downe headlong the rockes thereof. Thus, one, and the selfe place was a memorie of his notable good seruice, and also a memoriall of his miserable and vnfortunate end. Besides all this, they rased his house, and built in the same place a temple to the goddesse they call Moneta: and made a lawe also, that no Patrician from thenceforth should dwell any more in the mount Capitoll. Camillus after this, being called againe to take the office of Tribunus militaris the sixth time: he sought to excuse him selfe aswell for that he saw he was well stept in yeares, as also for that he feared fortunes spight, or some mishappe, after he had obteined such glorie for his noble actes and seruice. Howbeit the most apparent cause of his excuse, was his sickenesse, which troubled him much at that time. But the people would allow no excuse by any meanes, but cryed out, they did not desire he should fight a foote nor a horsebacke, but that he should onely giue counsell, and commaund: and therefore they compelled him to take the charge, and to leade the armie with one of his companions named Lucius Furius, against their enemies the PRÆNESTINES, and the VOLSCES, who ioyning together did inuade the confines of the ROMAINES friendes. So he led his army out immediatly to the field, and camped as neere the enemie as he could: being minded for his part to draw the warre out in length, that he might fight afterwardes (if neede required) when he had recouered strength. But Furius contrarily coueting glorie, was wholly bent to hazard the battell, whatsoeuer perill came of it: and to this end he sturred vp, and incouraged the captaines of euery priuate band. Wherfore Camillus fearing least they should thinke, for ill will he bare their yong men, that he went about to hinder and take away the meanes to winne their honour, and to doe some noble act: suffered Furius against his will to put his men in order of battell, and he in the meane season by reason of his sickenesse, remained with a few about him in the campe. So went Lucius vpon a head to present battell to the enemie, and so was he as headily also ouerthrowen. But Camillus hearing the ROMAINES were ouerthrowen: sicke as he was vpon his bedde, got vp, and taking his houshold seruantes with him, he went in haste to the gates of the the campe, and passed through those that fled, vntill he came to meete with the enemies that had them in chase. The ROMAINES seeing this that were alreadie entred into the campe, they followed him at the heeles forthwith: and those that fled also without, when they saw him, they gathered together, and put themselues againe in array before him, and perswaded one another not to forsake their Captaine. So their enemies hereupon staied their chasing, and would pursue no further that day. But the next morning, Camillus leading his armie into the field, gaue them battell, and wanne the field of them by plaine force: and following the victorie hard, he entred amongest them that fled into their campe pelmel, or hande ouerhead, and slew the most part of them euen there. After this victorie, he was aduertised howe the THVSCANS had taken the citie of SVTRIVM, and had put to the sword all the inhabitants of the same, which were the ROMAINES citizens. Whereupon he sent to ROME the greatest part of his armie, and keeping with him the lightest and lustiest men, went and gaue assault vnto the THVSCANS, that now were harbored in the citie of SVTRIVM. Which when he had wonne againe, he slew part of them, and the other saued themselues by flight. After this, he returned to ROME with an exceeding spoyle, confirming by experience, the wisedome of the ROMAINES, who did not feare the age nor sickenesse of a good captaine that was expert and valiant: but had chosen him against his will, though he was both olde and sicke, and preferred him farre before the younger and lustier that made sute to haue the charge. Newes being brought vnto the Senate, that the THVSCVLANIANS were reuolted they sent Camillus thither againe, willing him of fiue other companions to take out one he liked best, euery of the which desired to be chosen, and made their sute vnto him for the same. But he refusing all other, did chuse againe Lucius Furius beyonde all expectation of men, seeing not long before he needes would against his will hazard battell, in which he was ouerthrowen. Howbeit Camillus, hauing a desire (as I thinke) to hide his fault and shame he had receaued: did of courtesie preferre him before all other. Now the THVSCVLANIANS hearing of Camillus coming against them, subtilly sought to colour the fault they had already committed. Wherefore they put out a great number of people into the fields, some to plowe, other to keepe the beastes, as if they had bene in best peace: and did set the gates of the citie wide open, sent their children openly to schoole, their artificers wrought their occupation in their shops, the men of hauiour and honest citizens walked in the market place in their long gownes, and the officers and gouernours of the citie went vp and downe to euery house, commaunding them to prepare lodgings for the ROMAINES, as if they had stood in no feare at all, and as though they had committed no fault. Howbeit all these fine fetches could not make Camillus beleeue, but that they had an intent to rebell against the ROMAINES: yet they made Camillus pitie them, seeing they repented them of that they had determined to doe. So he commaunded them to goe to ROME to the Senate, to craue pardon for their fault: and he himselfe did helpe them, not only to purge their citie of any intent of rebellion, but also to get them the priuiledge and freedome of ROME. And these be the chiefest acts Camillus did in the 6. time of his tribuneshippe. After this, one Licinius Stolo moued great sedition in the citie, betwene the common people and the Senate. For he would in any case that of the two Consuls, which were chosen yerely, the one of them should be a commoner, and not that both of them should be of the auncient noble families, called Patricians. The Tribunes of the people were chosen, but the election of the Consuls, the people stayed: so that the common wealth went to decaie: and declined to greater troubles, then euer it did before, for lacke of gouernment. But to suppresse this, the Senate created Camillus the fourth time Dictator: but this was sore against his will, because it misliked the people much. Furthermore, he would not complaine of the people, for that they hauing serued vnder him in many warres and battels, might boldly, and truely say vnto him: that he had done more notable actes by them in the warres, then he had done by the Patricians in peace. Yet was he created Dictator in despight, to rule the people, and of enuie in the noble men towardes them. Thus necessitie did vrge him, either by force to suppresse the people, if he were the stronger in this dissention: or els that he himselfe should be suppressed, if he became the weaker. Camillus notwithstanding, preparing to preuent this mischiefe, and knowing the day the Tribunes had determined, to preferre the passing of their law by voyces of the people: he gaue warning by proclamations set vpon postes, that the same very day he would muster the people, and all was but to drawe them from the market place into the field of Mars, and did set great penalties vpon those that should be lacking at the musters, and would presume to disobey. The Tribunes of the people on the contrary part did withstande his threates, and sware they would condemne Camillus selfe in fiftie thousand Drachmas of siluer, if he did not let the people alone, but would goe about to disturbe them for giuing their voyces to such law, as they liked of. Camillus perceiuing this, and fearing to be condemned, and banished once againe, which would fall out very ill for him, being now an old man, and one that had done so many great and notable actes, or else for that he thought him selfe not strong enough to withstand the force of the people: he kept his house that day, fayning himselfe to be sicke, and certaine other dayes following, and in the ende he gaue vp his office. Thereupon the Senate chose in his place another Dictator, who named the same Licinius Stolo generall of the horse men, that was the author and furtherer of all this sedition: and besides did suffer him to preferre another law, and to passe it by voyces of the people, that aboue all other lawes, did most trouble the Patricians. Which law did forbid any citizen of ROME, to haue, or occupie aboue fiue hundred iugera, which amount to 330. acres and a halfe, 12. pole, and 121. partes of a pole. Then was this Stolo aloft, and of great estimation at that time: for that he had in despight of the Senate established this law. Howbeit shortly after it was found out, that himselfe had more number of acres then his owne lawe permitted. By reason whereof, he receiued the iust punishment of his owne deuised forfaiture. Yet the most weightie matter of all this dissention that beganne first, and most of all troubled the Senate touching the election of the Consuls, remained still vndetermined. But while these matters were thus in talke, the ROMAINES had certain intelligence, how the GAVLES were departed once againe from the Adriatick sea, & were cõming with a great power straight vnto Rome: vpon report of which newes, the warres followed immediatly. For the GAVLES destroyed the champion countrie as they went: and the poore countrie men that could not recouer ROME, were scattered here & there amongest the mountaines. The feare of this did somwhat appease the dissention. The people then assembling with the Senate, and the baser sort with the noble, did all with one voyce and assent chuse Camillus Dictator the fift time. He was now a very old man, lacking litle of foure scoreyeares: but neuertheles, considering the necessitie and present daunger, without framing any excuse, or starting as he had before, he vndertook the charge. Now that he had taken it vpon him, he presently leauied men, and prepared his armie. And knowing very well how the fiercenesse of these barbarous GAVLES consisted in downe right blowes with their swordes, with which they would strike off heads and shoulders of men at a blow, mangling them like butchers, without any cast or skill of fight: he caused iron sallets, and morians to be made for the most of his men, as smoothly wrought on the out side as could be, that their swords lighting on them, should either slide off, or breake. Moreouer, he caused their shields to haue bars made about them of copper, because the wood selfe was not able to abide ther blowes. Furthermore, he did teach his souldiers to carie long iauelines or punchion staues, wherewith they might wound their enemies lifting vp their swords to strike them. Now when the GAVLES were come neere ROME, hauing pitched their campe vpon the riuer of Anian, and being full loden and stuffed with all kinds of spoyle and booties: then Camillus brought his armie also into the field, and went to lodge on a litle hill which was easie to get vpon, where there were many litle caues, so that the most of his armie was all hidden and couered, and those that were seene, seemed to be retired thither into those high places for an aduantage, and of feare. Camillus to increase this opinion more in his enemies, and to make them the bolder, did suffer them to come and spoyle euen to the foote of the hill where he was lodged, and stirred not once out to trouble them, but kept himself close in his campe and well fortified. Vntill such time as he spied occasion of aduantage, that the best part of their armie were scattered here and there, a forraging all about the fields: and those which remained in their campe, fell to eating and drinking as they vsed carelesly at all houres. Then Camillus sent very early before day, his lightest armed men, to vexe and trouble the barous people in comming out of their campe; and to let them in any case from putting men in order of battell: and he at the breake of day, came downe into the plaine, and did set his other men being well armed, in good array, which were a great number, and lusty fellowes, and were not as the barbarous people thought, few, and fearefull. This at the very first discouraged the hearts of the GAVLES maruellously, because they thought them selues dishonored, that the ROMAINES should charge them first. Afterwardes also Camillus vantguard did set vppon the GAVLES, and that on a sodaine, before they had leysure to put them selues in battell, or to order their troupes; compelling them to fight without order, as they met out of order by chaunce. In the end also, Camillus came vpon the necks of them, with all his whole force, and army together: against whom they ranne notwithstanding, holding vp their naked swordes aloft in their handes. But the ROMAINES thrusting with their armed iauelings, receiued their enemies blowes vpon them, and thereby so rebated the edges of their swordes (their blades being very sharpe and thinne ground, and of so soft a temper) that they bowed againe, and stoode crooked vnreasonably: and furthermore, hauing pierced their shieldes through with their punching staues, the GAVLES armes were so clogd and wearied with them, the ROMAINES plucking them backe to them againe, that they threw away their swordes and shieldes, and flying in, closed with the ROMAINES, and caught hold of their iauelings, thinking by plaine force to haue wrested them out of their handes. Howbeit they perceiuing then the GAVLES were naked, fell straight to their swordes: and so was the slaughter of their first rankes very great. The other fled scatteringly here and there, all about the plaine: because Camillus had caused all the hilles and mountaines about them to be occupied and possessed. Neither did they retire towardes their campe, for that it was vnfortified, and also knew well enough it would be easily taken. This battell (as they say) was thirteene yeares after their taking of ROME before. But after that field, the ROMAINES courages were good enough against these barbarous GAVLES, whom they stoode in feare of before: thinking the first time they came, that they had not ouercome them by force, but by reason of the plague that fell amongest them, or through some other straunge chaunce. For they did so feare them at that time, that they made a law, how their priestes should be exempted from warres, so it were not against the GAVLES. This ouerthrow was the last marshall act Camillus did in the warres. For, the taking of the city of VELIGRAS, was an accident depending vpon this iourney: because they yeelded straight vnto him, without striking any stroke. But the lewd vnquietnesse of the people of ROME about gouernment, and the choosing of the yeare Consuls, was the hardest matter he euer had in hand. For they returning home to Rome strong, and of great power, by their late obtained victory: would in any case haue one of the Consuls to be chosen of a commoner, which was directly against their ancient custome. But the Senate stoutly withstood it, and would not suffer Camillus to be put out of office: hoping the better by meanes of his authority, which was great then, that they should maintaine and continue their auncient dignity, and prerogatiue of their nobility. But as Camillus was set in his chaire in the market place, where he heard and dispatched causes: there came a sergeant to him, sent from the Tribunes of the people, who commaunded him to follow him, and there withall layd violent handes vppon him, as hee would haue caried him away by force. This made such a terrible tumult and vproare, that the like was neuer seene before in the market place. For Camillus friendes draue the sergeant backe behind the chaire. The common people cried out againe to the sergeant from beneath, pull him out of his chaire. This so amazed Camillus, that he knew not well what to say at the matter. Notwithstanding, he would not resigne vp his office, but taking those Senators he had about him, he went vnto the place where the Senate was wont to be kept. And there, before he would goe into it, he turned backe againe vnto the Capitoll, and made his prayer vnto the gods, that it would please them to bring his troubles againe to a quiet, and so made a solemne vow and promise (if these tumultes and troubles might bee pacified) that hee would builde a temple of Concord. When this matter came to debating before the Senate, there fell great contention and diuersity of opinions among them: yet in the end, the easiest way did carry it, and that was to graunt the common peoples desire, that a commoner should be chosen Consull with a noble man. The Dictator hauing openly published to the people the Senates decree, confirming their desire: the common people were so ioyfull, that at that present they let fall their malice against the Nobility and Senate, and brought Camillus home to his house, with great shouts of ioy, and clapping of hands. The next morning all the people being assembled together in the market place, it was there decreed: that the temple of concord should be built at the common wealths charge (according to the vow Camillus had made) in such a place, as it might be seene from the market place selfe, where all the assemblies for matters of counsell were made. And further, it was ordered that one day more should be added to the feasts of the LATINES: and that from thenceforth they should solemnize foure festiuall daies, and should presently make generall sacrifices vnto the goddes, in euery temple of the city, to giue them thankes: and in token of ioy, they should all weare garlands vpon their heads for this reconciliation. So Camillus proceeding to election, there were chosen two Consuls, Marcus Æmilius of the noble Patricians, and Lucius Sextius of the Plebeians or commoners. And this was the last act that euer Camillus did. For the next yeare after the plague was in ROME, and tooke away an infinite number of people that died, besides many magistrates and officers of the city that departed: among whom, Camillus also left his life. Who notwithstanding he had liued a long time, and had ended a reasonable course of life: yet he was as ready to die, and as patiently tooke his death, as any man liuing could haue done. Moreouer, the ROMAINS made more mone & lamentation for his death alone, then for al the rest the plague had already consumed.

Aristotles testimony of the taking of Rome

THE LIFE OF Pericles.

CAESAR seing in ROME one day certaine rich and wealthy strangers hauing little dogs and munkeys in their armes, and that they made much and maruellous much of them, he asked them if the women in their country had no children: wisely reprooving them by this question, for that they bestowed their natural loue and affection vpon brute beasts, which they should with all kindnesse and loue bestow vpon creatures. Nature in like case also, hauing planted in our mindes a naturall desire to learne and vnderstand, we are in reason to reproue those that vainely abuse this good desire, fondly ſing it to learne things vaine and vnprofitable: and to caſt behinde them in the meane ſeaſon thinges honeſt and neceſſary to be learned. For as touching our outward ſenſe, which with paſſion receiueth impreſſion of the thing it ſeeth, peraduenture it will be neceſſary to conſider indifferently the thing ſeene, whether it will fall out beneficiall or hurtfull vnto him: but ſo fareth it not with our vnderſtanding, for euery man may at his pleaſure turne and diſpoſe that to the thing he taketh delight in, the reaſon whereof we muſt alwaies imploy to the beſt part, and that not only to conſider and looke vpon the thing, but alſo to reape the benefit and commodity of the thing we ſee. For like as the eie is moſt delighted with the lighteſt and freſheſt colours: euen ſo we muſt giue our minds vnto thoſe ſightes, which by looking vpon them do draw profit and pleaſure vnto vs. For ſuch effects doth vertue bring: that either to heare or read them, they do print in our hearts an earneſt loue and deſire to follow them. But this followeth not in all other things we eſteeme, neither are we alwaies diſpoſed to deſire to do the thinges we ſee well done: but contrary oftentimes, when we like the worke, we miſlike the worke man, as cõmonly in making theſe perfumes and purple colours. For both the one & the other do pleaſe vs well: but yet we take perfumers and diers to be men of a meane occupation. Therfore Antiſthenes anſwered one very wiſely, that told him Iſmenias was an excellent player of the flute. But yet he is a naughty mã, ſayd he: otherwiſe he could not be ſo cunning at the flute as he is. Euen ſo did Philip king of MACEDON ſay to his ſonne Alexander the great on a time: that at a certaine feaſt had ſung paſſing ſweetly, and like a maiſter of muſicke. Art thou not aſhamed ſon to ſing ſo well? It is enough for a King to beſtow his leiſure ſomtime to hear muſitians ſing, & he doth much honor to the Muſes to heare the maſter of the ſcience other while, when one of them ſingeth to excell another. But he that perſonally ſhall beſtow his time, exerciſing any meane ſcience: bringeth his paines he hath taken in matters vnprofitable, a witneſſe againſt himſelfe, to proue that he hath bene negligent to learne thinges honeſt and profitable. And there was neuer any yong gentleman nobly borne, that ſeing the image of Iupiter (which is in the city of PISA) deſired to become Phidias: nor Polycletus, for ſeeing of Iuno in the city of ARGOS: nor that deſired to be Anacreon, or Philemon, or Archilochus, for that they tooke pleaſure ſomtime to read their works. For it followeth not of neceſſity, that though the worke delight, the workeman muſt needs be prayſed. And ſo in like caſe, ſuch thinges doe not profite thoſe which behold them, becauſe they doe not moue affection in the hearts of the beholders to follow them, neither doe ſtirre vp affection to reſemble them, and much leſſe to conforme our ſelues vnto them. But vertue hath this ſingular property in all her actions: that ſhee maketh the man that knoweth her to affect her ſo, that ſtraight he liketh all her doings, and deſireth to follow thoſe that are vertuous. For, as for riches, we only deſire to haue them in poſſeſſion: but of vertue, we chiefely loue the deeds. Wherefore we are contented to haue goods from other men: but good deeds we would other ſhould haue from vs. For vertue is of this power, that ſhe alureth a mans mind preſently to vſe her, that wiſely conſidereth of her, & maketh him very deſirous in his heart to follow her: and doth not frame his manners that beholdeth her by any imitation, but by the only vnderſtanding and knowledge of vertuous deedes, which ſodainely bringeth vnto him a reſolute deſire to do the like. And this is the reaſon, why me thought I ſhould continue ſtill to write on the liues of noble men, & why I made alſo this tenth booke: in the which are contained the liues of Pericles and Fabius Maximus, who maintained wars againſt Hannibal. For they were both men very like together in many ſundry vertues, and ſpecially in curteſie and iuſtice: and for that they could patiently beare the follies of their people, and companions that were in charge of gouernment with them, they were marueilous profitable members for their country. But if we haue ſorted them well together, comparing the one with the other: you ſhall eaſily iudge that read our writings of their liues. Pericles was of the tribe of the Acamantides, of the towne of CHOLARGVS, and one of the beſt and moſt ancient families of the city of ATHENS, both by his father and mother. For Xantippus his father (who ouercame in battell the lieutenants of the king of PERSIA in the iourney of Mycala) maried Agariſte that came of Cliſthenes, he who draue out of ATHENS Piſiſtratus iſſpring, and valiantly ouerthrew their tyranny. Afterwardes he eſtabliſhed lawes, and ordained a very graue forme of gouernment, to maintaine his citizens in peace and concord together. This Agariſt dreamed one night that ſhe was brought to bed of a Lion: and very ſhortly after ſhe was deliuered of Pericles, who was ſo well proportioned in all the parts of his body, that nothing could be mended, ſauing that his head was ſomewhat too long and out of proportion to the reſt of his body. And this is the only cauſe why all the ſtatues and images of him almoſt, are made with a helmet of his head: becauſe the workmen as it ſhould ſeeme (and ſo it is moſt likely) were willing to hide the blemiſhe of his deformity. But the ATTICAN Poets did call him Schinocephalos, as much to ſay, headed like an onion. For thoſe of ATTICA doe ſometime name that which is called in the vulgar tongue Scilla, that is to ſay, an onion of Barbarie: Schinos. And Cratinus the Comicall Poet in his comedy hee entituled Chirones, ſayd:

Pericles had a long head.

Olde Saturne he, and dreadfull dire debate

And againe alſo in that which he nameth Nemeſis, ſpeaking of him, he ſaieth:

Come Iupiter, come Iupiter,
Come iolt-head, and come inkeeper.

And Teleclides mocking him alſo, ſayeth in a place:

Sometimes he ſtands, amazed when he perceiues, that hard it were, ſufficiently to know, in what eſtate, his gouernment he leaues.
And then will he, be ſeldome ſeene by low, ſuch heauie heapes, within his braines do grow.
But yet ſometimes, out of that monſtrous pate, he thundreth faſt, and threatneth euery ſtate.

And Eupolis in a comedy which he intituled Demi: being very inquiſitiue, and asking particularly of euery one of the Orators (whom he fained were returned out of hell) when he named Pericles the laſt man vnto him, he ſaide:

Truely thou haſt now brought, vnto vs here that dwell, the chiefe of all the captaines, that come from darkſome hell.

Pericles ſtudies and teachers.

And as for muſicke, the moſt authors write, that Damon did teach him muſicke, of whose name (as men ſay) they ſhould pronounce the firſt ſyllable ſhort. Howbeit Ariſtotle ſaieth, that he was taught muſicke by Pythoclides. Howſoeuer it was, it is certaine that this Damon was a man of deepe vnderſtanding, and ſubtill in matters of gouernment: for, to hide from the people his ſufficiency therein, he gaue it out he was a muſitian, and did reſort vnto Pericles as maſter wreſtler, or fenſer: but he taught him how he ſhould deale in matters of ſtate. Notwithſtanding, in the end he could not ſo cunningly conuay this matter, but the people ſaw his leaping and muſicke, was only a viſer to his other practiſe: wherefore they did baniſhe him. THENS for fiue yeares, as a man that buſily tooke vpon him to change the ſtate of things, and that fauoured tyranny. And this gaue the Comicall Poets matter to play vpon him finely, among which Plato in a comedy of his, bringeth in a man that asketh him:

O Chiron, tell me firſt: art thou indeede the man, which did inſtruct Pericles thus? make aunſwer if thou can.

Zenon Eleatean.

He was ſometime alſo ſcholler to the Philoſopher Zenon, who was borne in the city of ELEA, and taught naturall philoſophy, as Parmenides did: but his profeſſion was to thwart all contrary all men, and to alledge a world of obiections in his diſputation, which were ſo intricate, that his aduerſary replying againſt him, knew not how to aunſwer him, nor to conclude his argument. The which Timon Phliaſius witneſſeth in theſe words:

Zenon was ſubtill ſure, and very eloquent, and craftily could winde a man, by way of argument, if ſo he were diſpoſed, his cunning to deſcrie, or ſhew the sharpneſſe of his wit, to practiſe pollicy.

But Anaxagoras Clazomenian was he that was moſt familiar and conuerſaunt with him and did put in him the maiestie and grauitie he shewed in all his sayings, and doings, who did farre excell the common course of ordinarie Orators that pleaded before the people: and to be short, he it was that did fashion his manners, altogether to carie that graue countenance which he did. For they called Anaxagoras in his time, Nùs, as much to say, as vnderstanding, Either because they had his singular wit and capacitie in such great admiration, being growne to search out the cause of naturall things: or that he was the first man, who did ascribe the disposition and gouernement of this world, not vnto fortune or fatall necessitie, but vnto a pure, simple, and vnderstanding minde, which doth separate at the first mouing cause, the substance of such like parts as are medled and compounded of diuerse substances, in all other bodies through the world. Pericles made maruellous much of Anaxagoras, who had fully instructed him in the knowledge of naturall things, and of those specially that worke aboue in the ayre and firmament. For he grew not only to haue a great minde and an eloquent tongue, without any affectation, or grosse countrie termes: but to a certaine modest countenance that scantly smiled, very sober in his gate, hauing a kinde of sound in his voyce that he neuer lost nor altered, and was of very honest behauiour, neuer troubled in his talke for any thing that crossed him, and many other such like things, as all that saw them in him, and considered them, could but wonder at him. But for proofe hereof, the report goeth, there was a naughty busie fellow on a time, that a whole day together did nothing but raile vpon Pericles in the market place, and reuile him to his face, with all the villanous words he could vse. But Pericles put all vp quietly, and gaue him not a worde againe, dispatching in the meane time matters of importance he had in hand, vntill night came, that he went softly home to his house, shewing no alteration nor semblance of trouble at all, though this lewd varlet followed him at the heeles, with words of open defamation. And as he was ready to enter in at his owne doores, being darke night, he commaunded one of his men to take a torche, and to bring this man home to his house. Yet the Poet Ion saieth, that Pericles was a very proude man, and a stately, and that with his grauitie and noble minde, there was mingled a certaine scorne and contempt of other: and contrarilie, he greatly praiseth the ciuilitie, humanitie, and courtesie of Cimon, because he could fashion himselfe to all companies. But letting passe that which the Poet Ion said: who would that vertue should be full of tragicall discipline, bringing in with it, a certaine satyricall discourse to mooue laughter. Now Zennon contrariwise did counsell all those, that said Pericles grauitie was a presumption, and arrogancie: that they should also follow him in his presumption. For, to counterfaite in that sort things honest and vertuous, doth secretly with time breed an affection and desire to loue them, and afterwards with custome euen effectually to vse and follow them. So Pericles by keeping Anaxagoras companie, did not onely profit himselfe in these things, but he learned besides to put away all superstitious feare, of celestiall signes and impressions seene in the ayre. For to those that are ignorant of the causes thereof, such sights are terrible, and to the godly also fearefull, as if they were vtterly vndone: and all is, because they haue no certaine knowledge of the reason that naturall Philosophie yeeldeth, which in stead of a fearfull superstition, would bring a true religion accompanied with assured hope of goodnesse. Some say a man brought Pericles one day from his farme out of the countrie, a Rammes head that had but one horne, and that the prognosticator Lampon considering this head, that had but one strong horne in the middest of his forehead, interpreted, that this was the signification thereof. That being two tribes and seuerall factions in the citie of Athens touching gouernement, the one of Pericles, and the other of Thucydides: the power of both should be brought into one, and specially into his part, in whose house this signe did happen. Further, it is said that Anaxagoras being present, did cause the Rammes head to be clouen in two peeces, and shewed vnto them that stood by, that the braine of this Ramme did not fill the panne of his naturall place, but inclosed it selfe in all parts, being narrowe like the pointe of an egge, in that parte where the horne tooke his first roote of budding out. So Anaxagoras was maruellously esteemed at that present by all those that stood by: but so was Lampon, soone after that Thucydides was driuen away, and that the gouernment of the whole commonweale fell into the hands of Pericles alone. And it is not to be wondred at (in my opinion) that the naturall Philosopher where some say, that to shew the cause, is to take away the signification of the signe: they not consider that in seeking to abolish by this reason the wonderfull tokens and signes in t they kept the Salaminian galley at Athens) for matters of great importance. And in his familiar friends, amongst whom Ephialtes (as they say) was one: he who tooke away the authoritie and power from the courte of Areopagus, and did giue too much libertie to the people, as Plato sayed. Vpon which occasion, as the Comicall poets say, he became so stoute and headstrong, that they could no more holde him backe, then a young vnbridled colte: and tooke such a courage vpon him, that he would obay no more, but inuaded the Ile of Euboea, and set vpon the other Ilands. Pericles also because he would fashion a phrase o speache, with a kinde of stile altogether agreeable to the manner of life and grauitie he ha taken vpon him: he gaue himselfe to all matters which he had learned of Anaxagora shadowing his reasons of naturall philosophie, with artificiall rethoricke. For hauing obte ned a deepe vnderſtanding by ſtudying of Philoſophie, and a ready way effectually to ende any matter, he vndertooke to prooue (beſides that nature had endued him with an excellent wit and capacitie, as the diuine Plato doth write, to bring any thing to ſerue his purpoſe) he did ſo artificially compaſſe it with eloquence, that he farre paſſed all the orators in his time. And for this cauſe was he (as they ſay) ſurnamed Olympius, as much to ſay, as heauenly or diuine. But ſome are of opinion he had that ſurname, by reaſon of the common buildings and ſtately workes he raiſed vp in the citie of ATHENS, that did much ſet forth the ſame. Other thinke it was giuen him for his great authoritie and power he had in gouernment, aſwell in warres, as in peace. But it is no maruell that this glorie was giuen him, conſidering the many other qualities and vertues that were in him. Howbeit the commedies the Poets cauſed to be plaied in thoſe times (in which there were many wordes ſpoken of him, ſome in earneſt, ſome in ſporte and ieaſt) do witneſſe that he had that ſurname giuen him, chiefly for his eloquence. For it is reported, that he thundered and lightened in his oration to the people, and that his tongue was a terrible lightning. And touching this matter, they tell of an aunſwer Thucydides, Mileſius ſonne, ſhould pleaſantly make concerning the force of Pericles eloquence. Thucydides was a noble man, and had long time contended againſt Pericles in matters of the commonweale. Archidamus, king of LACEDÆMON, asked Thucydides on a time: whether he or Pericles wreſtled beſt. Thucydides made him aunſwer. When I haue giuen him an open fall before the face of the world, he can ſo excellently denie it, that he maketh the people beleeue he had no fall at all, and perſwadeth them the contrarie of that they ſawe. Notwithſtanding he was euer very graue and wiſe in ſpeaking. For euer when he went vp into the pulpit for orations to ſpeake to the people, he made his prayers vnto the gods, that nothing might eſcape his mouthe, but that he might conſider before whether it would ſerue the purpoſe of his matter he treated on: yet are there none of his workes extant in writing, vnleſſe it be ſome fewe lawes he made, and but very few of his notable ſayings are brought to light, ſaue onely theſe. He ſaid on a time that they muſt take away the citie of ÆGINA, becauſe it was a ſtrawe lying in the eye of the hauen PIRÆA. And another time, he ſaid that he ſaw the warres a farre off, comming from PELOPONNESVS. Another time, as he tooke ſhip with Sophocles (his companion in commiſſion with him as generall of the armie) who commended a faire young boye they met as they came to the hauen: Sophocles, ſaid he, a gouernour muſt not onely haue his hands, but alſo his eyes cleane. And Steſimbrotus writeth, that in a funerall oration he made in the praiſe of thoſe that were ſlaine in the warre of SAMOS: he ſaid they were immortall as the gods. For we do not ſee the goddes (ſaid he) as they be, but for the honour that is done to them, and the great happineſſe they enioy, we do coniecture they are immortall: and the ſame things are in thoſe that dye in ſeruice, and defence of their countrie. Now where Thucydides doth write the gouernment of the commonweale vnder Pericles to be as a gouernment of Nobilitie, and yet had apparaunce of a popular ſtate: it is true that in effect it was a Kingdome, becauſe one alone did rule and gouerne the whole ſtate. And many other ſay alſo, he was the firſt that brought in the cuſtome to deuide the enemies lands wunne by conqueſt among the people, and of the common money to make the people ſee playes and paſtimes, and that appointed them reward for all things. But this cuſtome was ill brought vp. For the common people that before were contented with litle, and got their liuing painefully with ſwet of their browes: became now to be very vaine, ſumptuous, and riotous, by reaſon of theſe things brought vp then. The cauſe of the alteration dooth eaſily appeare by thoſe things. For Pericles at his firſt comming, ſought to winne the fauour of the people, as we haue ſaid before, onely to get like reputation that Cimon had wonne. But comming farre ſhort of his wealth and abilitie, to carie out the porte and charge that Cimon did, entertaining the poore, keeping open houſe to all commers, clothing poore olde people, breaking open beſides all incloſures and pales through all his lands, that euery one might with more libertie come in, and take the frutes thereof at their pleaſure: and ſeeing himſelfe by theſe great meanes out gone farre in goodwill with the common people, by Demonides counſell and procurement (who was borne in the Ile of IOS) he brought in this diſtribution of the common money, as

Aristotle writeth. And hauing wonne in a short time the fauour and goodwill of the common people, by distribution of the common treasure, which he caused to be deuided among them, aswell to haue place to see these playes, as for that they had reward to be present at their iudgements, & by other such like corruptions: he with the peoples helpe, did inueigh against the courte of the Areopagites, whereof he neuer was any member. For it neuer came to be his hap to be yeerely gouernour, nor keeper of the lawes, nor King of the sacrifices, nor maister of the warres: all which were offices chosen in auncient time by lot. And further, those on whom the lot fell, if they had behaued themselues well in their office, they were called forwards, and raised to be of the body of this courte of the Areopagites. Pericles now by these meanes hauing obtained great credit and authoritie amongst the people, he troubled the Senate of the Areopagites in such sort, that he pluckt many matters from their hearing, by Ephialtes helpe, and in time made Cimon to be banished ATHENS, as one that fauoured the LACEDÆMONIANS, and contraried the commonwealth, and authoritie of the people. Notwithstanding he was the noblest and richest person of all the citie, and one that had wonne so many glorious victories, and had so repleniſhed ATHENS with the conquered spoiles of their enemies, as we haue declared in his life: so great was the authoritie of Pericles amongst the people. Now the banishment wherewith he was punished (which they called Ostracismon) was limited by the lawe for tenne yeares. In which space the LACEDÆMONIANS being come downe with a great armie into the countrie of TANAGRA, the ATHENIANS sent out their power presently against them. There Cimon willing to shew the ATHENIANS by his deedes, that they had falsely accused him for fauouring the LACEDÆMONIANS: did arme himselfe, and went on his country mens side, to fight in the companie of his tribe. But Pericles friends gathered together, and forced Cimon to depart thence as a banished man. And this was the cause that Pericles fought that day more valiantly then euer he did, and he wanne the honour and name to haue done more in the person of himselfe that day, then any other of all the armie. At that battell also, all Cimons freinds, whom Pericles had burdened likewise to fauour the LACEDÆMONIANS doings, dyed euery man of them that day. Then the ATHENIANS repented them much that they had driuen Cimon away, and wished he were restored, after they had lost this battell vpon the confines of the countrie of ATTICA: because they feared sharpe warres would come vpon them againe at the next spring. Which thing when Pericles perceiued, he sought also to further that the common people desired: wherefore he straight caused a decree to be made, that Cimon should be called home againe, which was done accordingly. Now when Cimon was returned, he aduised that peace should be made betweene both cities: for the LACEDÆMONIANS did loue Cimon very well, and contrarily they hated Pericles, and all other gouernours. Some notwithstanding do write, that Pericles did neuer passe his consent to call him home againe, before such time as they had made a secret agreement amongst themselues (by meanes of Elpinice, Cimons sister) that Cimon should be sent out with an armie of two hundred galleys, to make warres in the king of PERSIA his dominions, & that Pericles should remaine at home with the authoritie of gouernment within the citie. This Elpinice (Cimons sister) had once before intreated Pericles for her brother, at such time as he was accused before the iudge of treason. For Pericles was one of the committees, to whom this accusation was referred by the people. Elpinice went vnto him, & besought him not to do his worst vnto her brother. Pericles answered her merily. Thou art too old Elpinice, thou art too old, to go through with these matters. Yet when his matter came to iudgement, and that his cause was pleaded: he rose but once to speake against him (for his owne discharge as it were) and went his way when he had said, doing lesse hurt to Cimon, then any other of his accusers. How is Idomeneus to be credited now, who accuseth Pericles that he had caused the orator Ephialtes to be slaine by treason (that was his friend, and did alwaies counsell him, and take his part in all kinde of gouernment of the commonweale) onely for the iealousie and enuie he did beare to his glorie? I can but muse why Idomeneus should speake so slanderously against Pericles, vnlesse it were that his melancholy humour procured such violent speach: who though peraduenture he was not altogether blameless, yet he was euer noble minded, and had a naturall desire of honour, in which kinde of men such furious cruell passions are seeldome seene to breede. But this orator Ephialtes being cruell to those that tooke part with the Nobilitie, because he would spare or pardon no man for any offence whatsoeuer committed against the peoples authoritie, but did follow and persecute them with all rigour to the vttermost: his enemies laide waite for him by meanes of one Aristodicus TANAGRIAN, and they killed him by treason, as Aristotle writeth. In the meanetime Cimon died in the Ile of CYPRVS, being generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS by sea. Wherefore those that tooke part with the Nobilitie, seeing Pericles was now growen very great, and that he went before all other citizens of ATHENS, thinking it good to haue some one to sticke on their side against him, and to lessen thereby somewhat his authoritie, that he might not come to rule all as he would: they raised vp against him, one Thucydides, of the towne of ALOPECIA, a graue wise man, and father in law to Cimon. This Thucydides had lesse skill of warres then Cimon, but vnderstood more in ciuill gouernment then he, for that he remained most part of his time within the citie: where continually inueighing against Pericles in his pulpit for orations to the people, in short time hee had stirred vp a like companie against the faction of Pericles. For he kept the gentlemen and richer sort (which they call Nobilitie) from mingling with the common people, as they were before, when through the multitude of the commons their estate and dignitie was abscured, and troden vnder foote. Moreouer hee did separate them from the people, and did assemble them all as it were into one bodie, who came to be of equall power with the other faction, and did put (as a man will say) a counterpease into the ballance. For at the beginning there was but a little secret grudge only betwene these two factions, as an artificiall flower set in the blade of a sword, which made those shew a litle, that did leane vnto the people: and the other also somwhat that fauored the Nobilitie. But the contention betweene these two persons, was as a deepe cut, which deuided the citie wholy in two factions: of the which the one was called the Nobilitie, and the other the communaltie. Therefore Pericles giuing yet more libertie vnto the people, did all thinges that might be to please them, ordeining continuall plaies and games in the citie, many feastes, bankets, and open pastimes to entertaine the commons with such honest pleasures and deuises: and besides all this, he sent yerely an armie of three score gallies vnto the waters, into the which he put a great number of poore citizens that tooke paie of the state for nine moneths of the yere, and thereby they did learne together, and practise to be good sea men. Furthermore he sent into the countrie of CHERRONESVS, a thousand free men of the citie to dwell there, and to deuide the landes amongest them: fiue hundred also into the Ile of NAXOS: into the Ile of ANDROS, two hundred & fiftie: into THRACIA, a thousand to dwell with the BISALTES: & other also into ITALY, when the citie of SYBARIS was built againe, which afterwardes was surnamed the citie of the THVRIANS. All this he did to rid the citie of a number of idle people, who through idlenesse beganne to be curious, and to desire chaunge of things, as also to prouide for the necessitie of the poore townes men that had nothing. For, placing the naturall citizens of ATHENS neere vnto their subiectes and friendes, they serued as a garrison to keepe them vnder, and did suppresse them also from attempting any alteration or chaunge. But that which delighteth most, & is the greatest ornament vnto the citie of ATHENS, which maketh strangers most to wonder, and which alone doth bring sufficient testimonie, to confirme that which is reported of the auncient power, riches, and great wealth of GREECE, to be true and not false: are the stately and sumptuous buildings, which Pericles made to be built in the citie of ATHENS. For it is the onely act of all other Pericles did, and which made his enemies most to spight him, and which they most accused him for, crying out vpon him in all counselles and assemblies: that the people of ATHENS were openly defamed, for carying away the readie money of all GREECE, which was left in the Ile of DELOS to be safely kept there. And although they could with good honestie haue excused this fact, saying that Pericles had taken it from them, for feare of the barbarous people, to the ende to lay it vp in a more stronger place, where it should be in better safetie: yet was this too ouergreat an iniurie offered vnto all the rest of GREECE, & too manifest a token of tyrannie also, to beholde before their eyes, how we doe employ the money, which they were inforced to gather for the maintenance of the warres against the barbarous people, in gilding, building, and setting forth our citie, like a glorious woman, all to be gauded with golde and precious stones, and how we doe make images, and build vp temples of wonderfull & infinite charge: Pericles replied to the contrarie, and declared vnto the ATHENIANS that they were not bound to make any account of this money vnto their friends and allies, considering that they fought for their safetie, and that they kept the barbarous people farre from GREECE, without troubling them to set out any one man, horse, or shippe of theirs, the money onely excepted, which is no more theirs that paide it, then theirs that receiued it, for they bestowe it not that vse they receiued it for. And their citie being already very well furnished, and prouided of all thinges necessary for the warres, it was good reason they should employ and bestow the surplus of the treasure in things: which in time to come (and being throughly finished) would make their fame eternall. Moreouer he saide that whilest they continue building, they should be presently rich, by reason of the diuersitie of workes of all sortes, and other thinges which they should haue neede of: and to compasse these things the better, and to set them in hande, all manner of artificers and workemen (that would labour) should be set a worke. So should all the townes men, and inhabitants of the citie, receiue paie and wages of the common treasure: and the citie by this meanes should be greatly beautified, and much more able to maintaine it selfe. For such as were strong, and able men of bodie, and of yeares to carie weapon, had paie and entertainement of the common wealth, which were sent abroad vnto the warres: and other that were not meete for warres, as craftes men, and labourers: her would also they should haue part of the common treasure, but not without they earned it, and by doing somewhat. And this was his reason, and the cause that made him occupie the common people with great buildings, and deuises of workes of diuerse occupations, which could not be finished of long time: to the end that the citizens remaining at home, might haue a meane and way to take part of the common treasure, and enrich themselues, as well as those that went to the warres, and serued on the sea, or els that lay in garrison to keepe any place of fort. For some gained by bringing stuffe as stones, brasse, yuory, gold, ebbany, and cypres. Other got, to worke and fashion it: as carpenters, grauers, founders, casters of images, masons, hewers of stone, diers, goldsmithes, ioyners working in iuorie, painters, men that set in sundry colours of peeces of stone or wood, and turners. Other gained to bring stuffe, and to furnish them: as marchants, marriners, and shipmasters, for things they brought them by sea. And by land other got also: as cart-makers, carriers, carters, cord-makers, sadlers, coller-makers, and pyoners to make waies plaine, and miners, and such like. Furthermore, euery science and craft, as a captaine hauing souldiers, had also their armie of the workemen that serued them, labouring truely for their liuing, who serued as prentises and iorney men vnder the workemasters so the worke by this meanes did disperse abroad a common gaine to all sorts of people and ages, what occupation or trade soeuer they had. And thus came the buildings to rise in greatnesse and sumptuousnesse, being of excellent workmanship, and for grace & beautie not comparable: because euery workeman in his science did striue what he could to excell others, to make his worke appeare greatest in sight, and to be most workemanly done in shew. But the greatest thing to be wondred at, was their speede & diligence. For where euery man thought those workes were not likely to be finished in many mens liues and ages, and from man to man: they were all done and finished, whilest one onely gouernour continued still in credit and authoritie. And yet they say, that in the same time, as one Agatarchus boasted him selfe that he had quickly painted certaine beastes: Zeuxis another painter hearing him, answered: And I contrarily doe reioyce, that I am a long time in drawing of them. For cōmonly slight and sodaine drawing of any thing, cannot take deepe colours, nor giue perfect beautie to the worke: but length of time, adding to the painters diligence & labour in making of the worke, maketh the colours to continue for euer. For this cause therefore the workes Pericles made are more wonderfull: because they were perfectly made in so short a time, and haue continued so long a season. For euery one of those which were finished vp at that time, seemed then to be very auncient touching the beautie thereof: and yet for the grace & continuance of the same it looketh at this day as if it were but newly done and finished, there is such a certaine kind of flourishing freshnes in it, which letteth that the iniurie of time cannot impaire the sight there-

Diuers artificers at Athens.

As if euery one of those foresaid workes, had some liuing spirite in it, to make it seeme young and fresh: and a soule that liued euer, which kept them in their good continuing state. Now the chiefe surueyour generall of all these workes, was Phidias, albeit that there were many other excellent worke-masters in euery science and occupation. For the temple of Pallas, which is called Parthenon (as a man would say, the temple of the virgine, and is surnamed Hecatompedon, for that it is a hundred foote euery way) was built by Ictinus, & Callicrates: and the chappell of Eleusin (where the secret ceremonies of the mysteries were made) was first founded by Corabus, who raised vp the first pillers in order, standing beneath on the ground, and did set them vp vnto the master chaptrels. But after he was dead, Metagenes, borne in the towne of Xypeta, turned the arches ouer, and then did set the pillers in order also which are aboue: and Xenocles of the towne of Cholargea, was he that made the lanterne or toppe of the steeple which couereth the sanctuarie: but the long wall which Socrates heard Pericles himselfe giue order for the building of it, was done by Callicrates, who vndertooke the worke. Cratinus the Poet, in a comedie he made, laugheth at this worke, to see howe slowly it went forward, and how long it was a doing, saying:

Pericles long a goe, did end this worke begunne:
and build it high, with glorious wordes, if so it had bene done.
But as for deedes (in deede) he built nothing at all, but let it stand: as yet it stands, much liker for to fall.

And as for the Theater or place appointed for musicke, where they heare all musitians play, and is called Odeon: it is very well made within with diuers seates & degrees, and many ranges of pillers, but the toppe of the roofe is altogether round, which is somewhat hanging downeward round about of it selfe, comming together into one point. And it is saide that this was made after the patterne and fashion of king Xerxes royall pauilion, and that Pericles was the first deuiser and maker of it. Wherefore Cratinus in another place of his comedie he maketh of the Thracians, doth play very pretily vpon him, saying:

Pericles here doth come, Dan Iupiter surnamed, (and onyons hed) which hath in his great noddle finely framed, The plot of Odeon, when he deliuered was from banishment, and daungers deepe, wherein he long did passe.

The Odeon.

Pericles was the first that made maruellous earnest labour to the people that they would make an order, that on the day of the feast called Panathenæa, they would set vp games for musicke. And he him selfe being chosen ruler of these games, as iudge to reward the best deseruer: ordained the manner the musitians should euer after keepe in their singing, playing on their flutes, or vpon the citherne, or other instruments of musicke. So the first games that euer were for musicke, were kept within the Odeon: and so were the other after them also, euer celebrated there. The gate and entring into the castle was made and finished within the space of fiue yeres, vnder the charge of Menesicles, that was master of the workes. And whilest these gates were a building, there happened a wonderfull chaunce, which declared very well that the goddesse Minerua did not mislike the building, but that it pleased her maruellously. For one of the most painefullest workemen that wrought there, fell by mischaunce from the height of the castle to the ground, which fall did so sore bruse him, and he was so sicke withall, that the phisitians and surgeons had no hope of his life. Pericles being very sory for his mischaunce, the goddesse appeared to him in his sleepe in the night, and taught him a medicine, with the which he did easily heale the poore brused man, and that in short time. And this was the occasion why he caused the image of the goddesse Minerua (otherwise called of health) to be cast in brasse, and set vp within the temple of the castle, neere vnto the altar which was there before, as they say. But the golden image of Minerua was made by Phidias, and grauen round about the base: Who had the charge in manner of all other workes, and by reason of the good will Pericles bare him, he commaunded all the other workemen. And this made the one to be greatly enuied, and the other to be very ill spoken of. For their enemies gaue it out abroad, that Phidias receiued the gentlewomen of the citie into his house, vnder colour to goe see his workes, and did conuey them to Pericles. Vpon this brute, the Co-

The Poets raise vp slanders against Pericles micall poets taking occasion, did cast out many slaunderous speeches against Pericles, accusing him that he kept one Menippus wife, who was his friend and lieutenant in the warres, and burdened him further, that Pyrilampes, one of his familiar friends also, brought vp fowles & specially peacocks, which he secretly sent vnto the women that Pericles kept. But we must not wonder at these Satyres, that make profession to speake slaunderously against all the worlde, as it were to sacrifice the iniuries and wronges they cast vpon honorable and good men, to the spight and enuie of the people, as vnto wicked spirites: considering that Stesimbrotus THASIAN durst falsely accuse Pericles of detestable incest, and of abusing his owne sonnes wife. And this is the reason, in my opinion, why it is so hard a matter to come to the perfect knowledge of the truth of auncient things, by the monuments of historiographers: considering long processe of time, doth vtterly obscure the truth of matters, done in former times. For euery written historie speaking of men that are aliue, and of the time of things whereof it maketh mention: sometime for hate and enuie, sometime for fauour or flatterie doth disguise and corrupt the trueth. But Pericles perceiuing that the orators of Thucydides faction, in their common orations did still crie out vpon him, that he did vainely waste and consume the common treasure, and that he bestowed vpon the workes, all the whole reuenues of the citie: one day when the people were assembled together, before them all hee asked them, if they thought that the cost bestowed were too much. The people aunswered him, a great deale too much. Well, said he then, the charges shalbe mine (if you thinke good) and none of yours: prouided that no mans name be written vpon the workes, but mine onely. When Pericles had saide so, the people cried out aloude, they would none of that (either because that they wondred at the greatnesse of his mind, or els for that they would not giue him the onely honour and praise to haue done so sumptuous and stately workes) but willed him that he should see them ended at the common charges, without sparing for any cost. But in the end, falling out openly with Thucydides, and putting it to an aduenture which of them should banish other, with the banishment of Ostracismon: Pericles got the vpper hand, and banished Thucydides out of the citie, & therewithall also ouerthrew the contrarie faction against him. Now when he had rooted out all factions, and brought the citie againe to vnitie & concord, he found then the whole power of ATHENS in his hands, and all the ATHENIANS matters at his disposing. And hauing all the treasure, armour, gallyes, the Iles, and the sea, and a marueullous seigniorie and Kingdome (that did enlarge it selfe partly ouer the GRECIANS, and partly ouer the barbarous people) so well fortified and strengthened with the obedience of nations subiect vnto them, with the friendship of Kings, and with the alliance of diuers other

Princes and mightie Lords: then from that time forward he beganne to change his manner, and from that he was wont to be toward the people, and not so easily to graunt to all the peoples willes and desires, no more then as it were to contrarie windes. Furthermore he altered his ouer gentle and popular manner of gouernment which he vsed vntill that time, as too delicate & too effeminate an harmony of musicke, and did conuert it vnto an imperious gouernment, or rather to a kingly authoritie: but yet held still a direct course, and kept himselfe euer vpright without fault, as one that did, said, and counselled that, which was most expedient for the common weale. He many times brought on the people by perswasions and reasons to be willing to graunt that he preferred vnto them: but many times also, he draue them to it by force, and made them against their wils doe that, which was best for them. Following therein the deuise of a wise phisitian: who in a long and chaungeable disease, doth graunt his patient sometime to take his pleasure of a thing he liketh, but yet after a moderate sort: and another time also, he doth giue him a sharpe or bitter medicine that doth vexe him, though it heale him. For as it falleth out commonly vnto people that enioy so great an empire: many times misfortunes doe chaunce, that fill them full of sundry passions, the which Pericles alone could finely steere and gouerne with two principall rudders, feare, and hope: brideling with the one, the fierce and insolent rashnes of the common people in prosperitie, and with the other comforting their griefe and discouragement in aduersitie. Wherin he manifestly proued which are as ſtoppes and ſoundes of the ſoule, that would be plaide vpon with a fine fingered hand of a cunning maiſter. All which, not the force of his eloquence only brought to paſſe, as Thucidides witneſſeth: but the reputation of his life, and the opinion and confidence they had of his great worthines, becauſe he would not any way be corrupted with gifts, neither had he any couetouſnes in him. For, when he had brought his city not onely to be great, but exceeding great and wealthy, and had in power and authority exceeded many Kings and tyraunts, yea euen thoſe which by their wils and teſtaments might haue left great poſſeſſions to their children: he neuer for all that encreaſed his fathers goods and patrimony left him, the value of a grote in ſiluer. And yet the hiſtoriographer Thucydides doth ſet forth plainely enough, the greatnes of his power. And the Comicall poets alſo of that time doe report it maliciouſly vnder couert words, calling his familiar friends, the new Piſiſtratides: ſaying, how they muſt make him ſweare and proteſt he would neuer be King, giuing vs thereby to vnderſtand, that his authority was too exceeding great for a popular gouernment. And Teleclides (amongeſt other) ſayeth that the ATHENIANS had put into his hands the reuenue of the towns and cities vnder their obedience, and the townes them ſelues, to binde the one, and to loſe the other, and to pull downe their wals, or to build them againe at his pleaſure. They gaue him power, to make peace and alliance: they gaue all their force, treaſure, and authority, and all their goods wholly into his handes. But this was not for a litle while, nor in a geere of fauour, that ſhould continue for a time: but this held out forty yeares together, he being alwaies the chiefe of his city amongſt the Ephialtes, the Leocrates, the Mironides, the Cimons, the Tolmides, and the Thucydides. For after he had preuailed againſt Thucydides, and had baniſhed him: he yet remained chiefe aboue all other, the ſpace of fifteene years. Thus hauing attained a regall dignity to cõmaund all, which continued as aforeſaid, where no other captaines authority endured but one yeare: he euer kept himſelfe vpright from bribes and money, though otherwiſe he was no ill husband, and could warely looke to his owne. As for his landes and goods left him by his parents, that they miſcaried not by negligence, nor that they ſhould trouble him much, in buſying himſelfe to reduce them to a value: he did ſo husband them, as he thought was his beſt and eaſieſt way. For he ſold in groſſe euer the whole yeares profite and commodity of his landes, and afterwardes ſent to the market dayly to buie the cates, and other ordinary prouiſion of houſhold. This did not like his ſonnes that were men growen, neither were his women contented with it, who would haue had him more liberal in his houſe, for they complained of his ouerhard and ſtraight ordinary, becauſe in ſo noble and great a houſe as his, there was neuer any great remaine left of meate, but all things receiued into the houſe, ranne vnder accompt, and were deliuered out by proportion. All this good husbandry of his, was kept vpright in this good order, by one Euangelus, Steward of his houſe, a man very honeſt and skilfull in ordering his houſhold prouiſion: and whether Pericles had brought him vp to it, or that he had it by nature, it was not vnknowen. But theſe things were farre contrary to Anaxagoras wiſedome. For he deſpiſing the world, and caſting his affection on heauenly things: did willingly forſake his houſe, and ſuffered all his lande to runne to layes and to paſture. But (in my opinion) great is the diuerſity betweene a contemplatiue life, and a ciuill life. For the one employeth all his time vpon the ſpeculation of good and honeſt things: and to attaine to that, he thinketh he hath no neede of any exteriour helpe or inſtrument. The other applying all his time vpon vertue, to the common profit and benefit of men: he thinketh that he needeth riches, as an inſtrument not onely neceſſary, but alſo honeſt. As, looke vppon the example of Pericles: who did relieue many poore people. And Anaxagoras ſpecially among other: of whom it is reported, that Pericles being occupied about matters of ſtate at that time, hauing no leyſure to thinke vpon Anaxagoras, he ſeeing himſelfe old and forſaken of the world, laid him downe, and couered his head cloſe, determining to ſtarue himſelfe to death with hunger. Pericles vnderſtanding this, ranne preſently to him as a man halfe caſt away, and praide him as earneſtly as he could, that hee would diſpoſe him ſelfe to liue, being not onely ſory for him, but for him ſelfe alſo, that he ſhould loſe ſo faithfull and wiſe a counſeller, in matters of ſtate and gouernment. Then Anaxagoras ſhewed his face, and told him: O Pericles, thoſe that will ſee by the light of a lampe, muſt put oile to it, to make the light burne. Now beganne the

LACEDÆMONIANS to grow iealous, of the greatnes of the ATHENIANS, wherfore Pericles to make the ATHENIANS hearts greater, and so draw their mindes to great enterprises: set downe an order they should send ambassadours to perswade all the GRECIANS (in what part soeuer they dwelt in EVROPE, or ASIA, as well the litle as the great cities) to send their deputies vnto ATHENS, to the generall assembly that should be holden there, to take order for the temples of the goddes which the barbarous people had burnt, and touching the sacrifices they had vowed for the preseruation of GREECE, when they gaue battel vpon them: and touching sea matters also, that euery man might saile in safety where he would, and that al might liue together in good peace and loue, one with another. To perform this commission, twenty persons were sent of this ambasiate, euery one of them being fifty yeares of age and vpward. Whereof fiue of them went to the DORIANS, dwelling in ASIA, and to the inhabitants of the Iles, euen vnto the Iles of LESBOS, & of the RHODES. Fiue other went through all the country of HELLESPONT, and of THRACIA, vnto the city of BIZANTIVM. Other fiue were comanded to go into BOEOTIA, into PHOCIDES, & through all PELOPONNESVS, and from thence by the countrey of the LOCRIANS, into the vpland countrey adioyning to it, vntil they came into the countrey of ACARNANIA, and of AMBRACIA. And the other fiue went first into the Ile of EVBOEA, and from thence vnto the OETÆIANS, and through all the gulfe of MALEA, vnto the PHTIOTES, vnto the ACHAIANS, and the THESSALIANS: declaring to all the people where the came, the ATHENIANS commission, perswading them to send vnto ATHENS, and to be present at the counsell which should be holden there, for the pacification and vnion of all GREECE. But when all came to all, nothing was done, and the sayd cities of GREECE did not assemble, by practise of the LACEDÆMONIANS (as it is reported) who were altogether the let: for the first refusall that was made of their summons, was at PELOPONNESVS. This haue I written to make Pericles noble corage to be knowen, and how profound a wise man he shewed him selfe vnto the world. Furthermore, when he was chosen generall in the warres, he was much esteemed, because he euer tooke great regard to the safety of his souldiers. For by his good will he would neuer hazard battell, which he saw might fall out doubtfull, or in any thing daungerous: and moreouer, he neuer praysed them for good generals, neither would he follow them that had obtained great victories by hazard, howsoeuer other did esteeme or commend them. For he was wont to say, that if none but him selfe did leade them to the shambles, as much as lay in him, they should be immortall. And when he saw Tolmides, the sonne of Tolmæus (trusting to his former victories, & the praise and commendation of his good seruice) did prepare vpon no occasion, and to no purpose, to enter into the countrey of BOEOTIA, and had procured also a thousand of the lustiest and most valiant men of the city, to be contented to goe with him in that iourney, ouer and aboue the rest of the army he had leauied: he went about to turne him from his purpose, and to keepe him at home, by many perswasions he vsed to him before the peoples face, and spake certaine wordes at that time, that were remembred long after, and these they were. That if he would not beleeue Pericles counsell, yet that he would tary time at the least, which is the wisest counseller of men. These wordes were pretily liked at that present time. But within few dayes after, when newes was brought that Tolmides selfe was slaine in a battell he had lost, neare vnto the city of CORONEA, wherein perished also, many other honest and valiant men of ATHENS: his words spoken before, did then greatly encrease Pericles reputation and good will with the common people, because he was taken for a wise man, and one that loued his citizens. But of all his iourneis he made, being generall ouer the army of the ATHENIANS: the iourney of CHERRONESVS was best thought of and esteemed, because it fell out to the great benefit and preseruation of al the GRECIANS inhabiting in that country. For besides that he brought thither a thousand citizens of ATHENS to dwell there (in which doing he strengthned the citie with so many good men) he did fortifie the barre also, which did let it from being of an Ile, with a fortification he drew from one sea to another: so that he defended the countrey against all the inuasions and piracies of the THRACIANS inhabiting there abouts, and deliuered it of extreame warre, with the wich it was plagued before, by the barbarous people their neighbours, or dwelling amongest them, who onely liued vpon piracy and robbing on the seas.

was he likewiſe much honored and eſteemed of ſtrangers, when he did enuironne all PELOPONNESVS, departing out of the hauen of PEGES, on the coaſt of MEGARA, with a fleet of a hundred gallies For he did not only ſpoile the towns all alongſt the ſea ſide, as Tolmides had done before him: but going vp further into the maine land, farre from the ſea, with his ſouldiers he had in the gallies, he draue ſome of them to retire within their walles, he made them ſo afraid of him: and in the country of NEMEA, he ouercame the SICYONIANS in battell, that taried him in the field, and did erect a piller for a notable marke of his victory. And imbarking in his ſhippes a new ſupply of ſouldiers which he tooke vp in ACHAIA, being friends with the ATHENIANS at that time: he paſſed ouer to the firme land that lay directly againſt it. And pointing beyond the mouth of the riuer of Achelous, he inuaded the countrey of ACHARNANIA, where he ſhut vp the OENEADES within their walles. And after he had laide waſt and deſtroyed all the champion countrey, he returned home againe to ATHENS: hauing ſhewed him ſelfe in this iourney, a dreadfull captaine to his enemies, and very carefull for the ſafety of his ſouldiers. For there fell out no manner of misfortune all this iourney (by chaunce or otherwiſe) vnto the ſouldiers vnder his charge. And afterwardes, going with a great nauy maruellous well appointed vnto the realme of PONTVS, he did there gently vſe and intreate the cities of GREECE, and graunted them all that they required of him: making the barbarous people inhabiting thereabouts, and the Kings and Princes of the ſame alſo, to know the great force & power of the ATHENIANS, who ſailed without feare all about wher they though: good, keeping all the coaſtes of the ſea vnder their obedience. Furthermore, he left with the SINOPIANS thirteene gallies, with certaine number of ſouldiers vnder captaine Lamachus, to defend them againſt the tyraunt Timeſileus: who being expulſed and driuen away with thoſe of his faction, Pericles cauſed proclamation to be made at ATHENS, that ſixe hundred free men of the city, that had any deſire to go, without compulſion, might goe dwell at SINOPA, where they ſhould haue deuided among them, the goods and lands of the tyraunt and his followers. But he did not follow the fooliſh vaine humors of his citizens, nor would not yeelde to their vnſatiable couetouſneſſe, who being ſet on a iolity to ſee them ſelues ſo ſtrong, and of ſuch a power, and beſides, to haue good lucke, would needs once againe attempt to conquer EGYPT, and to reuolte all the countries vpon the ſea coaſts, from the empire of the king of PERSIA: for there were many of them whoſe mindes were maruellouſly bent to attempt the vnfortunat enterpriſe of entring SICILIA, which Alcibiades afterwards did much pricke forward. And ſome of them dreamed beſides, of the conqueſt of THVSCAN, and the empire of CARTHAGE. But this was not altogether without ſome likelihood, nor without occaſion of hope, conſidering the large boundes of their Kingdome, and the fortunat eſtate of their affaires, which fell out according to their owne deſire. But Pericles did hinder this going out, and cut off altogether their curious deſire, employing the moſt part of their power and force, to keepe that they had already gotten: iudging it no ſmall matter to keepe downe the LACEDÆMONIANS from growing greater. For he was alwaies an enemy to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he ſhewed him ſelfe in many things, but ſpecially in the warre he made, called the holy warre. For the LACEDÆMONIANS hauing put the PHOCIANS from the charge of the temple of Apollo, in the city of DELPHES, which they had vſurped, and hauing reſtored the DELPHIANS again vnto the ſame: ſo ſoone as they were gone thence, Pericles went alſo with another army, and reſtored the PHOCIANS in again. And whereas the LACEDÆMONIANS had cauſed to be grauen in the forehead of a Wolfe of braſſe, the priuiledge the DELPHIANS had graunted them, to be the firſt that ſhould make their demaundes of the oracle: he hauing attained the like priuiledge of the PHOCIANS, made his image alſo to be grauen on the right ſide of the ſame image, of the braſen Wolfe. Now how wiſely Pericles did gouerne GREECE by the power of the ATHENIANS, his deedes doe plainely ſhew. For firſt of all, the countrey of EVBOEA did rebell, againſt whom he brought the army of the ATHENIANS. And ſodainly in the necke of that, came newes from another coaſt, that the MEGARIANS alſo were in armes againſt them: and how they were already entred into the countrey of ATTICA with a great army, ledde by Piſtonax King of LACEDÆMON. This occaſion drew him homeward againe, and ſo he marched backe with ſpeede into his countrey, to make preparation to encounter his enemies, that were already entred into the territories of ATTICA. He durſt not offer them battell, being ſo great a number of valiant ſouldiers: but hearing that king Plistonax was yet but a young man, and was ruled altogether by Cleandrides counſell and direction (whom the Ephores had placed about him to counſell & direct him) he ſought priuily to corrupt Cleandrides. When he had won him ſoone with his money, he perſwaded him to draw backe the PELOPONNESIANS out of their country of ATTICA: and ſo he did. But when the LACEDÆMONIANS ſaw their army caſſed, and that the people were gone their way, euery man to his owne city or towne: they were ſo mad at it, that the King was condemned in a great ſumme. The king being vnable to anſwer his fine, which was ſo extreame great: he was driuen to abſent himſelf from LACEDÆMON. Cleandrides on the other ſide, if he had not fled in time, euen for ſpite had bene condemned to death. This Cleandrides was Gylippus father that afterwards ouercame the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, in whom it ſemed nature bred couetouſnes, as a diſeaſe inheritable by ſucceſſion from the father to the ſonne. For he being ſhamefully conuicted alſo, for certaine vile parts he had plaide, was likewiſe baniſhed from SPARTA as we haue more amply declared in the life of Lyſander. And Pericles deliuering vp the accounts of his charge, and ſetting downe an article of the expenſe of tenne talents he had employed or ſhould employ in needefull cauſes: the people allowed them him, neuer asking queſtion how, nor which way, nor whether it was true that they were beſtowed. Now there are certaine writers (among whom the philoſopher Theophraſtus is one) who write that Pericles sent yearly vnto SPARTA ten talents, with the which he entertained thoſe that were in authority there, becauſe they ſhould make no wars with them: not to buie peace of them, but time, that he might in the meane ſeaſon, with better commodity, and that leyſure, prouide to maintain the wars. After that, as the army of the PELOPONNESIANS were out of the countrey of ATTICA, he returned againe againſt the rebels, and paſſed into the Ile of EVBOEA with fifty ſayles and fiue thouſand footemen well armed: and there he ouercame all the cities that had taken armes againſt him, and draue away the Hyppobotes, who were the moſt famous men of all the CHALCIDIANS, as well for their riches, as for their valiauntnes. He draue away alſo all the HESTIÆIANS, whom he chaſed cleane out of all the countrey, and placed in their city, only the citizens of ATHENS. And the cauſe why he dealt ſo rigorouſly with them was, becauſe they hauing taken a galley of the ATHENIANS priſoner, had put all the men to death that were in her. And peace being concluded afterwards betweene the ATHENIANS and LACEDÆMONIANS for thirty yeares: he proclaimed open wars againſt thoſe of the Ile of SAMOS, burdening them, that they being commaunded by the ATHENIANS, to pacifie the quarrell which they had againſt the MILESIANS, they would not obay. But becauſe ſome holde opinion, that he tooke vppon him this warre againſt SAMOS, for the loue of Aſpaſia: it ſhall be no great digreſſion of our ſtory, to tell you by the way, what manner of woman ſhe was, and what a maruellous gift and power ſhe had, that ſhe could entangle with her loue the chiefe rulers and gouernours at that time of the common weale, & that the philoſophers themſelues did ſo largely ſpeake and write of her. Firſt of all, it is certaine that ſhe was borne in the city MILETVM, and was the daughter of one Axiochus: ſhe following the ſteppes and example of an old curtiſan of IONIA, called Thargelia, gaue her ſelfe only to entertaine the greateſt perſons and chiefeſt rulers in her time. For this Thargelia being paſſing faire, and carying a comely grace with her, hauing a ſharpe wit and pleaſaunt tongue: ſhe had the acquaintaunce and friendſhippe of the greateſt perſons of all GREECE, and wanne all thoſe that did haunt her company, to be at the king of Perſiaes commaundement. So that ſhe ſowed through all the cities of GREECE, great beginnings of the faction of the MEDES: for they were the great men of power and authority of euery city that were acquainted with her. But as for Aſpaſia, ſome ſay that Pericles reſorted vnto her, becauſe ſhe was a wiſe woman, and had great vnderſtanding in matters of ſtate and gouernment. For Socrates himſelfe went to ſee her ſometime with his friends: and thoſe that vſed her company alſo, brought their wiues many times with them to heare her talke: though her traine about her were to entertaine ſuch as would warme them by their fire. Æſchines writeth, that Lyſicles a grafier, being before but a meane man, and of a clubbiſh nature, came to be the chiefe man of ATHENS, by frequenting the compa-

Aſpaſia, after the death of Pericles. And to Platoes booke intituled Menexenus, although the beginning of it be but pleaſantly written, yet in that, this ſtorie is written truely: that this Aſpaſia was repaired vnto by diuers of the ATHENIANS, to learne the art of rethorike of her. Yet notwithſtanding it ſeemeth moſt likely that the affection Pericles did beare her, grew rather of loue, then of any other cauſe. For he was maried vnto a kinſewoman of his owne, and that before was Hipponicus wife, by whom ſhe had Callias, ſurnamed the rich: and had afterwards by Pericles, Xantippus and Paralus. But not liking her company, he gaue her with her owne good will and conſent vnto another, and maried Aſpaſia whom he dearely loued. For euer when he went abroad, and came home againe, he ſaluted her with a kiſſe. Whereupon in the auncient comedies, ſhe is called in many places, the new Omphale, and ſometimes Deianira, and ſometimes Iuno. But Cratinus plainely calleth her whore in theſe verſes:

Callias the rich

Pericles maried Aſpaſia the famous curtiſan.

His Iuno ſhe him brought, Aſpaſia by name, which was in deede an open whore, and paſt all kind of ſhame.

And it ſeemeth that he had a baſtard: for Eupolis in a comedie of his called Demoſij, bringeth him in, asking Pironides thus:

I pray thee: is my baſtard ſonne yet aliue?

And then Pyronides anſwered him:

A perfect man long ſince, he ſurely had bene found, if that this lewde and naughtie whore, his vertue had not drownd.

To conclude, this Aſpaſia was ſo famous, that Cyrus (he that fought againſt king Artaxerxes his brother, for the empire of PERSIA) called Aſpaſia his beſt beloued of all his concubines, which before was called Milito, & was borne in PHOCIDES, being Hermotimus daughter. And Cyrus being ſlaine in the field, Aſpaſia was caried to the King his brother, with whom afterwards ſhe was in great fauour. As I was writing this life, this ſtorie came in my minde: and me thought I ſhould haue dealt hardly, if I ſhould haue left it vnwritten. But to our matter againe. Pericles was charged that he made warres againſt the SAMIANS, on the behalfe of the MILESIANS, at the requeſt of Aſpaſia: for theſe two cities were at warres together, for the citie of PRIENA, but the SAMIANS were the ſtronger. Now the ATHENIANS commanded them to lay a ſide their armes, and to come and pleade their matter before them, that the right might be decided: but they refuſed it vtterly. Wherefore Pericles went thither and tooke away the gouernment of the ſmall number of Nobilitie, taking for hoſtages, fiftie of the chiefeſt men of the citie, and ſo many children beſides, which he left to be kept in the Ile of LEMNOS. Some ſay euery one of theſe hoſtages offered to giue him a talent: and beſides thoſe, many other offered him the like, ſuch as would not haue the ſoueraigne authoritie put into the hands of the people. Moreouer Piſſuthnes the PERSIAN, lieutenant to the King of PERSIA, for the good will he bare thoſe of SAMOS, did ſend Pericles ten thouſand crownes to releaſe the hoſtages. But Pericles neuer tooke pennie: and hauing done that he determined at SAMOS, and eſtabliſhed a popular gouernment, he returned againe to ATHENS. Notwithſtanding, the SAMIANS rebelled immediatly after, hauing recouered their hoſtages againe by meanes of this Piſſuthnes that ſtale them away, and did furniſhe them alſo with all their munition of warre. Whereupon Pericles returning againſt them once more, hee found them not idle, nor amazed at his comming, but reſolutely determined to receiue him, and to fight for the ſeigniorie by ſea. So there was a great battell fought betweene them, neare the Ile of TRACIA. And Pericles wanne the battell: hauing with foure and fortie ſaile only nobly ouercome his enemies, which were three ſcore and ten in number, whereof twenty of them were ſhips of warre. And ſo following his victorie forthwith, he wan alſo the port of SAMOS, and kept the SAMIANS beſieged within their owne citie: where they were yet ſo bolde, as they would make ſalies out many times, and fight before the walles of the citie. But when there arriued a new ſupplie of ſhippes bringing a greater aide vnto Pericles: then were they ſhut vp of all ſides. Pericles then taking three ſcore gallies with him, launched out into the ſea, with intent (as ſome ſay) to goe meete certaine ſhippes of the PHOENICIANS (that came to aide the SAMIANS) as farre from SAMOS as he could: or as Steſimbrotus ſayeth, to goe into CYPRVS, which me thinketh is not true. But whatſoeuer was his intent, he committed a foule fault. For Meliſſus a philoſopher, generall of the Samians.

Meliſſus (the ſonne of Ithagenes, a great Philoſopher) being at that time generall of the SAMIANS: perceiuing that fewe ſhippes were left behinde at the ſiege of the citie, and that the captaines alſo that had the charge of them were no very expert men of warre, perſwaded his citizens to make a ſalie vpon them. Whereupon they fought a battell, and the SAMIANS ouercame: the ATHENIANS were taken priſoners, and they ſuncke many of their ſhippes. Now they being lordes againe of the ſea, did furniſh their citie with all manner of munition for warres, whereof before they had great want. Yet Ariſtotle writeth that Pericles ſelfe was once ouercome in a battell by ſea by Meliſſus. Furthermore the SAMIANS, to be euen with the ATHENIANS for the iniurie they had receiued of them before: did brande them in the forehead with the ſtampe of an owle, the owle being then the ſtampe of their coyne at ATHENS, euen as the ATHENIANS had branded the SAMIAN priſoners before with the ſtampe of Samæna. This Samæna is a kinde of a ſhippe amongeſt the SAMIANS, low afore, and wide laide out in the midde ſhippe, ſo that it is excellent good to riſe with the waues of the ſea, and is verie ſwift vnder ſaile: and it was ſo called, becauſe the firſt ſhippe that was made of this faſhion, was made in the Ile of SAMOS, by the tyrant Polycrates. It is ſaid that the Poet Ariſtophanes, couertly conueying the ſtampe of the SAMIANS, ſpeaking merily in a place of his comedies ſaieth:

The Samians are great learned men.

The wittie ſaying of Ariſtophanes of the Samians.

Pericles being aduertiſed of the ouerthrowe of his armie, returned preſently to the reſcue. Meliſſus went to meete him, and gaue him battell: but he was ouerthrowne, and driuen backe into his citie, where Pericles walled them in round about the citie, deſiring victorie rather by time and charge, then by danger, and loſſe of his ſouldiers. But when he ſawe that they were wearie with tract of time, and that they would bring it to hazard of battell, and that he could by no meanes withholde them: he then deuided his armie into eight companies, whom he made to drawe lots, and that companie that lighted on the white beane, they ſhould be quiet and make good cheere, while the other ſeauen fought. And they ſay that from thence it came that when any haue made good cheere, and taken pleaſure abroade, they do yet call it a white day, becauſe of the white beane. Ephorus the hiſtoriographer writeth, that it was there, where firſt of all they began to vſe engines of warre to plucke downe great walles, and that Pericles vſed firſt this wonderfull inuention: and that Artemon an engineer was the firſt deuiſer of this. He was caried vp and downe in a chaire, to ſet forward theſe workes, becauſe he had a lame legge: and for this cauſe he was called Periphoretos. But Heraclides Ponticus confuteth Ephorus therein, by the verſes of Anacreon, in the which Artemon is called Periphoretas, many yeares before this warre of SAMOS began: and ſaieth this Periphoretos was a maruellous tender man, and ſo foolihly afeard of his owne ſhadowe, that the moſt part of his time he ſtirred not out of his houſe, and did ſit alwaies hauing two of his men by him, that held a copper pot ouer his head, for feare leaſt any thing ſhould fall vpon him. And if vpon any occaſion he were driuen to go abroad out of his houſe: he would be caried in a litle bed hanging neare the ground, and for this cauſe he was ſurnamed Periphoretos. At the laſt, at nine moneths end the SAMIANS were compelled to yeelde. So Pericles tooke the city, and raſed their walles to the ground: he brought their ſhippes away, and made them pay a maruellous great tribute, whereof part he receiued in hand, and the reſt payable at a certaine time, taking hoſtages with him for aſſurance of payment. But Duris the SAMIAN dilateth theſe matters maruellous pitifully, burdening the ATHENIANS, and Pericles ſelfe with vnnaturall cruelty: whereof neither Heraclides, nor Ephorus, nor Ariſtotle himſelfe maketh mention. And ſure I cannot beleeue that is written. That he brought the captaines of the gallies, and the ſouldiers them ſelues of SAMIA, into the market place of the city of MILETVM, where he made them to be bound faſt vnto bordes for the ſpace of tenne daies, and at the end of the ſame, the poore men that were dead, were beaten downe with clubbes, and their heads paſhed in peeces: and afterwards he threw out their bodies to the crowes, & would not burie them. So Duris being accuſtomed to ouerreach, and to lie many times in things nothing touching him: ſeemeth in this place to haue all reaſon to aggraiate the calamities of his countrey, only to accuſe the ATHENIANS, and to make them odious to the world. Pericles hauing won the citie of SAMOS, he returned a-

to ATHENS, where he did honorably burie the bones of his slaine citizens in this warre: and himselfe (according to their manner & custome) made the funerall oration, for the which he was maruellously esteemed. In such sort, that after he came downe from the pulpit where he made his oration: the ladies & gentlewomen of the citie came to salute him, & brought him garlands to put vpon his head, as they do to noble conquerers when they return from games, where they haue wonne the price. But Elpinicé cõming to him, said, Surely Pericles, thy good seruice done, deserueth garlands of triumph: for thou hast lost vs many a good and valiant citizen, not fighting with the MEDES, the PHOENICIANS, and with the barbarous people as my brother Cimon did, but for destroying a citie of our owne nation and kinred. Pericles to these wordes, softly answered Elpinicé, with Archilochus verse, smyling: Elpinice.

But Ion writeth, that he greatly gloried, and stood much in his owne conceipt, after hee had subdued the SAMIANS, saying: Agamemnon was tenne yeares taking of a citie of the barbarous people: and he in nine monethes only had wonne the strongest citie of the whole nation of IONIA. In deede he had good cause to glorie in his victorie: for truely (if Thucydides report be true) his conquest was no lesse doubtfull, then he found it daungerous. For the SAMIANS had almost bene lordes of the sea, and taken the seigniorie thereof from the ATHENIANS. After this, the warres of PELOPONNESVS being whotte againe, the CORINTHIANS inuading the Ilanders of CORPHV: Pericles did perswade the ATHENIANS to send aide vnto the CORPHIANS, and to ioyne in league with that Iland, which was of great power by sea, saying: that the PELOPONNESIANS (before it were long) would haue warre with them. The ATHENIANS consented to his motion, to aide those of CORPHV. Whereupon they sent thither Lacedæmonius (Cimons sonne) with ten galleys onely for a mockerie: for all Cimons familie and friends, were wholly at the LACEDÆMONIANS deuotion. Therefore did Pericles cause Lacedæmonius to haue so fewe ships deliuered him, and further, sent him thither against his will, to the end that if he did no notable exploite in this seruice, that they might then the more iustly suspect his goodwill to the LACEDÆMONIANS. Moreouer whilest he liued, he did euer what he could to keepe Cimons children backe from rising: because that by their names they were no naturall borne ATHENIANS, but strangers. For the one was called Lacedæmonius, the other Thessalus, and the third Elius: and the mother to all them three, was an ARCADIAN woman borne. But Pericles being blamed for that he sent but ten galleys onely, which was but a slender aide for those that had requested him, and a great matter to them that spake ill of him: he sent thither afterwards a great number of other galleys, which came when the battell was fought. But the CORINTHIANS were maruellous angry, and went & complained to the counsel of the LACEDÆMONIANS, where they laide open many grieuous complaints and accusations against the ATHENIANS, and so did the MEGARIANS also: alledging that the ATHENIANS had forbidden them their hauēs, their staples, and all traffick of marchandise in the territories vnder their obedience, which was directly against the common lawes, and articles of peace, agreed vpon by oth among all the GRECIANS. Moreouer the ÆGINETES finding themselues very ill and cruelly handled, did send secretely to make their mone and complaints to the LACEDÆMONIANS, being afraid openly to complaine of the ATHENIANS. While these things were a doing, the citie of POTIDÆA, subiect at that time vnto the ATHENIANS (and was built in old time by the CORINTHIANS) did rebell, and was besieged by the ATHENIANS, which did hasten on the warres. Notwithstanding this, ambassadors were first sent vnto ATHENS vpon these complaints, and Archidamus, king of the LACEDÆMONIANS, did all that he could to pacifie the most part of these quarrels and complaints, intreating their friends and allies. So as the ATHENIANS had had no warres at all, for any other matters wherewith they were burdened, if they would haue graunted to haue reuoked the decree they had made against the MEGARIANS. Whereupon, Pericles, that aboue all other stood most against the reuocation of that decree, & that did stur vp the people, & made them stand to that they had once decreed, and ordered, against the MEGARIANS: was thought the originall cause and author of the PELOPONNESIAN warres. For it is saide that the LACEDÆMONIANS sent ambassadours vnto ATHENS for that matter Cimons sonnes. The Athenians accused at Lacedæmon. Pericles author of the warres against Peloponnesus.

only. And when Pericles alledged a law, that did forbid them to take away the table whereupon before time had bene written any cõmon law or edict: Polyarces, one of the LACEDÆMONIANS ambassadours, said vnto him. Well, said he, take it not away then, but turne the table once your law I am sure forbiddeth not that. This was pleasantly spoken of the ambassadour, but Pericles could neuer be brought to it for all that. And therefore it seemeth he had some secret occasion of grudge against the MEGARIANS: yet as one that would finely conuey it vnder the common cause and cloke, he tooke from them the holy lands they were breaking vp. For to bring this to passe, he made an order, that they should send an herauld to summone the MEGARIANS to let the land alone, and that the same herauld should goe also vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS to accuse the MEGARIANS vnto them. It is true that this ordinance was made by Pericles meanes, as also it was most iust and reasonable: but it fortuned so, that the messenger that was sent thither died, and not without suspition that the MEGARIANS made him away. Wherefore Charinus made a lawe presently against the MEGARIANS: that they should be proclaimed mortall enemies to the ATHENIANS for euer, without any hope of after reconciliation. And also if any MEGARIAN should once put his foote within the territories of ATTICA, that he should suffer the paines of death. And moreouer, that their captaines taking yearely the ordinarie oth, should sweare among other articles, that twise in the yeare they should go with their power, and destroy some part of the MEGARIANS lande. And lastly, that the herauld Anthemocritus should be buried by the place called then the gates Thriasienes, and now called Dipylon. But the MEGARIANS stoutly denying, that they were any cause of the death of this Anthemocritus: did altogether burthen Aspasia and Pericles with the same, alledging for proofe thereof, Aristophanes verses the Poet, in his comedie he intituled the Acharnes, which are so common, as euery boye hath them at his tongues end.

Pericles malice against the Megarians.

The young men of our land (to dronken bibbing bent) ran out one day vnruilly, and towards Megara went.
From whence in their outrage, by force they tooke away, Simatha noble curtisan, as she did sporte and play.
Wherewith enraged all (with pepper in the nose) the proud Megarians came to vs, as to their mortall foes, And tooke by stelthe away, of harlos eke a paire, attending on Aspasia, which were both young and faire.

But in very deed, to tell the originall cause of this warre, and to deliuer the trothe thereof, it is very hard. But all the historiographers together agree, that Pericles was the chiefe author of the warre: because the decree made against the MEGARIANS, was not reuoked backe againe. Yet some holde opinion, that Pericles did it of a noble minde and iudgement, to be constant in that he thought most expedient. For he iudged that this commaundement of the LACEDÆMONIANS was but a triall, to proue if the ATHENIANS would grant them: and if they yeelded to them in that, then they manifestly shewed that they were the weaker. Other contrarily say, that it was done of a selfe will and arrogancy, to shew his authoritie and power, and how he did despise the LACEDÆMONIANS. But the shrewdest proofe of all that bringeth best authority with it, is reported after this sort. Phidias the image maker (as we haue tolde you before) had vndertaken to make the image of Pallas: and being Pericles friend was in great estimation about him. But that procured him many ill willers. Then they being desirous to heare by him what the people would iudge of Pericles: they intised Menon, one of the worke men that wrought vnder Phidias, and made him come into the market place to pray assurance of the people that he might openly accuse Phidias, for a fault he had committed about Pallas image. The people receiued his obedience, and his accusation was heard openly in the market place, but no mention was made of any theft at all: because that Phidias (through Pericles counsell and deuise) had from the beginning so laide on the gold vppon the image, that it might bee taken off and wayed euery whit. Whereupon Pericles openly said vnto his accusers, take off the gold and waie it. The glorie of his workes did purchase him this enuy. For he hauing graue vpon the scutchiõ of the goddesse, the battell of the AMAZONES, had cut out the portraiture of himselfe maruellous liuely, vnder the perso of old bauld man, lifting vp a great ſtone with both his hands. Further he had cut out Pericles image, excellently wrought & artificially, ſeeming in manner to be Pericles ſelfe, fighting with an AMAZON in this ſort. The AMAZONES hand being lift vp high, holdeth a dart before Pericles face, ſo paſſing cunningly wrought, as it ſeemed to ſhadow the likenes & reſemblance of Pericles: and yet notwithſtanding appeareth plainely to be Pericles ſelfe on either ſide of the portraiture. So Phidias was clapt vp in priſon, and there died of a ſickneſ, or els of poiſon (as ſome ſay) which his enemies had prepared for him: & all to bring Pericles into further ſuſpition, and to giue them the more cauſe to accuſe him. But howſoeuer it was, the people gaue Menon his freedome, and ſet him free for payment of all ſubſidies, following the order Glycon made, and gaue the captaines charge they ſhould ſee him ſafely kept, and that he tooke no hurt. And about the ſame time alſo Aſpaſia was accuſed, that ſhe did not beleeue in the goddes: and her accuſer was Hermippus, maker of the commedies. He burdened her further, that ſhe was a bawde to Pericles, and receiued citizens wiues into her houſe, which Pericles kept. And Diopithes at the ſame time made a decree, that they ſhould make ſearch and enquirie for heretikes that did not beleeue in the goddes, and that taught certaine new doctrine and opinion touching the operations of thinges aboue in the element; turning the ſuſpition vpon Pericles, becauſe of Anaxagoras. The people did receiue and confirme this inquiſition: and it was moued alſo then by Drasontides, that Pericles ſhould deliuer an account of the money he had ſpent, vnto the hands of the Prytanes, who were treaſurers of the common fines and reuenues, and that the iudges deputed to giue iudgement, ſhould giue ſentence within the citie vpon the aultar. But Agnon put that worde out of the decree, and placed in ſtead thereof, that the cauſe ſhould be iudged by the fifteene hundred iudges, as they thought good, if any man brought this action for theft, for batterie, or for iniuſtice. As for Aſpaſia, he ſaued her, euen for the verie pittie and compaſſion the iudges tooke of him, for the teares he ſhed in making his humble ſute for her, all the time he pleaded her caſe: as Æſchines writeth. But for Anaxagoras, fearing that he could not do ſo much for him: he ſent him out of the citie, and himſelfe did accompanie him. And furthermore, ſeeing he had incurred the ill will of the people for Phidias fact, and for this cauſe fearing the iſſue of the iudgement: he ſet the warres a fire againe, that alwaies went backward, and did but ſmoake a litle, hoping by this meanes to weare out the accuſations againſt him, and to roote out the malice ſome did beare him. For the people hauing waightie matters in hand, and very dangerous alſo: he knewe they would put all into his hands alone, he hauing wonne already ſuch great authoritie and reputation among them. And theſe be the cauſes why he would not (as it is ſaid) ſuffer the ATHENIANS to yeeld vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS in any thing: howbeit the truthe cannot certainly be knowne. But the LACEDÆMONIANS knowing well, that if they could weed out Pericles, and ouerthrow him, they might then deale as they would with the ATHENIANS; they commaunded them they ſhould purge their city of Cylons rebellion, becauſe they knew well enough that Pericles kinne by the mothers ſide were to be touched withall, as Thucydides declareth. But this practiſe fell out contrary to their hope and expectation, that were ſent to ATHENS for this purpoſe. For, weening to haue brought Pericles into further ſuſpition and diſpleaſure, the citizens honoured him the more, and had a better affiaunce in him then before, becauſe they ſaw his enemies did ſo much feare and hate him. Wherefore, before king Archidamus entred with the army of the PELOPONNESIANS into the countrey of ATTICA, he told the ATHENIANS, that if king Archidamus fortuned to waſt and deſtroy all the countrey about, and ſhould ſpare his landes and goods for the old loue and familiaritie that was betweene them, or rather to giue his enemies occaſion falſely to accuſe him: that from thenceforth, he gaue all the landes and tenements he had in the countrey, vnto the common wealth. So it fortuned that the LACEDÆMONIANS with all their friendes and confederates, brought a maruellous army into the countrey of ATTICA, vnder the leading of king Archidamus: who burning & ſpoyling all the countrey he came alongeſt, they came vnto the towne of ACHARNES, where they encamped, ſuppoſing the ATHENIANS would neuer ſuffer them to approche ſo neare, but that they would giue them battell for the honor and defence of their countrey, and to ſhew that they were no cowardes. But Pericles wiſely conſidered how the daunger was too great to hazard battell, where the losse of the citie of ATHENS stoode in p rill, seeing they were threescore thousand footmē of the PELOPONNESIANS, & of the Bo TIANS together: for so many was their number in the first voyage they made against the A THENIANS. And as for those that were very desirous to fight, and to put themselues to any ha zard, being mad to see their countrie thus wasted and destroyed before their eyes, Pericles di comfort and pacifie them with these words. That trees being cut and hewen downe, di spring againe in short time: but men being once dead, by no possibilitie could be brought a gaine. Therefore he neuer durst assemble the people in counsell, fearing least he should be in forced by the multitude, to doe something against his will. But as a wise man of a shippe, when he seeth a storme comming on the sea, doth straight giue order to make all things sa the shippe, preparing euery thing ready to defend the storme, according to his arte and skil not harkening to the passengers fearefull cries and pittifull teares, who thinke themselues ea away: euen so did Pericles rule all things according to his wisedome, hauing walled the citi substantially about and set good watch in euery corner: and passed not for those that we angry and offended with him, neither would be perswaded by his friends earnest requests an intreaties, neither cared for his enemies threates nor accusations against him, nor yet reckon ned of all their foolish scoffing songes they sung of him in the citie, to his shame and re proch of gouernement, saying that he was a cowardly captaine, and that for dastardlinesse he let the enemies take all, and spoile what they would. Of which number Cleon was one tha most defamed him, and began to enter into some pretie credit and fauour with the common people, for that they were angrie, and misliked with Pericles: as appeareth by these slanderou verses of Hermippus, which were then abroade:

An excellent comparison to stay the soul diers desire to fight.

Cleon accuseth Pericles.

O King of Satyres thou, who with such manly speache of bloudy warres and doughtie deeds, doost dayly to vs preache: VVhy art thou now afraide, to take thy launce in hand, or with thy pike against thy foes, couragiously to stand?
Synce Cleon stoute and fierce, doth dayly thee prouoke, VVith biting words, with trenchant blades, & deadly daunting stroke.

All these notwithstanding, Pericles was neuer mooued any thing, but with silence did pa ciently beare all iniuries and scoffings of his enemies, and did send for all that a nauie of hundred saile vnto PELOPONNESVS, whither he would not go in person, but kept himself at home, to keepe the people in quiet: vntill such time as the enemies had raised their campe and were gone away. And to entertaine the common people that were offended and angrie at this warre: he comforted the poore people againe, with causing a certaine distribution to be made amongst them of the common treasure, and diuision also of the landes that were got by conquest. For after he had driuen all the ÆGINETES out of their countrie, he caused the whole Ile of ÆGINA to be deuided by lot amongest the citizens of ATHENS. And then it was a great comfort to them in this aduersity, to heare of their enemies hurt and losse in such manner as it did fall out. For their army that was sent by sea vnto PELOPONNESVS had wasted and destroyed a great part of the champion countrey there, and had sacked be sides many small cities and townes. Pericles selfe also entring into the MEGARIANS country by land, did waste the whole countrey al afore him. So the PELOPONNESIANS receiuing by sea as much hurt and losse at the ATHENIANS hands, as they before had done by land vn the ATHENIANS: they had not holden out warres so long with the ATHENIANS, bu would soone haue giuen ouer (as Pericles had told them before) had not the gods abouet cretly hindered mans reason and pollicie. For first of all there came such a sore plague amon the ATHENIANS, that it tooke away the flower of ATHENS youth, and weakened the for of the whole city besides. Furthermore the bodies of them that were left aliue being infecte with this disease, their hearts also were so sharpely bent against Pericles, that the sickenesse ha uing troubled their braines, they fell to flat rebellion against him, as the patient against hi phisitian, or children against their father, euen to the hurting of him, at the prouocation o his enemies. Who bruted abroade, that the plague came of no cause else, but of the great mul hart of the ſommer, where they were compelled to lye many together, ſmothered vp in litle tentes and cabines, remaining there all day long, cowring downewardes, and doing nothing, where before they liued in the countrie in a freſh open ayer, and at liberte. And of all this, (ſay they) Pericles is the only cauſe who procuring this war, hath pent and ſhrowded the countrie men together within the walles of a cittie, employing them to no manner of vſe nor ſeruice, but keeping them like ſheepe in a pinnefold, maketh one to poyſon another with the infection of their plague ſores running vpon them, and giuing them no leaue to chaunge ayer, that they might ſomuch as take breath abroade. Pericles to remedie this, and to do their enemies a litle miſchiefe: armed a 150 ſhippes, and ſhipped into them a great number of armed footemen and horſemen alſo. Hereby he put the cittizens in good hope, and the enemies in great feare, ſeeing ſo great a power. But when he had ſhipped all his men, and was himſelfe alſo in the admirall ready to hoyſe ſayle: ſodainly there was a great eclypſe of the ſunne, and the day was very darke, that all the armie was ſtriken with a maruellous feare, as of ſome daungerous and very ill token towardes them. Pericles ſeing the maſter of his gally in a maſe withall, not knowing what to doe: caſt his cloake ouer the maſters face, and hid his eyes, asking him whether he thought that any harme or no. The maſter aunſwered him, he thought it none, Then ſayed Pericles againe to him. There is no difference betwene this and that, ſauing that the bodye which maketh the darknes is greater, then my cloke which hideth thy eyes. Theſe things are thus diſputed of in the ſchooles of the philoſophers. But Pericles hoiſing ſayle notwithſtanding, did no notable nor ſpeciall ſeruice, aunſwerable to ſo great an armie and preparation. For he laying ſiege vnto the holy cittie of EPIDAVRVM, when euery man looked they ſhould haue taken it, was compelled to rayſe his ſiege for the plague that was ſo vehement: that it did not onely kill the ATHENIANS themſelues, but all other alſo (were they neuer ſo ſewe) that came to them, or neere their campe. Wherefore perceiuing the ATHENIANS were maruellouſly offended with him, he did what he could to comforte them, and put them in hart againe: but all was in vaine, he could not pacifie them. For by the moſt parte of voyces, they depriued him of his charge of generall, and condemned him in a maruellous great fine and ſumme of money, the which thoſe that tell the leaſt do write, that it was the ſumme of fifteene talentes: and thoſe that ſay more, ſpeake of fiftie talentes. The accuſer ſubſcribed in this condemnation, was Cleon, as Idomeneus, or Simmias ſay, or as Theophraſtus writeth: yet Heraclides Ponticus ſayth, one Lacratidas. Now his common griefes were ſoone blowen ouer: for the people dyd eaſely let fall their diſpleaſures towardes him, as the waſpe leaueth her ſting behind her with them ſhee hath ſtong. But his owne priuate affaires and houſehold cauſes were in very ill caſe: both for that the plague had taken awaye many of his friendes and kinſmen from him, as alſo for that he and his houſe had continued a long time in diſgrace. For Xanthippus (Pericles ſonne & heire) being a man of a very ill diſpoſition and nature, and hauing maried a young woman very prodigall and lauiſh of expence, the daughter of Iſander, ſonne of Epilychus: he grudged much at his fathers hardnes, who ſcantly gaue him money and but a litle at a time. Wherupon he ſent on a time to one of his fathers friends in Pericles name, to pray him to lend him ſome money, who ſent it vnto him. But afterwardes when he came to demaund it againe, Pericles did not onely refuſe to paye it him, but further alſo, he put him in ſute. But this made the young man Xanthippus ſo angrie with his father, that he ſpake very ill of him in euery place where hee came: and in mockerie reported how his father ſpent his time when he was at home, and the talke he had with the Sophiſters, and the maſter Rhetoritians. For a miſchaunce fortuning on a time, at the game of the throwing of the darte, who ſhould throwe beſt, that he that threwe, did vnfortunately kill one Epitimius a THESSALIAN: Xanthippus went pratling vp and downe the towne, that his father Pericles was a whole daye diſputing with Protagoras the Rhetoritian, to know which of the three by law and reaſon ſhould be condemned for this murther. The darte: he that threwe the darte: or the deuiſer of the game. Moreouer Steſimbrotus writeth, that the brute that ranne abroade through the cittie, how Pericles did keepe his wife, was ſowen abroade by Xanthippus himſelfe. But ſo it is, this quarrell and hate betwixt the father and the ſonne cõtinued without reconciliation vnto the death. For Xanthippus died in the great plague, and Pericles owne sister also: moreouer he lost at that time by the plague, the more part of his friends and kin folkes, and those specially that did him greatest pleasure in gouerning of the state. But all Pericles constancie. did neuer pull down his countenaunce, nor any thing abate the greatnes of his mind, w misfortunes soeuer he had sustained. Neither saw they him weep at any time, nor mourn the funeralles of any of his kinsmen or friends, but at the death of Paralus, his yonger and l full begotten sonne: for, the losse of him alone did onely melt his hart. Yet he did strive shew his natural constancie, and to keepe his accustomed modestie. But as he would haue a garland of flowers vpon his head, sorrow did so pierce his hart when he saw his face, then he burst out in teares and cryed a mayne: which they neuer saw him doe before: all dayes of his life. Furthermore, the people hauing proued other captaines and gouernors and finding by experience that there was no one of them of iudgment and authoritie suffici for so great a charge: In the end, of themselues they called him againe to the pulpit for ons to heare their counselles, and to the state of a captaine also to take charge of the state. at that time he kept himselfe close in his house, as one bewayling his late grieuous losse sorrowe. Howbeit Alcibiades, and other his familiar friendes, persuaded him to shew h selfe vnto the people: who did excuse themselues vnto him, for their ingratitude towa him. Pericles then taking the gouernment againe vpon him, the first matter he entred was: that he prayed them to reuoke the statute he had made for base borne children, fear least his lawfull heirs would fayle, and so his house & name should fall to the ground. B A lawe at Athens for base borne children. for that law, thus it stood. Pericles whē he was in his best authority, caused a law to be m that they onely should be compted cittizens of ATHENS, which were naturall ATHENI borne by father and mother. Not long time after, it fortuned that the king of EGYPT ha sent a gift vnto the people of ATHENS, of forty thousand bushells of corne, to be distrib among the cittizens there: many by occasion of this lawe were accused to be base bor and specially men of the baser sorte of people, which were not knowne before, or a least had no reckoning made of them, and so some of them were falsely and wrongfully c demned. Whereupon so it fell out that there were no lesse then fiue thousand of th conuicted and solde for slaues: and those that remained as free men, and were iudged w naturall cittizens, amounted to the number of fourteene thousand and fortye persones. N this was much misliked of the people, that a law enacted, and that had beene of such fo should by the selfe same maker and deuiser of the same be againe reuoked and called Howbeit Pericles late calamitie that fortuned to his house, did breake the peoples harde hartes against him. Who thinking these sorrowes smarte, to be punishment enough w him for his former pryde, and iudging that by goddes diuine iustice and permission, t plague and losse fell vpon him, and that his request also was tolerable: they suffered him enrolle his base born sonne in the register of the lawful cittizens of his familie, giuing him owne name, Pericles. It is the selfsame Pericles, who after he had ouercome the PELOPO NESIANS in a great battel by sea, neere vnto the Iles ARGINVSES, was put to death by t tēce of the people, with other captaines his cōpanions. Now was Pericles at that time infe Pericles the the base borne put to death. Pericles sickues. with the plague, but not so vehemētly as other were, rather more tēperately: & by long sp of time, with many alterations & changes, that did by little and little decay and consume strengh of his bodie, and ouercame his sences and noble mind. Therfore Theophrastu his morralles declareth, in a place where he disputeth, whether mens manners doe chan with their misfortunes, and whether corporall troubles and afflictions doe so alter men, t A philosophicall question touching the chaung of mens manners by misfortunes. they forget vertue, and abandon reason: that Pericles in his sicknes shewed a friend of that came to see him, I cannot tel what a preseruing charme the woman hath tyed (as a c kanet) about his necke, to let him vnderstand he was very ill, since he suffered them to ap such a foolish bable to him. In the ende, Pericles drawing fast vnto his death, the Nobl Pericles death. of the cittie, and such his friendes as were left aliue, standing about his bed, beganne to spe of his vertue, and of the great authoritie he had borne, considering the greatnes of his no acts, and counting the number of his victories he had wonne (for he had wonne nine for ten battelles being generall of the ATHENIANS, and had set vp so many tokens and t umphes in honour of his countrie) they reckoned vp among themselues all these matters, he had not vnderſtood them, imagining his ſences had bene gone. But he contrarilie being yet of perfect memorie, heard all what they had ſayed, and thus he beganne to ſpeake vnto them. That he maruelled why they had ſo highly praiſed that in him, which was common to many other captaines, & wherein fortune delt with them in equalitie alike, and all this while they had forgotten to ſpeake of the beſt and moſt notable thing that was in him, which was: that no ATHENIAN had euer worne blacke gowne through his occaſion. And ſure ſo was he a noble and worthie perſon. For he did not onely ſhewe himſelfe mercifull and curteous, euen in moſt weightie matters of gouernment, among ſo enuious people and hatefull enemies: but he had this iudgment alſo to thinke, that the moſt noble actes he did were theſe, that he neuer gaue himſelfe vnto hatred, enuie, nor choller, to be reuenged of his moſt mortall enemie, without mercy ſhewed towardes him, though he had committed vnto him ſuch abſolute power and ſole gouernment among them. And this made his ſurname to be Olympius (as to ſaye, diuine or celeſtiall) which otherwiſe for him had bene too prowde and arrogant a name, becauſe he was of ſo good and gentle a nature, and for that in ſo great libertie he had kept cleane handes and vndefiled: euen as we eſteeme the goddes authors of all good, and cauſers of no euill, and ſo worthie to gouerne and rule the whole monarchie of the world. And not as Poets ſay, which do confound our wittes by their follies, and fond fayninges, and are alſo contrarie to themſelues, conſidering that they call heauen (which conteineth the goddes) the euerlaſting ſeate, which trembleth not, and is not driuen nor moued with windes, neither is darkened with cloudes, but is alwayes bright and cleare, and at all times ſhining equally with a pure bright light, as being the onely habitation and manſion place of the eternall God, onely happy and immortall. And afterwardes they deſcribe it themſelues, full of diſſentions, of enmities, of anger and paſſions, which doe nothing become wiſe and learned men. But this diſcourſe peraduenture would be better ſpoken of in ſome other booke. Now the troubles of the ATHENIANS felt immediately after Pericles death, made them then lamente the loſſe of ſo noble a member. For thoſe who vnpaciently did brooke his great authoritie while he liued, becauſe it drowned their owne: when they came after his death to proue other ſpeakers and gouernours, they were compelled then to confeſſe, that no mans nature liuing could be more moderate nor graue, with lenitie and mercie, then his was. And that moſt hated power, which in his life time they called monarchie, did then moſt plainely appeare vnto them, to haue beene the manifeſt ramper and bullwarke of the ſafetie of their whole ſtate and common weale: ſuch corruption and vice in gouernment of the ſtate did then ſpring vp immediately after his death, which when he was aliue, he did euer ſuppreſſe and keepe vnder in ſuch ſort, that either it did not appeare at all, or at the leaſt it came not to that hed and libertie, that ſuch faultes were committed, as were vnpoſſible to be remedied.

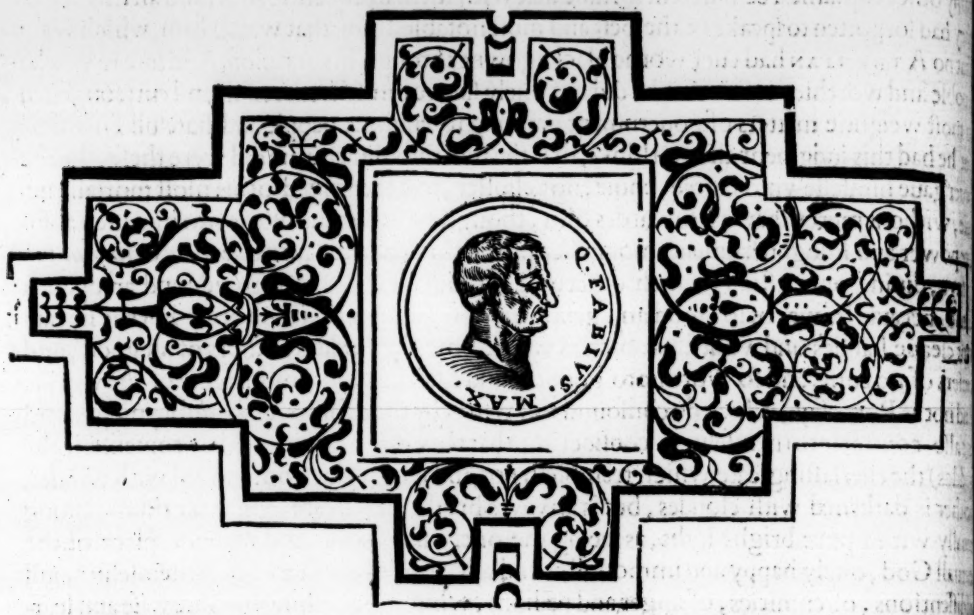
Fabius Maximus.



HAVING already declared vnto you ſuch things worthy memo as we could collect, and gather of the life of Pericles: it is now go time we ſhould proceede to write alſo of the life of Fabius Maxim It is ſayed the firſt Fabius, from whom the houſe and familie of the bians did deſcend (being the greateſt and nobleſt houſe of all othe ROME) was begotten by Hercules, whom he got of a Nymphe (or other ſay, a woman of the country by the riuer of Tyber. And ſo ſay, that the firſt of this houſe, were called at the beginning Fodi becauſe they did hunte wilde beaſtes, with pittefalles and ditche For vnto this preſent the ROMAINES call ditches, Foſſæ: and to digge Fodere. Since that tim the two ſecond letters haue beene chaunged, and they haue called them Fabians. But howſ uer it was, this is certaine, that many noble men haue come out of that houſe: and among ther, there was one of that houſe called Fabius Rullus, whome the ROMAINES for his noble acts did ſurname Maximus, very great. After him Fabius Maximus, whoſe life we haue no in hand, was the fourth lineally deſcended of the ſame line, and he was ſurnamed Verrucoſ becauſe of a certen birth marke he had vpon one of his lippes, like a litle wart. And he w alſo ſurnamed Ouicula, a litle lambe, for his ſoftnes, ſlownes, and grauitie of his doings whil he was a childe. But becauſe of nature he was dull, ſtill, and very ſilent, & that he was ſeldo ſeene to play at any paſtime among the boyes, and for that they ſaw he was but of ſlowe citie, and hard to learne and conceiue, and withall that the boyes might doe to him w they would, he was ſo lowly to his fellowes: this made men iudge that looked not into h that he would proue a very foole and idiotte. Yet other were of contrarie opinion of hi who conſidering more deeply the man, perceiued in his nature a certaine ſecret conſtanc and the maieſty of a lion. But Fabius ſelfe when he was called to ſerue the common weale, quickly ſhewe to the world, that which they tooke for dulnes in him, was his grauitie, whi neuer altered for no cauſe or reſpect: and that which others iudged fearefulnes in him, w very wiſdome. And where he ſhewed himſelfe not haſtie, nor ſodaine in any thing: it w found in him an aſſured & ſettled conſtancie. Wherefore when he came to conſider the gre ſoueraintie of their common weale, and the continuall warres it was in: he did vſe his bod to all hardnes, and brought vp himſelfe therewithall, that he might be the better able to ſe in the field: and he gaue himselfe much to eloquence also, as a necessarie instrument to persuade souldiers vnto reason. His tongue likewise did agree with his conditions, and manner of life. For he had no manner of affectation, nor counterfeat finenes in his speach, but his wordes were euer very graue and profound, and his sentences euen grafted in him by nature, and (as some say) were muchlike Thucydides sayings. As appeareth in a funerall oration he made before the people in the praise of his sonne, who died when he came out of his Consulshippe, which is yet extant to be seene. Now as for him, hauing bene fiue times chosen Consul, in his first yere of his consulshippe, he triumphed ouer the LIGVRIANS (which be people of the mountaines, and vpon the coast of GENVA) who being ouerthrowen by him in a great battell, where they had lost many men, they were compelled to goe their way, and to take the ALPES for their succour, & durst no more appeare vpon the borders of ITALIE, whereupon they did confine. Hannibal entring ITALIE afterwards with a great armie, and hauing wonne the first battel neere vnto the riuer of TREBIA: he passed further, and went through THVSCAN, wasting and destroying all the country as he passed by. This made ROME quake for feare. Besides they saw many signes & tokens, some common vnto them, as thundering, lightning, and such other like: but other also more straunge, neuer seene nor heard of before. For it was reported that certen targets were waxen all bloudy of themselues, and that about the cittie of ANTIVM they found wheat eares, which were all bloudie when they were reaped: that there fell from heauen, burning stones all in a flame of fire: and in the countrie of the PHALERIANS how the element seemed to open, and many litle written scrolles fell downe vpon the ground, in one of the which were written these wordes, word for word: Marcus doth now handle his weapons. But all these signes and wonders did nothing appawle nor daunt the boldnes of Caius Flaminius, Consul then: who besides the naturall great courage, & aspiring minde he had to honour, yet was it beyond all reason increased in him, by the wonderfull good successe he had before. For, notwithstanding the Senate called him home againe, and that his fellowe Consul stoode against his intent: he for all that did giue battell to the GAVLES, in despight of them all, and wanne the victorie. Likewise, though al these signes and wonders in the aire, did greatly trouble, and amaze multitudes of people: yet did they nothing trouble Fabius, for he saw no apparant cause to be troubled withall. But he vnderstanding the small number of his enemies and the lacke of money that was among them: gaue counsell, and was of opinion they should patiently forbeare a litle, and not to hazarde battell against a man, whose armie had bene long trained in warres, and by many foughten fieldes was growen valiant and expert. Moreouer, he thought good they should send ayde to their subiects, and other their allies and confederates, as neede required, to keepe their cities still vnder their obedience: and in the meane season by tract of time, to weare out Hanniballs force & power, which was like straw set on fire, that straight giueth forth a blase, and yet hath no substance to holde fire long. When Fabius had thus sayed enough to perswade Flaminius, yet it would not sinke into Flaminius heade: for, sayeth he, I will not tarie vntill the warres come to ROME gates, neither will I be brought to fight vpon the walles of the cittie, to defend it, and as Camillus did, that fought within the cities selfe in old time. Whereupon he commaunded his captaines to set out their bandes to the field, and he himselfe tooke his horse backe: which vpon the sodaine, without any cause was so afeard, and tooke so on with him selfe, that he cast the Consul to the ground with his heade forward. For all this fall he would not chaunge his minde, but helde on his iorney toward Hannibal, & presented him battell in THVSCAN, by the lake called Thrasimena, which is the lake of PERVSIA. This battel was so fiercely fought on both sides, that notwithstanding there was such a terrible earthquake therewhile, that some cities were ouerthrowen and turned topsy turuey, some riuers had their streames turned against their course, and the foote of the mountaines were torne in sunder, and broken open: yet not one of them that were fighting, heard any such thing at all. Flaminius the Consul selfe was slaine at that battell, after he had in his owne person done many a valiant acte, and many of the worthiest gentlemen and valiantest souldiers of his armie laye dead about him: the residue being fled, the slaughter was great, for the bodies slaine were fifteene thousand, and so many prisoners left aliue. After this ouerthrow, Hannibal made al the search he could possible to finde the body of Flaminius, nius, to burie him honorably, becauſe of his valiantnes: but he could neuer be found amongeſt the dead bodies, neither was it euer heard what became of it. Now as touching the firſt ouerthrow at TREBIA, neither the generall that wrote it, nor the poaſte that brought the firſt newes to ROME, tolde the trothe of it as it was, but fayned that the ende was doubtfull, and that they could not tell who had the beſt. But of this battell, ſo ſoone as Prætor Pomponius had receiued the newes, he called all the people to counſell, where without diſguiſing or diſſembling at all, he playnely ſayed thus vnto them. My Lordes, we have loſt the battell, our armie is ouerthrowne, and the Conſul himſelfe is ſlaine in the field: wherefore conſider what you haue to doe, and prouide for your ſafety. Theſe wordes ſpoken to the people, as it had beene a boyſterous ſtorme of weather that had fallen on them from the ſea, to put them in daunger, did ſo terrifie the multitude, and trouble the whole citie for feare: that they were all in a maze, and knew not what to determine. Yet in the end they all agreed that it ſtoode them vpon to haue a chiefe magiſtrate, called in Latin Dictatura, that ſhould be a man of courage, and could ſtoutely vſe it without ſparing or feare of any perſon. And for this, Fabius Maximus was thought the onely man meete to be choſen: as he, whoſe noble courage and graue behauiour was aunſwerable, to the dignitie and grauitie of the office: and moreouer, that to his grauitie and wiſdome there was ioyned (for reaſonable age) ſtrengh of bodie, and valiantneſſe with experience. This counſell being confirmed by them all, Fabius was choſen Dictator, who named Lucius Minutius generall of the horſemen. Then he firſt required the Senate, that they would graunt him he might haue his horſe in the warres: the which was not lawfull for the Dictator, but expreſſely forbidden by an auncient order. Either becauſe they thought the chiefeſt force of their armie dyd conſiſt in their footemen, which cauſed the making of this lawe: whereby the generall ſhould be amongeſt them in the daye of the battell, and in no wiſe ſhould forſake them. Or els becauſe the authoritie of this magiſtrate in all other thinges was ſo great, that it was in manner after the ſtate of a King: yet all this notwithſtanding, they were willing thereunto, and that the Dictator ſhould haue abſolute power ouer the people. Fabius at his firſt coming, becauſe he would ſhewe the maieſtie and dignitie of his office, that euery man ſhould be the more obedient and readye at his commaundement: when he went abroad he had foure and twentie ſergeantes before him, carying the bundelles of roddes, and axes. And when one of the conſulls came to him, he ſent a ſergeant to commaund his bundell of roddes that were caried before him, to be put downe, and all other tokens of dignitie to be layed aſide: and that he ſhould come and ſpeake with him, as a priuate man. And firſt to make a good foundation, and to beginne with the ſeruice of the goddes; he declared vnto the people, that the loſſe they had receiued, came through the raſhnes and wilfull negligence of their captaine, who made no reckoning of the goddes nor religion: and not through any defaulte and cowardlines of the ſouldiers. And for this cauſe he did perſuade them not to be afrayde of their enemies, but to appeaſe the wrath of the goddes, and to ſerue and honour them. Not that he made them hereby ſuperſticious, but did confirme their valiantneſſe with true religion and godlines: and beſides did vtterly take awaye and aſſwage their feare of their enemies, by giuing them certaine hope and aſſuraunce of the ayde of the goddes. Then were the holy bookes of the Sibylles propheſies peruſed, which were kept very ſecret, and therein they found certaine auncient propheſies and oracles, which ſpake of the preſent miſfortunes of the time. But what were conteyned therein, it is not lawfull to be vttered of any perſon. Afterwardes the Dictator, before the open aſſemblie of the people, made a ſolemne vowe vnto the goddes, that he would ſacrifice all the profittes and frutes that ſhould fall the next yere, of ſheepe, of ſowes, of milch kine, and of goats in all the mountaines, champion countrie, riuers, or meadowes of ITALIE. And he would celebrate playes of muſicke, and ſhewe other ſightes in the honour of the goddes, and would beſtow vpon the ſame the ſumme of three hundreth three and thirtie Seſtercians, & three hundreth three and thirtie Dramaine pence, and a thirde part ouer. All which ſumme reduced into Grecian money, amounteth to foure ſcore three thouſand, fiue hundreth, and foure ſcore, and three ſiluer drachmes and two obolos. Nowe it were a harde thing to tell the reaſon why he doth mention summe so precisely, and why he did deuide it by three, vnlesse it were to extoll the power of the number of three: because it is a perfect number by the nature, and is the first of the odde numbers, which is the beginning of diuerse numbers, and conteineth in it selfe the first differences, and the first elements and principles of all the numbers vnited and ioyned together. So Fabius hauing brought the people to hope, and trust to haue the ayde and fauour of the gods: made them in the end the better disposed to liue well afterwards. Then Fabius hoping after victorie, and that the gods would send good luck and prosperitie vnto men, through their valiantnesse and wisdome: did straight set forwards vnto Hannibal, not as minded to fight with him, but fully resolued to weare out his strength and power, by delayes and tract of time: and to increase his pouertie by the long spending of his owne money, and to consume the small number of his people, with the great number of his souldiers. Fabius camped alwaies in the strong and high places of the mountaines, out of all danger of his enemies horsemen, and coasted still after the enemie: so that when Hannibal stayed in any place, Fabius also stayed: if Hannibal remooued, he followed him straight, and would be alwayes neere him, but neuer forsooke the hilles, neither would he come so neere him, as that he should be inforced to fight against his will. Yet alwayes he followed the enemie at his tayle, and made him euer afeard of him, thinking still that he sought to get the vantage, to giue the charge vpon him. Thus by delaying, and prolonging the time in this sort: he became disliked of euery body. For euery man both in his owne campe, and abroade, spake very ill of him openly: and as for his enemies, they tooke him for no better, then a ranke coward, Hannibal onely excepted. But he perceiuing his great reache and policie, and foreseeing the maner of fight, sawe there was no remedie, but by plaine force or slight to bring him to the fight: for otherwise his delay would ouerthrowe the CARTHAGINIANS, when they should not come to handie strokes with him, wherein onely consisted all their hope and strength, and in the meane time his souldiers should fall away, and dye, and his money was scant, and himselfe should growe the weaker. Thereupon Hannibal began to bethinke him, and deuise all the stratagems and policies of warre he could imagine: and like a cunning wrestler, to seeke out all the trickes he could to giue his aduersarie the fall. For sodainely, he would go and giue alarum to his campe: by and by againe he would retire. Another time he would remooue his campe, from one place to another, and giue him some aduantage, to see if he could plucke his lingring deuise out of his head, and yet to hazard nothing. But as for Fabius, he continued still resolute in his first determination: that delay of fight was the best way to ouerthrowe him. Howbeit Minutius, generall of his horsemen, did trouble him much. For he being earnestly bent to fight without discretion, and brauling of a lustie courage, crept into opinion with the souldiers, by his hotte furie and desire to fight. Which wrought much in them, and so stirred vp their courages, that they mocked Fabius altogether: and called him Hannibals schoolemaister: and contrariwise they commended Minutius, for a valiant captaine, and worthie ROMAINE. This made Minutius looke high, and haue a proude opinion of himselfe, mocking Fabius because he euer lodged on the hilles, with saying, the Dictator would make them goodly sportes, to see their enemies waste and burne ITALY before their face. Moreouer, he asked Fabius friends, whether he would in the end lodge his campe in the skie, that he did climbe vp so high vpon mountaines, mistrusting the earth: or else that hee was so affrayde, his enemies would finde him out, that hee went to hide him selfe in the cloudes. Fabius friendes made reporte of these ieasts, and aduised him rather to hazard battell, then to beare such reproachefull wordes as were spoken of him. But Fabius aunswered them, If I should yeeld to that you counsell me, I should shewe my selfe a greater coward then I am taken for now: by leauing my determination, for feare of their mockes and spightfull wordes. For it is no shame for a man to stand fearefull, and iealous, of the welfare and safetie of his countrey: but otherwise to be afeard of the wagging of euery strawe, or to regarde euery common prating, it is not the parte of a worthie man of charge, but rather of a base minded person, to seeke to please those whome hee ought to commaunde and gouerne, because they are but fooles. After this, Hannibal chaunced to fall into a great errour. For intending to leaue Fabius to bring his armie into the plaine where there was plentie of victuals, and store of pasture to feede his horse and cattell, commaunded his guides to bring him straight after supper, into the plaine of CASINVM. They mistaking his words, and not vnderstanding well what he said, because his ITALIAN tongue was but meane: tooke one thing for another, and so brought him and his armie to the end of a field neere the citie of CASILINVM, through the middest of the which runneth a riuer, the ROMAINES call Vulturnus. Now the countrie lying by it, was a valley enuironed passed in with mountaines round about, sauing that the riuer went to the sea: where leauing his owne banckes, it spreadeth abroade into the marisses, and banckes of sand very deepe, and in the ende fell into that parte of the sea which is most daungerous, and there without neither succour nor couert. Hannibal being now fallen as it were into the bottome of a sacke, Fabius that knewe the countrie, and was very perfect in all the wayes thereabout followed him step by step, and stopped his passage, where he should haue come out of the valley, with foure thousand footemen, which he planted there to keepe the straight: and disposed the rest of his armie vpon the hangings of the hilles, in the most apt and meete places all about. Then with his light horsemen he gaue a charge, vpon the rereward of the enemies battell: which put all Hannibals armie by and by out of order, and so there were slaine eight hundred of his men. Whereupon Hannibal would haue remooued his campe thence immediatly, and knowing then the faulte his guides had made, taking one place for another, and the danger wherein they had brought him: he roundly trussed them vp and hung them by the neckes. Now to force his enemies to come downe from the toppes of the hilles, and to winne them from their strength, he sawe it was vnpossible, and out of all hope. Wherefore, perceiuing his souldiers both afraide and discouraged, for that they sawe themselues hemmed in on all sides, without any order to escape: Hannibal determined to deceiue Fabius by a deuise. He caused straight two thousand oxen to be chosen out of the heard, which they had taken before in their spoiles, and tyed to their hornes great bundels of reedes, and fallowe faggots, or bunches of the dead cuttings of vines: and commaunded the droners that had the charge of them, that when they sawe any signe or token lift vp in the ayre in the night, they should then straight set fire on those bundels or bunches, and driue vp the beasts to the hilles, toward the wayes where the enemies laye. Whilest these things were a preparing, he on the other side ranged his armie in order of battell: and when night came, caused them to marche faire and softly. Now these beasts whilest the fire was but little that burnt vpon their hornes, went but faire and softly vp the hill from the foote of the mountaines from whence they were driuen. In so much as they that heard men that were on the toppe of the mountaines, wondered maruellously to see the flames and fires about the hornes of so many beasts, as if it had bene an armie marching in order of battell with liglues and torches. But when their hornes came to be burnt to the stumpes, and that the force of the fire did frie their very flesh: then beganne they to fight together, and to shake their heads, whereby they did set one another a fire. Then they their soft pace, and went no more in order as they did before, but for the extreame paine they felt, beganne to runne heere and there in the mountaines, carrying fire still about their hornes, and in their tailes, and set fire of all the boughes and coppesies they passed by. It was a strange sight to looke vpon, and did much amaze the ROMAINES that kept the passages of the mountaines, for they thought they had bene men that ranne heere and there with torches in their hands. Whereupon they were in a maruellous feare and trouble, supposing they had bene their enemies that ranne thus towards them, to enuiron them on all sides: so as they durst no more keepe the passages which they were commaunded, but leauing their straights, began to flie toward their maine and great campe. Thereupon Hannibals light horsemen immediatly possessed the straights that were kept: by reason whereof the rest of his armie marched out at their ease and leisure, without feare or daunger, notwithstanding that they were loden and troubled with marueilous great spoiles, and of all kinde of sortes. Fabius then perceiued very well the same night, that it was but a slight of Hannibal: for some of the oxen that fled here and there fell vpon his armie. feating to fall vpon ſome ambuſhe by reaſon of the darke night, he kept his men in battell raye, without ſturring, or making any noiſe. The next morning by breake of day, he began to follow his enemie by the tracke, and fell vpon the taile of the rereward, with whome he skirmiſhed within the ſtraites of the mountaines: and ſo did diſtreſſe ſomewhat Hannibals armie. Hannibal thereupon ſent out of his vauntgarde a certaine number of Spaniards (very luſtie and nimble fellowes, that were vſed to the mountaines, and acquainted with climing vp vpon them) who comming downe, and ſetting vpon the ROMAINES that were heauie armed, ſlue a great number of them, and made Fabius to retire. Thereupon they deſpiſed Fabius the more, and thought worſe of him then they did before: becauſe his pretence and determination was not to be brought to fight with Hannibal, but by wiſedome and policie to ouerthrowe him, where as he him ſelfe by Hannibal was firſt finely handled and deceiued. Hannibal then to bring Fabius further in diſliking and ſuſpition with the ROMAINES, commaunded his ſouldiers when they came neere any of Fabius lands, that they ſhould burne and deſtroye all round about them, but gaue them in charge in no wiſe to medle with Fabius lands, nor any thing of his, and did purpoſely appoint a garriſon to ſee that nothing of Fabius ſhould miſcarie, nor yet take hurt. This was ſtraight caried to ROME, which did thereby the more incenſe the people againſt him. And to helpe it forward, the Tribunes neuer ceaſed crying out vpon him in their orations to the people, and all by Metellus ſpeciall procurement and perſwaſion: who of himſelfe had no cauſe to miſlike with Fabius, but onely becauſe he was Minutius kinſeman (generall of the horſemen) and thought that the ill opinion they bare to Fabius, would turne to the praiſe and aduauncement of Minutius. The Senate alſo were much offended with Fabius, for the compoſition he made with Hannibal, touching the priſoners taken of either ſide. For it was articled betweene them, that they ſhould chaunge priſoners, deliuering man for man, or elſe two hundred and fiftie ſiluer drachmas for a man, if the one chaunced to haue moe priſoners then the other. When exchange was made betweene them, it appeared that Hannibal had left in his hands of ROMAINE priſoners, two hundred and fortie moe, then Fabius had to exchange of his. The Senate commaunded there ſhould be no money ſent to redeeme them, and greatly found fault with Fabius for making this accorde: becauſe it was neither honorable, nor profitable for the common weale, to redeeme men that cowardly ſuffered themſelues to be taken priſoners of their enemies. Fabius vnderſtanding it, did pacientlie beare this diſpleaſure conceiued againſt him by the Senate. Howbeit hauing no money, and meaning to keepe his word, and not to leaue the poore cittizens priſoners behinde him: he ſent his ſonne to ROME, with commiſſion to ſell his lands, and to bring him money immediatly. The young man went his waye to ROME, and ſould his fathers farmes, and brought him money forthwith to the campe: Fabius therewith redeemed the priſoners, and ſent their ranſome vnto Hannibal. Many of the priſoners whom he had redeemed, offered to repay him their ranſome: but he would neuer take any thing againe, and gaue them all their ranſome freely. Afterwards being called to ROME by the prieſts to do certaine ſolemne ſacrifices, he left the armie in charge with Minutius, to gouerne the ſame in his abſence, with condition not to ſet vpon the enemie, nor to fight with him at all: the which not onely by his authoritie he did expreſſely forbid him, but alſo as his very friend, he did warne and intreate him in no wiſe to attempt. Howbeit Minutius litle regarding his commaundements or requeſts, ſo ſoone as Fabius backe was turned, began to bee ſomewhat luſtie, and doing with his enemies. So one day amongſt the reſt, Minutius perceiuing Hannibal had ſent a great part of his armie abroad to forrage and get victuales: came and ſet vpon them that remained behinde, and draue them into their campe, with great ſlaughter, and did put them in a maruellous feare that were ſaued, as men that looked for no leſſe, but to haue bene beſieged in their campe. Afterwards alſo, when their whole armie came together againe: he retired backe in ſpight of them all, and loſt not a man. This exploite ſet Minutius in a pride, and brought the ſouldiers to be more raſhe then they were before. The newes of this ouerthrowe went with ſpeede to ROME, and there they made it a great deale more then it was. Fabius hearing of it, ſaied: he was more afeard of Minutius proſperitie then of his owne ad-uersitie. But the common people reioyced maruellouslie, and made great shewe of ioye vp and downe the market place. Whereupon Metellus one of the Tribunes going vp into the pulpit, made an oration vnto the people, in the which he highly magnified Minutius, and commended his courage: and contrarily charged Fabius no more of cowardlinesse but with flat treason. Furthermore, he did accuse the Nobilitie and greatest men of Rome saying: that from the first beginning they had layde a plotte to drawe these warres out at length, onely to destroy the peoples power and authoritie, hauing brought the whole commonweale, to the state of a monarchie, and into the handes of a priuate person. Who by his remissenesse and delaies, would giue Hannibal leisure to plante himselfe in ITALIE, and by time giue open passage to the CARTHAGINIANS, at their pleasure to send Hannibal a second aide and armie, to make a full conquest of all ITALIE. Fabius hearing these words, rose vp straight, and spake to the people, and taried not about the aunswering of the accusations the Tribune had burthened him withall, but prayed them they would dispatch these sacrifices and ceremonies of the goddes, that he might speedily returne againe to the campe, to punish Minutius, for breaking his commaundement, in fighting with the enemie. He had no sooner spoken these wordes, but there rose a maruellous tumult and hurley burley presently among the people, for the danger Minutius stoode in then: because the Dictator had absolute power and authoritie to imprison and put to death, whom he thought good without ordinarie course of lawe or araignement. Moreouer, they did iudge, since Fabius had of late left his accustomed mildnesse and affabilitie, that he would grow to such seueritie in his anger, that it would be a hard thing to appease him. Wherefore euery man held their peace for feare, saunig onely Metellus the Tribune. He hauing authoritie by vertue of his office, to say what he thought good, and who onely of all other kept still his place and authoritie, when any Dictator was chosen: then all the officers that were put downe, instantlie besought the people not to forsake Minutius, nor to suffer the like to be done to him, as Manlius Torquatus did of late to his sonne, who stroke off his head, after he had valiantly fought with his enemie and ouercome them, for breaking his commaundement. And began to perswade them rather, to take this tyrannicall power of the Dictatorship from Fabius: and to put their affaires into the hands of him, that would and could tell how to bring them safely to passe. The people were tickled maruellouslie with these seditious words, but yet they durst not force Fabius to resigne his Dictatorship, though they bare him great grudge, and were angrie with him in their hearts. Howbeit they ordained that Minutius thenceforth should haue equall power and authoritie with the Dictator in the warres, a thing that was neuer seene nor heard of before and yet the very same done in that sort againe, after the battell of Cannes. For Marcus Iunius being at that time Dictator in the campe, they did choose another Dictator at Rome which was Fabius Buteo, to name and create new Senators in the place of those that were slaine in the battell. But after he had named them, and restored the full number againe of the counsell of the Senate: he discharged the selfe same day the sergeants that caried the rods before him, and sent away the traine that waited vpon him, and did so put himselfe in preasse of the people in the market place, and followed his owne peculiar businesse as a priuate person. Nowe the ROMAINES imagined, that when Fabius should see how they had made Minutius equall in authoritie with him, it would greeue him to the heart for very anger: but they came shorte to iudge of his nature, for he did not thinke that their follie should hurt or dishonour him anall. But as wise Diogenes aunswered one that saied vnto him, lookes they mocke thee: tushe (saied he) they mocke not me. Meaning thereby, that he took them to be mocked, that were offended with their mockes. Thus Fabius tooke euery thing quietly, that the people offered him, and did comfort himselfe with the Philosophers sayings and examples: who do maintaine, that an honest and wise man, can no waye be iniured nor dishonoured. For all the displeasure he receiued by the peoples follie, was in respect of the commonwealth: because they had put a sworde into a madde mans hand in giuing Minutius authoritie to followe his rashe humour, and fonde ambition in the warres. Wherefore, fearing least he being blinded with vaine glorie, and presumptuous opinion of himselfe, should rashelie (and vpon a head) haste to do some great hunt before he came to the campe: he departed sodainly out of ROME without any mans knowledge, to returne againe to the campe, where he found Minutius so proud and stout, that he was not to be delt with. For he would needes haue the authoritie to command the whole armie when it came to his turne. But Fabius would not consent to that, but deuided the one halfe of the armie betweene them: thinking it better he should alone commande the one halfe, then the whole armie by turnes. So he chose for himselfe, the first and third legion: and gaue vnto him, the second and fourth, and deuided also betweene them the aide of their friends. And when Minutius made his boast, that the maiestie of the highest magistrate was brought lower for his sake: Fabius tolde him that he might thinke, if he were wise, he had not to fight with him, but with Hannibal: and if he would needes contend against his companion, yet he should haue a special regarde and consideration, that hauing wonne now the citizens good willes, by whom he was so much honoured, he should haue more care of their health and safetie, then he had, who was now trodden vnder foote, and ill intreated by them. Minutius tooke his lesson, for a counterfeat mocke, after old mens manners & fashion: and so taking the one halfe of the armie vnto him, went and lodged alone by himselfe. Hannibal hearing of their iarre and squaring together, sought straight oportunitie to make their discord finely to serue his turne. Now there was a hill betweene both their campes not very harde to be wonne, and it was an excellent place to lodge a campe safely in, and was very fitte and commodious for all things. The fields that were about it, did seeme a farre off to be very plaine & euen ground, because they had no couert of wood to shadow them, yet were there many ditches and little vallies in them: wherefore Hannibal though he might easily haue taken it at his pleasure if he had listed, did let it alone in the middest betweene them, for a baite to drawe out his enemies to the battell. Now when Hannibal saw Fabius and Minutius lodged a sunder, he placed certaine bandes in the night, among those ditches and vallies. Afterwardes the next morning by breake of day, he sent a small number of men openly to winne this hill: hoping by this pollicie to traine Minutius out to the field, as it fell out in deede. For first Minutius sent thither his light horsemen, and afterwardes all his men at armes: and lastly perceiuing that Hannibal himselfe came to relieue his men that were vpon the hill, he himselfe marched forward also with all the rest of his armie in order of battell, and gaue a whot charge vpon them that defended the hill, to driue them thence. The fight continued equall a good space betweene them both, vntill such time as Hannibal saw his enemie come directly within his danger, and shewed the rereward of his battell naked vnto his men, whom before he had laide in ambush: he straight raised the signall he had giuen them. They vpon that discouered all together, and with great cries did set vpon the rereward of the ROMAINES; and slew a great number of them at the first charge: and did put the rest in such a feare and disorder, as it is impossible to expresse it. Then was Minutius rash braueries and fonde boastes much cooled, when he looked first vpon one captaine, then vpon another, and saw in none of them any courage to tarie by it, but rather that they were all readie to runne away. Which if they had done, they had bene cast away euery man: for the NVMIDIANS finding they were the stronger, did disperse themselues all about the plaine, killing all straglers that fled. Minutius souldiers being brought to this daunger and distresse, which Fabius foresaw they would fall into, and hauing vpon this occasion his armie readie ranged in order of battell, to see what would become of Minutius, not by report of messengers, but with his owne eies: he got him to a litle hill before his campe, where when he saw Minutius and all his men compassed about on euery side, and euen staggering and readie to flie, and heard beside their cries not like men that had harts to fight, but as men scared, and readie to flie for feare to saue themselues: he clapped his hande on his thigh, and fetched a great sigh, saying to those that were about him: O goddes, how Minutius is gone to cast himselfe away, sooner then I looked for, and later then he desired? But in speaking these words, he made his ensignes march on in haste, crying out loud. O my friends, we must dispatch with speede to succour Minutius: for he is a valiant man of person, and one that loueth the honour of his countrie. And though with ouermuch hardines he hath ventred too farre, & made a fault, thinking to haue put the enemies to flight: time serueth not nowe to accuse him, we will tell him of it hereafter. the NVMIDES, and dispersed them, that lay waiting in the fields for the ROMAINES, which they thought would haue fled. Afterwards he went further, and did set vppon them that gaue charge vpon the reteward of Minutius battell, where he slew them that made head against him. The residue, fearing least they should fall into the daunger they had brought the ROMAINES vnto before, they were enuironned in of all sides, did turne taile straight vnto Fabius. Now Hannibal seeing his chaunge, and considering how Fabius in person, with more courage then his age required, did make a lane in the middest of those that fought against him side of the hill, to come to the place where Minutius was: he made the battell to cease, and commaunded to sound the retreate, and so drew backe his men againe into his campe, the ROMAINES being very glad also they might retire with safetie. After this battell, Fabius hauing stript those that were left dead in the field, retired againe to his owne campe, & spake not an ill word of Minutius companions. Minutius then being come to his campe, assembled his souldiers, and spake vnto them. My friends, not to erre at all, enterprising great matters, it is a thing passing mans nature: but to take warning hereafter, by faultes that are past and done, it is the part of a wise and valiant man. For my selfe, I acknowledge I haue no lesse occasion to praise fortune, than I haue also cause to complaine of her. For that which long time could neuer teach me, I haue learned by experience in one little peece of a day: and that is this. That I am not able to commaunde, but am my selfe fitter to be gouerned and commaunded by another: and that I am but a foole to stande in mine owne conceipt, thinking to ouercome those, of whom it is more honour for me to confesse my selfe to be ouercome. Therefore I tell you, that the Dictator Fabius henceforth shalbe he, who alone shall commaund you in all things. And to let him know that we doe all acknowledge the fauour which we haue presently receiued at his handes: we will lead you to giue him thankes, and will my selfe be the first man to offer to obey him in all things he shall commaund me. These wordes being spoken, he commaunded his ensigne bearer to follow him, and he him selfe marched formost towards Fabius campe. When he came thither he went directly to the Dictators tent, whereat euery man wondered, not knowing his intent. Fabius came out to meete him. Minutius after he had set downe his ensignes at his feete, cried with a loud voice, O father: and his souldiers vnto Fabius souldiers, O masters, which name the bondmen that are infranchised, doe vse to them that haue manumissed them. After which euery man being silent, Minutius beganne a loud to say vnto him. My lorde Dictator, this day you haue wonne two victories. The one of Hannibal, whom valiantly you haue ouercome: the second, of my selfe your companion, whom also your wisedome and goodnes haue vanquished. By the one, you haue saued our liues: and by the other, you haue wisely rangfied. So haue we also bene ouercome in two sortes: the one by Hannibal to our shame, and the other by your selfe, to our honour and preseruation. And therefore doe I now call you my father, finding no other name more honorable to call you by, wherewith I might honour you, acknowledging my selfe more bound vnto you for the present grace and fauour I haue receiued of you, then vnto my naturall father that begot me. For by him onely I was begotten: but by you, mine, and all these honest citizens liues haue bene saued. And hauing spoken these wordes, he embraced Fabius: and so did the souldiers also, heartily embracing one another, and kisse one another. Thus the ioy was great through the whole campe, and one was so glad of another, that the teares trickled downe their cheekes for ioy. Now when Fabius was afterwardes put out of his office of Dictatorshippe, there were new Consuls chosen: against the two first followed directly Fabius former order he had begunne. For they kept themselues from giuing Hannibal any battell, and did alwaies sende aide to their subiectes & friendes, to keepe them from rebellion: vntill that Terentius Varro (a man of meane birth, but knowen to be very bolde and rash) by flattering of the people, wanne credit among them to be made Consull. Then they thought that he by his rashnesse and lacke of experience, would inconsiderately hazard battell: because he had cried out in all the assemblies before, that the warre would be euerlasting, so long as the people did chuse any of the Fabians to be their metals, and vaunted him selfe openly, that the first day he came to see his enemies, he would ouerthrow them. Imagining out these braue wordes, he assembled such a power, that the ROMANES neuer saw so great a number together, against any enemie that euer they had: for he put into one campe, foure score and eight thousand fighting men. This made Fabius and the other ROMAINES, men of great wisedome and iudgement, greatly affraide: because they saw no hope for ROME to rise againe, if it fortuned that they should loose so great a number of goodly youth. Therefore Fabius talked with the other Consull, called Paulus Aemilius, a man very skilfull and expert in warres, but ill beloued of the common people, whose furie he yet feared, for that they had condemned him a little before to pay a great fine to the treasurie: and after he had somwhat comforted him, he beganne to perswade and encourage him to resist the fond rashnesse of his companion, telling him, that he should haue as much to doe with Terentius Varro for the preseruation and safety of his countrie, as to fight with Hanniball for defence of the same. For they were both Marshall men, and had alike desire to fight: the one because he knew not wherein the vantage of his strength consisted, and the other because he knewe very well his weaknes. You shall haue reason to beleeue me better, for matters touching Hanniball, then Terentius Varro. For I dare warrant you, if you kepe Hannibal from battell but this yere: he shall of necessitie, if he tarrie, consume himselfe, or els for shame be driuen to flie with his armie. And the rather, because hitherto (though he seeme to be lorde of the field) neuer one yet of his enemies came to take his part: and moreouer because there remaines at this day in his campe not the third part of his armie, he brought with him out of his countrie. Vnto these perswasions, the Consull (as it is reported) answered thus. When I looke into my selfe, my lorde Fabius, mee thinkes my best way were rather to fall vpon the enemies pikes, then once againe to light into the hands and voices of our citizens. Therefore, sith the estate of the common wealth so requireth it, that it behoueth a man to doe as you haue saide: I will doe my best indeuour to shewe my selfe a wise captaine, for your sake only, rather then for all other that should aduise me to the contrarie. And so Paulus departed from ROME with this minde. But Terentius his companion would in any case, they should cõmaund the whole armie by turnes, ech his day by himselfe: and went to encampe hard by Hanniball, by the riuer of Aufide, neere vnto the village called CANNES. Now when it came to his day to commaund by turnes, early in the morning he caused the signall of battell to be set out, which was a coate armour of skarlet in graine, that they did lay out vpon the pauilion of the generall: so that the enemies at the first sight, beganne to be affeard, to see the lustinesse of this new come generall, and the great number of souldiers he had also in his hoast, in comparison of them that were not halfe so many. Yet Hannibal of a good courage, commaunded euery man to arme, and to put them selues in order of battell: and him selfe in the meane time taking his horse backe, followed with a few, gallopped vp to the toppe of a litle hill not very steepe, from whence he might plainely discerne all the ROMAINES campe, and sawe how they did range their men in order of battell. Now one Giscon (a man of like state and nobilitie as him selfe) being with him at that time, tolde him, that the enemies seemed a farre off to be a marueilous number. But Hannibal rubbing his forehead, aunswered him. Yea, said he, but there is another thing more to be wondred at then you thinke of Giscon. Giscon straight asked him: What? marie saith he this: that of all the great number of souldiers you see yonder, there is not a man of them called Giscon as you are. This merry answere deliuered contrarie to their expectation that were with him, looking for some great waightie matter, made them all laugh a good. So downe the hill they came laughing a loud, and tolde this pretie iest to all they met as they rode, which straight from one to another ranne ouer all the campe, in so much as Hanniball himselfe could not holde from laughing. The CARTHAGINIAN souldiers perceiuing this, beganne to be of a good courage, imagining that their generall would not be so merily disposed as to fall a laughing, being so neere daunger, if he had not perceiued him selfe a great deale to be the stronger, and that he had good cause also to make no reckoning of his enemies. Furthermore, he shewed two policies of a skilfull captaine in the battell. The first was, the situation of the place, where he put his men in order of battell, so as they had the winde on their backes: which raging like a burning lightning, raised a sharpe dust out of the open sandy vallie, and passing ouer the CARTHAGINIANS squadron, blew full in the ROMAINES faces, with such a violence, that they were compelled to turne their faces, & to trouble their owne rankes. The second policie was, the forme and order of his battell. For he placed on either side of his winges, the best and valiantest souldiers he had in all his armie: and did fill vp the middest of his battell with the worst of his men, which he made like a point, and was farther out by a great deale, then the two winges of the front of his battell. So he commaunded those of the winges, that when the ROMAINES had broken his first front, and followed those that gaue backe, whereby the middest of his battell should leaue an hollow place, and the enemies should come in still increasing within the compasse of the two winges, that then they should set vpon them on both sides, and charge their flanks immediatly, and so inclose them in behind. And this was cause of a greater slaughter. For when the middle battell beganne to giue backe, and to receiue the ROMAINES within it, who pursued the other very hotly, Hannibals battell chaunged her forme: and where at the beginning it was like a point, it became now in the middest like a cressant or halfe moone. Then the captaines of the chosen bandes that lay out in both the winges, made their men to turne, some on the left hand, and some on the right, and charged the ROMAINES on the flankes, and behind, where they were all naked: so they killed all those that could not saue themselues by flying, before they were enuironned. They say also, that there fell out another mischiefe by misfortune, vnto the horsemen of the ROMAINES, and by this occasion. The horse of Paulus Æmilius the Consull being hurt, did throwe his master on the ground: whereupon those that were next him did light from their horse backes to helpe him. The residue of the horsemen that were a great way behinde him, seeing them light, thought they had bene all commaunded to light: and so upon euery man forsooke their horse, and fought it out a foote. Hannibal when he saw them, said: yea marie, I had rather haue them so, then deliuered me bound hand and foote. But in those matters, the historiographers doe dilate more at large. Furthermore, of the two Consuls, Varro saued himselfe by his horse, with a fewe following him, within the citie of VENVSA. Paulus being in the middest of the throng of all the armie, his bodie full of arrowes that stucke fast in his woundes, and his heart sore loden with grieuous sorrowe and anguish to see the ouerthrow of his men: was set downe by a rocke, looking for some of his enemies to come and rid him out of his paine. But fewe could knowe him, his head and face was so all such a gore bloud: insomuch as his friendes and seruantes also passed by him, and knewe him not. And there was but one young gentleman of a noble house, of the Patricians, called Cornelius Lentulus, that knew him, who did his best endeuour to saue him. For he lighted a foote presently, & brought him his horse, praying him to get vp vpon him, to proue if he could saue him selfe for the necessitie of his countrie, which now more then euer had neede of a good and wise captaine. But he refused the gentlemans offer and his intreatie, and compelled him to take his horse backe againe, though the teares ranne downe his cheekes for pittie: and raising himselfe vp to take him by the hand, he saide vnto him. I pray you tell Fabius Maximus from me, and witnesse with me, that Paulus Æmilius euen to his last houre hath followed his counsell, and did neuer swarue from the promise he made him: but that first he was forced to it by Varro and afterwards by Hannibal. When he had deliuered these words, he bad Lentulus farewell: and running againe into the furie of the slaughter, there he died among his slaine companions. It is thought there were slaine at this battell, fiftie thousand ROMAINES, and foure thousand taken prisoners: and other ten thousand that were taken prisoners in two campes after the battell. When this noble victorie was gotten, Hannibals friends gaue him counsell to follow his good fortune: and to enter ROME after the scattered number that fled thither: so as within fewe daies following he might suppe in their capitoll. A man cannot easily gesse what was the cause that stayed him, that he went not, vnlesse it was (as I thinke) some good fortune, or fauourable God toward the ROMAINES that withstood him, & made him afeard and glad to retire. Whereupon they say, that one Barca a CARTHAGINIAN, in his anger said to Hannibal: Sir, you haue the way to ouercome, but you cannot vse victorie. Notwithstanding, this victorie made a maruellous chaunge for him. For hereupon, all ITALY in manner came in to submit them selues to him: where before he had no towne at commauncommaundement, nor any ſtorehouſe or port through all ITALY, yea hee did maruellous hardly, and with much a doe vittell his army with that he could daily robbe and ſpoile, hauing no certaine place to retire vnto, nor grounded hope to entertaine theſe warres, but kept the field with his army, remouing from place to place, as they had bene a great mũber of murderers and theeues together. For the moſt part of the country, did yeeld immediatly vnto him: as the city of CAPVA, being the chiefeſt and greateſt city of all ITALY but ROME, and did receiue Hannibal, and were at his deuotion. Thus we may plainely ſee, that as the poet Euripides ſaieth: it is a great miſchiefe not onely to be driuen to make triall of friends, but proofe alſo of captaines wiſdome. For that which before they acounted cowardlineſſe and faint heart in Fabius, immediatly after the battell, they thought it more then mans reaſon, and rather a heauenly wiſdome and influence, that ſo long foreſaw the thinges to come, which the parties ſelues that afterwardes felt them, gaue litle credite vnto before. Vpon this occaſion, ROME repoſed incontinently all their hope and truſt in Fabius, and they repaired to him for counſell, as they would haue run vnto ſome temple or altar for ſanctuary. So as the firſt and chiefeſt cauſe of ſtaying the people together from diſperſing themſelues abroade, as they did when ROME was taken by the GAVLES: was the onely opinion and confidence they had in Fabius wiſedome. For where before he ſeemed to be a coward, and timerous, when there was no danger nor misfortune happened: then when euery man wept and cried out for ſorrow, which could not helpe, and that all the world was ſo troubled that there was no order taken for any thing, he contrarily went alone vp and downe the city very modeſtly, with a bold conſtant countenaunce, ſpeaking curteouſly to euery one, and did appeaſe their womaniſh cries and lamentations, and did forbid the common aſſemblies and fond ceremonies, of lamenting the dead corſe at their burials. Then he perſwaded the Senat to aſſemble in counſell, and did comfort vp thoſe that were magiſtrates, and hee alone was the onely force and power of the city: for there was not a man that bare any office, but did caſt his eye vppon Fabius, to know what he ſhould do. He it was that cauſed the gates of the city ſtraight to be warded, and to keepe thoſe in for going their waie, that would haue forſaken the citie. Hee moreouer did appoint the time and place of mourning, and did commaund whoſoeuer was diſpoſed to mourne, that he ſhould doe it priuately in his owne houſe, and to continue onely but thirty daies. Then he willed all mourning to be left off, and that the city might be cleane from ſuch vnclean things. So the feaſt of Ceres falling about that time, he thought it better to leaue off the ſacrifices and proceſſion they were wont to keepe on Ceres day: then by their ſmall number that were left, and ſorrow of thoſe that remained, to let their enemies vnderſtand their exceeding great loſſe. For the goddes delight to be ſerued with glad and reioyſing hearts, and with thoſe that are in proſperity. But all this notwithſtanding, whatſoeuer the prieſts would haue done, either to pacifie the wrath of the goddes, or to turne away the threatninges of theſe iniſter ſignes, it was forthwith done. For they did ſend to the oracle of Apollo, in the citie of DELPHES, one of Fabius kinſemen ſurnamed Pictor. And two of the Veſtall Nuns being defloured: the one was buried aliue according to the law and cuſtome, and the other made her ſelfe away. But herein the great courage and noble clemency of the ROMAINES, is maruellouſly to be noted and regarded. For the Conſull Terentius Varro returning backe to ROME, with the ſhame of his extreame misfortune and ouerthrow, that he durſt not looke vpon any man: the Senate notwithſtanding, and all the people following them, went to the gates of the citie to meete him, and did honorably receiue him. Nay furthermore, thoſe that were the chiefe magiſtrates and Senators, among whom Fabius was one, when ſilence was made, they commended Varro much: becauſe he did not deſpaire of the preſeruation of the common weale after ſo great a calamitie, but did returne againe to the citie, to helpe to reduce things to order, in vſing the authoritie of the law, and the ſeruice of the citizens, as not being altogether vnder foote, but ſtanding yet in reaſonable termes of good recouerie. But when they vnderſtoode that Hannibal after the battell was gone into other partes of ITALIE: then they beganne to be of good cheere againe, and ſent a new army and generalles to the field, among which, the two chiefe generals were, Fabius Maximus, and Claudius Marcellus, both which by contrary meanes in manner, wanne a like glorie and reputation. For Marcellus (as we haue declared in his life, was a man of ſpeedy execution, of a quicke hand, of a valiant nature, and a right martiall man, as Homer calleth them, that valiauntly put themſelues in any daunger: by reaſon whereof, hauing to deale with another captaine a like venturous and valiaunt as himſelfe, in all ſeruice and exec-tion, he ſhewed the ſelfe boldneſſe and courage that Hannibal did. But Fabius perſiſting ſtil vppon his firſt determination, did hope that though he did not fight with Hanniball, not ha him at all, yet continuall warres would conſume him and his army in the end, and bring the both to naught: as a common wreſtler that forceth his body aboue his naturall ſtrengt doth in the end become a lame and bruſed man. Hereupon Poſſidonius writeth, that the on was called the ROMAINES ſword, and the other their target. And that Fabius conſtancy a reſoluteneſſe in warres to fight with ſecurity, and to commit nothing to hazard and daunge being mingled with Marcellus heate and fury: was that onely, which preſerued the R MAINS empire. For Hanniball meeting alwaies in his way the one that was furious, as a ſtron running ſtreame, found that his army was continually turmoyled and ouerharried: and th ther that was ſlow as a litle prety riuer, he found that his army ranne ſoftly vnder him wit out any noiſe, but yet continually by litle and litle it did ſtill conſume and diminiſh him, vn he ſaw him ſelfe at the laſt brought to that paſſe, that he was weary with fighting with Mar cellus, and affraide of Fabius becauſe he fought not. For during all the time of theſe warres had euer theſe two captaines almoſt againſt him, which were made either Prætors, Conſu or Proconſuls: for either of them both had bene fiue times before choſen Conſull. Yet as Marcellus: Hanniball had laide and ambuſh for him in the fift and laſt yeare of his Conſ ſhippe, where he ſet vppon him on a ſodaine, and ſlue him. But as for Fabius, he laide ma baites for him, and did what he could by all the skill and reach he had, by ambuſhes, and o ther warlike policies to entrappe him: but he could neuer draw him within his daunger. Howbeit at one time he put him to a litle trouble, and was in good hope then to haue ma him fall vppon his ambuſh he had laide for him: and by this policy. He had counterfey letters written and ſent vnto him from the city of METAPONT, to pray him to come them, and they would deliuer their city into his handes: and withall, that ſuch as were pri to the contents of the ſame, deſired no other thing but his repaire thither. Theſe letters p tily quickned Fabius, inſomuch as he was determined one night to haue taken part of his my, and to haue gone to them. But becauſe the ſignes of the birdes did promiſe him no go ſucceſſe, he left off his purpoſe. Soone after he vnderſtoode they were counterfaite letter made by Hannibals fine deuiſe to haue drawn him out, and to haue entrapped him, for whom him ſelfe lay in perſon in ambuſh neare the citie, looking and waiting for his comming but the goddes who would haue him ſaued, were onely to be thanked for his happy ſcape. Furthermore, concerning the reuolt of the cities that were ſubiect vnto them, and the ſtr of their allies and friends againſt them: Fabius thought it far better to intreat them e utteruo making them aſhamed without occaſion to rebell againſt them, rather then openly to ſuſpe them, and to deale ſtraightly with thoſe that were ſo to be ſuſpected. Now for this matter, is reported that Fabius had a ſouldier in his campe that was a MARSIAN borne by nation, valiaunt man of his perſon, and alſo of as noble a houſe, as any that were of all the allies of t ROMAINES: who had practiſed with other his fellowes of the band he ſerued in, to go ſer the enemy. Fabius hearing of this practiſe he went about, gaue him no ill countenaunce f it, but calling him to him, he ſaide. I muſt confeſſe there is no reckoning made of you, as yo good ſeruice doth deſerue: wherefore for this time (ſaieth he) I blame the pety captaines on ly, which in ſuch ſort doe beſtow their good will and fauour at aduenture, and not by d ſert. But henceforth it ſhall be your owne fault if you doe not declare your mind vnto m and betweene you and me make me priuy of your lacke and neceſſity. When he had ſpoke theſe wordes to him, he gaue him a very good horſe for ſeruice, and did reward him with o ther honorable giftes, as men of good ſeruice and deſert haue commonly beſtowed on the and this did ſo encourage the ſouldier thenceforth, that he became a very faithfull and ſe uiceable ſouldier to the ROMAINES. For Fabius thought it more fit, that hunters, riders horſes, and ſuch like as take vppon them to tame brute beaſts, ſhould ſooner make them lea their ſauage and churliſh nature by gentle vſage and manning of them: then by beating, a shackling of them. And so a gouernour of men, should rather correct his souldier by patience, gentlenes, and clemency: then by rigour, violence, or seuerity. Otherwise he should handle them more rudely, and sharpely, then husbandmen doe figge trees, oliue trees, & wilde pomegarnets: who by diligent pruning and good handling of them, doe alter their hard and wilde nature, and cause them in the end to bring forth good figs, oliues and pomegarnets. Another time certaine captaines of his brought him word, that there was one of their souldiers which would euer goe out of the campe, and leaue his ensigne. He asked them, what manner of man he was. They aunswered him all together, that he was a very good souldier, and that they could hardly finde out such another, in all their bandes as he: and therewithall they told him of some notable seruice they had seene him doe in person. Whereupon Fabius made a diligent enquiry to know what the cause was that made him goe so ofte out of the campe: in the end, he found he was in loue with a young woman, and that to goe see her was the cause he did so oft leaue his ensigne, and did put his life in so great daunger, for that she was so farre off. When Fabius vnderstood this, he sent certaine souldiers (vnknowing to the souldier) to bring the woman away he loued, and willed them to hide her in his tent, and then called hee the souldier to him, that was a LVCANIAN borne, and taking him a side, sayd vnto him thus. My friend, it hath bene told me, how thou hast lyen many nightes out of the campe, against the law of armes, and order of the ROMAINES, but therewithall I vnderstand also that otherwise thou art an honest man, and therefore I pardon thy faultes past, in consideration of thy good seruice: but from henceforth I will giue thee in custody to such a one, as shall make me accompt of thee. The souldier was blancke when he heard these wordes. Fabius with that, caused the woman he was in loue with to be brought forth, and deliuered her into his hands, saying vnto him. This woman hereafter shall aunswer me thy body to be forth comming in the campe amongest vs: and from henceforth thy deedes shall witnesse for the rest, that thy loue vnto this woman, may be no cloke of thy departing out of the campe for any wicked practise or intent. Thus much we finde written concerning this matter. Moreouer, Fabius after such a sort, recouered againe the city of TARENTVM, and brought it to the obedience of the ROMAINES, which they had lost by treason. It fortuned there was a young man in his campe, a TARENTINE borne, that had a sister within TARENTVM, which was very faithfull to him, and loued him marrellous dearely: now there was a captaine, a BRVTIAN borne, that fell in loue with her, and was one of those to whom Hannibal had committed the charge of the city of TARENTVM. This gaue the young souldier the TARENTINE, very good hope, and way, to bring his enterprise to good effect: whereupon he reuealed his intent to Fabius, and with his priuity fled from his campe, and got into the city of TARENTVM, giuing it out in the city, that he would altogether dwell with his sister. Now for a few dayes at his first comming, the BRVTIAN captaine lay alone by him selfe, at the request of the maide his sister, who thought her brother had not knowen of her loue: and shortly after the young fellowe spoke his sister a side, and saide vnto her. My good sister, there was a great speach in the ROMAINES campe, that thou wert kept by one of the chiefest captaines of the garrison: I pray thee if it be so, let me know what he is. For so he be a good fellow, and an honest man (as they say he is) I care not: for warres that turneth all thinges topsi turuey, regardeth not of what place or calling he is of, and still maketh vertue of necessity, without respect of shame. And it is a speciall good fortune, at such time as neither right nor reason rules, to happen yet into the hands of a good and gracious Lord. His sister hearing him speake these wordes, sent for the BRVTIAN captaine to bring him acquainted with her brother, who liked well of both their loues, and indeuoured himselfe to frame his sisters loue in better sort towards him, then it was before: by reason whereof, the captaine also beganne to trust him very much. So this young TARENTINE saw it was very easie to winne and turne the minde of this amarous and mercenary man, with hope of great gifts that were promised him, and Fabius should performe. Thus doe the most part of writers set downe this storie. Howbeit some writers say, that this woman who was the BRVTIAN captaine, was not a TARENTINE, but a BRVTIAN borne, whom Fabius it is sayd, kept afterwards for his concubine: and that shee vnderstanding the captaine of the BRVTIANS (who laie in garrison within the city of TARENTVM) was also a BRVTIAN borne, and of her owne native countrey, made Fabius priuy to her intent, and with his consent, she comming to the wals of the city, spake with this BRVTIAN captaine, whom she handled in such sort, that shee wanne him. But whilest this geare was a brewing, Fabius, because he would traine Hannibal out of those quarters, wrote vnto the souldiers of RHEGIO: which belonged to the ROMAINES, that they should enter the borders of the BRVTIANS, and lay siege to the city of CAVLONIA, and raze it to the ground. These RHEGIAN souldiers were about the number of eight thousand, and the most of them traytours, and runneagates, from one campe to another: and the worst sort of them, and most defamed of life, were those that Marcellus brought thither out of SICILE, so that in losing them all, the losse were nothing to the common weale, and the sorrow much lesse. So Fabius thought, that putting these fellowes out for a pray to Hannibal (as a stale to draw him from those quarters) he should plucke him by this meanes from TARENTVM: and so it came to passe. For Hannibal incontinently went thence with his army to intrappe them: and in the meane time Fabius went to lay siege to TARENTVM, where he had not lien sixe daies before it, but the young man (who together with his sister had drawen the BRVTIAN captaine to this treason) stale out one night to Fabius, to enforme him of all, hauing taken very good markes of the side of the wall the BRVTIAN captaine had taken charge of, who had promised him to keepe it secret, and to suffer them to enter, that came to assault that side. Yet Fabius would not ground his hope altogether vpon the BRVTIANS executing this treason, but went himselfe in person to view the place appointed, howbeit without attempting any thing for that time: and in the meane season, he gaue a generall assault to all partes of the city (as well by sea as by land) with great shoutes and cries. Then the BRVTIAN captaine seeing all the citizens and garrison run to that part, where they perceiued the noise to be greatest: made a signall vnto Fabius, that now was the time. Who then caused scaling ladders to be brought a pace, whereupon himselfe with his company scaled the walles, and so wanne the city. But it appeareth here, that ambition ouercame him. For first he commaunded they should kill all the BRVTIANS, because it should not be knowen he had wonne the city by treason. But this bloudy policy failed him: for he missed not only of the glory he looked for, but most deseruedly he had the reproche of cruelty and falsehood.

Fabius tooke the citie of Tarentum.

Fabius ambition cause of foule murder.

At the taking of this city, a marueilous number of the TARENTINES were slaine, besides there were sold thirty thousand of the chiefest of them, and all the city was sacked: and of the spoile thereof was caried to the common store treasure at ROME, three thousand talents. It is reported also, that when they did spoile and carie away all other spoiles behinde, the recorder of the city asked Fabius, what his pleasure was to doe with the goddes meaning the tables, and their images: and to that Fabius aunswered him. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their goddes that be angry with them. This notwithstanding, he caried from thence Hercules statue, that was of a monstrous bignesse, and caused it to be set vp in the Capitoll, and withall did set vp his owne image in brasse a horse backe by him. But in that he shewed himselfe farre harder hearted, then Marcellus had done, or to say more truely, then by he made the world know how much Marcellus curtesie, clemency, and bounty was to be wondred at: as we haue written in his life. Newes being brought to Hannibal, that TARENTVM was besieged, he marched presently with all speede possible to raise the siege: and they he had almost come in time, for he was within 40. furlongs of the city when he vnderstood the troth of the taking of it. Then sayd he out aloud, sure the ROMAINES haue their Hannibal to, for as we wanne TARENTVM, so haue we lost it. But after that, to his friends he priuately (and that was the first time they euer heard him speake it) that he saw long before and now appeared plainely, that they could not possibly with this small power keepe it.

Fabius made his triumphe and entry into ROME the second time, by reason of taking this city and his second triumph was much more honorable then the first, as of a valiant captaine that held out still with Hannibal, and easely met with all his fine policies, much like the slight tricks of a cunning wrestler, which caried not now the former roughnes & strength any more because that his army was giuen to take their ease, and growen too delicate, partly through the great riches they had gotten, and partly also for that it was sore wasted and diminished through the sundry foughten battelles and blowes they had beene at. Now there was Fabius second triumph.

Mar

Marcus Liuius a ROMAINE, that was gouernour of TARENTVM at that time, when Hannibal tooke it, and neuertheleſſe kept the caſtell ſtill out of Hannibals hands, and ſo held it vntill the citie came againe into the hands of the ROMAINES. This Liuius ſpighted to ſee ſuch honour done to Fabius, ſo that one day in open Senate, being drowned with enuie and ambition, he burſt out and ſaid: that it was himſelfe, not Fabius, that was cauſe of taking of the citie of TARENTVM againe. Fabius ſmiling to heare him, anſwered him openly: indeed thou ſaieſt true, for if thou hadſt not loſt it, I had neuer wonne it againe. But the ROMAINES in all other reſpects did greatly honour Fabius, and ſpecially for that they choſe his ſonne Conſul. He hauing alreadie taken poſſeſſion of his office, as he was diſpatching certaine cauſes touching the warres, his father (whether it was for debilitie of his age, or to prooue his ſonne) tooke his horſe to come to him, and rode through the preaſe of the people that thronged about him, hauing buſineſſe with him. But his ſonne ſeeing him comming a farre off, would not ſuffer it, but ſent an officer of his vnto him, to commaund him to light off his horſe, and to come a foote if he had any thing to do with the Conſull. This commaundement miſliked the people that heard it, and they all looked vpon Fabius, but ſaid not a word: thinking with themſelues, that the Conſull did great wrong to his fathers greatneſſe. So he lighted ſtraight, and went a good round pace to embrace his ſonne, and ſaid vnto him. You haue reaſon ſonne, and do well to ſhewe ouer whom you commaund, vnderſtanding the authoritie of a Conſull, which place you haue receiued. For it is the direct courſe, by the which we and our anceſters haue increaſed the ROMAINE empire: preferring euer the honour and ſtate of our countrie, aboue father, mother, or children. And truly they ſay, that Fabius great grandfather being the greateſt and moſt noble perſon of ROME in his time, hauing fiue times bene Conſull, and had obtained manie triumphes, for diuerſe honourable and ſundrie victories he had wonne: was contented after all theſe, to be his ſonnes lieutenant, and to go to the warres with him, he being choſen Conſull. And laſt of all, the Conſull his ſonne returning home to ROME a conqueror, in his triumphing chariot drawne with foure horſes, he followed him a horſe backe alſo, in troope with the reſt: thinking it honour to him, that hauing authoritie ouer his ſonne in the right of a father, and being alſo the nobleſt man of all the citizens, ſo taken and reputed, neuertheleſſe he willingly ſubmitted himſelfe to the lawe and magiſtrate, who had authoritie of him. Yet beſides all this, he had farre more excellent vertues to be had in admiration, then thoſe alreadie ſpoken of. But it fortuned that this ſonne of Fabius died before him, whoſe death he tooke patiently, like a wiſe man, and a good father. Now the cuſtome being at that time, that at the death of a noble man, their neereſt kinſeman ſhould make a funerall oration in their praiſe at their obſequies: he himſelfe made the ſame oration in honour of his ſonne, and did openly ſpeake it in the market place, and moreouer wrote it, and deliuered it out abroad. About this time, Cornelius Scipio was ſent into SPAINE, who draue out the CARTHAGINIANS from thence, after he had ouerthrowne them in many battels, and had conquered many great cities, and greatly aduanced the honour and eſtimation of the ſtate of ROME: for the which at his returne, he was aſmuch, or rather more honoured, beloued and eſteemed, then any other that was in the citie of ROME. Hereupon Scipio being made Conſull, conſidered that the people of ROME looked for ſome great matter at his hands, aboue all other. Therefore he thought, to take vpon him to fight againſt Hannibal in ITALIE, he ſhould but follow the olde manner, and treade too much in the ſteps of the olde man: whereupon he reſolued immediatly to make warres in AFRICKE, and to burne and deſtroy the countrie euen vnto CARTHAGE gates, and ſo to transfer the warres out of ITALIE into LIBYA, procuring by all poſſible deuiſe he could, to put it into the peoples heads, and to make them like of it. But Fabius contrarilie, perſwading himſelfe that the enterpriſe this young raſhe youthe tooke in hand, was vtterly to ouerthrowe the commonweale, or to put the ſtate of ROME in great danger: deuiſed to put ROME in the greateſt feare he could poſsible, without ſparing ſpeech or deede he thought might ſerue for his purpoſe, to make the people change from that minde. Now he could ſo cunningly worke his purpoſe, what with ſpeaking and doing, that he had drawne all the Senate to his opinion. But the people iudged, it was the ſecret enuie he bare to Scipioes glorie, that drue him to encounter this deuiſe, onely to bleamiſh Scipioes noble fortune, fearing, leaſt if he ſhould happen to do ſome honourable ſeruice (as to make an end altogether of this warre, or otherwiſe to drawe Hanniball out of ITALIE) that then it would appeare to the world, he had bene too ſoft, or too negligent, to draw this warre out to ſuch length. For my part, me thinkes the onely matter that mooued Fabius from the beginning to be againſt Scipio, was the great care he had of the ſafetie of the commonweale, by reaſon of the great danger depending vpon ſuch a reſolution. And yet I do thinke alſo, that afterwards he went further then he ſhould, contending too ſore againſt him (whether it was through ambition or obſtinacie) ſeeking to hinder and ſuppreſſe the greatneſſe of Scipio: conſidering alſo he did his beſt to perſwade Craſſus, Scipioes companion in the Conſulſhip, that he ſhould not graunt vnto him the leading of the armie, but if he thought good to go into AFRICKE to make warres vpon the CARTHAGINIANS, that he ſhould rather go himſelfe. And moreouer, he was the let that they gaue him no money for maintenance of theſe warres, Scipio hereupon being turned ouer to his owne credit, to furniſh himſelfe as he could: he leauied great ſummes of money in the cities of THVSCAN, who for the great loue they bare him made contribution towards his iourney. And Craſſus remained at home, both becauſe he was a ſoft and no ambitious, nor contentious man of nature: as alſo, becauſe he was the chiefe Prelate and high biſhop, who by the lawe of their religion, was conſtrained to keepe ROME.

Craſſus, high biſhop of Rome.

Fabius ſeeing his labour loſt that way, tooke againe another courſe to croſſe Scipio, deuiſing to ſtay the young men at home, that had great deſire to go this iourney with him. For he cried out with open mouth, in all aſſemblies of the Senate and people, that Scipio was not contented onely to flie Hanniball, but that he would carie with him beſides the whole force of ITALIE that remained: alluring the youth with ſweete baites of vaine hope, and perſwading them to leaue their wiues, their fathers, mothers, and their countrey, euen now when their enemie knocked at ROME gates, who did euer conquer, and was yet neuer conquered. Theſe words of Fabius did ſo dampe the ROMAINES, that they appointed Scipio ſhould furniſh his iourney onely with the armie that was in SICILIA, ſauing that he might ſupply to them if he would three hundred of the beſt ſouldiers that had ſerued him faithfully in SPAINE. And ſo it doth appeare euen to this preſent, that Fabius both did and ſaid all things, according to his worne manner, and naturall diſpoſition. Now Scipio was no ſooner arriued in AFRICKE, but newes were brought to ROME incontinently, of wonderfull exploits, and noble ſeruice done beyond meaſure: and of great ſpoiles taken by him, which argued the trothe of the newes. As, the king of the NVMIDIANS taken priſoner, two campes of the enemies burnt and deſtroyed at a time, with loſſe of a great number of people, armour, and horſes, that were conſumed in the ſame: letters and poſtes for hſe running in the neck one of another from CARTHAGE to Hanniball home, and to pray him to hunt no longer after vaine hope that would neuer haue end, haſting himſelfe with all ſpeede poſſible to come to the reſcue of his countrie. The wonderfull great fortunes of Scipio, made him of ſuch renowme and fame within ROME that there was no talke but of Scipio. Fabius notwithſtanding deſiſted not to make a new queſt, being of opinion they ſhould ſend him a ſucceſſour, alledging no other cauſe nor reaſon but a common ſpeeche of euery bodie: that it was a dangerous thing to commit to the fortune of one man alone, ſo great exceeding proſperitie and good ſucceſſe, becauſe it is a rare matter to ſee one man happie in all things. Theſe words did ſo much miſlike the people, that they thought him an enuious troubleſome man, or elſe they thought his age had made him fearefull: and that his courage failed with his ſtrength, fearing Hanniball more doubtfully than he needed. For nowe though Hanniball was forced to leaue ITALIE, and to returne into AFRICKE, yet Fabius would not graunt, that the peoples ioy and ſecuritie they thought they were in, was altogether cleare, and without feare and miſtruſt: but gaue it out that they were in greateſt danger, and that the commonweale was breeding more miſchiefe now, then before. For when Hanniball (ſaid he) ſhall returne home into AFRICKE, and come before CARTHAGE walles, the ROMAINES ſhall be leſſe able to abide him than they haue bene before: and Scipio moreouer, ſhall meete with an armie yet warme, and embrued with the bloud of ſo many Prætors, Dictators, and Conſuls of ROME, which they haue ouercome, and put to the ſword in ITALIE. With theſe vncomfortable ſpeeches, he troubled and disquieted the whole citie, perswading them that notwithstanding the warre was transferred out of ITALIE into AFRICK, yet that the occasion of feare was no lesse neere vnto ROME, then it was euer before. But within short space after, Scipio hauing ouercome Hanniball in plaine battell in the field, and troden vnder foote the glory and pride of CARTHAGE, he brought a greater ioy to ROME, then they euer looked for: and by this noble victorie of his, he shored vp againe the declining state of the empire of ROME, which a litle before was falling downe right. Howbeit Fabius liued not to the end of this warre, nor euer heard while he liued the ioyfull newes of Hannibals happy ouerthrow, neither were his yeres prolonged to see the happy assured prosperitie of his countrie: for about that time that Hanniball departed out of ITALIE, a sickenesse tooke him, whereof he died. The stories declare, that the THEBANS buried Epaminondas, at the common charges of the people: because he died in so great pouertie, that when he was dead, they found nothing in the house but a litle iron spit. Now the ROMAINES buried not Fabius so, at the common charge of the citie, but euery man of beneuolence gaue towards his funerall charges, a peece of coine that caried the least value of their currant money: not for that he lacked abilitie to bring him to the ground, but onely to honour his memory: in making his obsequies at their charges, as of one that had bene their common father. So had his vertuous life, an honourable end and butiall.

THE COMPARISON OF Pericles with Fabius.

HERE haue you heard what is written, of these two great persons. And forasmuch as they haue both left behinde them, many noble examples of vertue, aswel in martiall matters, as in ciuil gouernment, let vs begin to compare them together. First of all, Pericles began to gouerne the commonweale, at what time the people of ATHENS were in their chiefest prosperitie, and of greater power and wealth, then euer they had bene of before or since. The which might seeme to be a cause of the continuall maintenance of the same in securitie without danger of falling, not so much for their worthinesse, as for their common power and felicitie: where contrariwise Fabius acts fell out in the most dishonorable & vnfortunate time, that euer happened to his countrie, in the which he did not only keepe the citie in good state from declining, but raised it vp, and deliuered it from calamitie, and brought it to be better then he found it. Furthermore, Cimons great good fortune and successe, the victories and triumphes of Myronides, and of Leocrates, and many notable valiant deedes of armes of Tolmides, gaue good cause to Pericles, to entertaine his citie in feasts, and playes, whileſt he did gouerne the ſame: and he did not finde it in ſuch ill caſe and diſtreſſe, that he was driuen to defend it by force of armes, or to conquer that againe which he had loſt. But Fabius in contrary manner, when he ſaw before him many ouerthrowes, great flying away, much murther, great ſlaughters of the generals of the ROMAINE armies, the lakes, the plaines, the woods filled with ſcattered men, the people ouercome, the flouds and riuers running all a gore bloud (by reaſon of the great ſlaughter) and the ſtreame carying downe the dead bodies to the maine ſea: did take in hande the gouernment of his countrie, and a courſe farre contrarie to all other: ſo as he did vnderproppe and ſhore vp the ſame, that he kept it from flat falling to the ground, amongeſt thoſe ruines and ouerthrowes other had brought it too, before him. Yet a man may ſay alſo, that it is no great matter of difficultie to rule a citie already brought lowe by aduerſitie, and which compelled by neceſſitie, is contented to be gouerned by a wiſe man: as it is to bridle and keepe vnder the inſolencie of a people, puft vp with pride, and preſumption of long proſperitie, as Pericles found it amongſt the ATHENIANS. The great multitude alſo of ſo many grieuous calamities, as lighted on the ROMAINES neckes at that time, did plainely ſhew Fabius to be a graue and a conſtant man, which would neuer giue way vnto the importunate cries of the common people, nor could euer be remooued from that he had at the firſt determined. The winning and recouering againe of TARENTVM, may well be compared to the taking of SAMOS, which Pericles wan by force: and the cities of CAMPANIA, vnto the Ile of EVBOEA: excepting the citie of CAPVA, which the Conſuls Fuluius and Appius recouered againe. But it ſeemeth that Fabius neuer wanne battell, ſaue that onely for which he triumphed the firſt time: where Pericles ſet vp nine triumphes, of battels and victories he had wonne, aſwell by ſea as by land. And ſo alſo, they cannot alledge ſuch an acte done by Pericles, as Fabius did, when he reſcued Minutius out of the hands of Hannibal, and ſaued a whole armie of the ROMAINES: which doubtleſſe was a famous acte, and proceeded of a noble minde, great wiſdome, and an honourable heart. But Pericles, againe did neuer commit ſo groſſe an errour as Fabius did when he was outreached and deceiued by Hannibals fine ſtratagem of his oxen: who hauing found his enemie by chance to haue ſhut himſelfe vp in the ſtraight of a vallie, did ſuffer him to eſcape in the night by a ſubtiltie, and in the day by plaine force. For he was preuented by ouermuch delaye, and fought withall by him he kept incloſed. Now if it be requiſite, a good captaine do not onely vſe well that he hath in his hands, but that he wiſely iudge alſo what will follow after, then the warres of the ATHENIANS fell out in ſuch ſort, as Pericles ſaied they would come to paſſe: for with ambition to imbrace too much, they ouerthrew their eſtate. But the ROMAINS contrariwiſe, hauing ſent Scipio into AFRICKE to make wars with the CARTHAGINIANS, wanne all that they tooke in hand: where their generall did not ouercome the enemie by fortune, but by valiantneſſe. So that the wiſedom of the one is witneſſed, by the ruine of his countrie: and the errour of the other teſtified, by the happy euent of that he would haue left.

The gift of a good generall.

Now the fault is a like in a general, to fall into danger, for lack of forecaſt: as for cowardlineſſe to let ſlip a fit opportunitie offred, to do any notable peece of ſeruice. For like default and lack of experience, maketh the one too hardie, and the other too fearfull. And thus much touching the warres. Now for ciuill gouernement: it was a foule blot to Pericles, to be the author of warres. For it is thought, that he alone was the cauſe of the ſame, for that he would not haue them yeeld to the LACEDÆMONIANS in any reſpect. And yet me thinkes Fabius Maximus alſo would no more giue place vnto the CARTHAGINIANS, but ſtood firme and bold in the danger, to maintaine the empire of his countrie againſt them. But the good nature and clemencie Fabius ſhewed vnto Minutius, doth much condemne Pericles acculations and practiſes againſt Cimon and Thucydides: both of them being noble and good men, and taking part with the Nobilitie, whom he expulſed out of ATHENS, and baniſhed for a time. So was Pericles power & authoritie in the commonweale greater: by reaſon whereof he did euer foreſee, that no generall in all his time did raſhly attempt any thing hurtful vnto the commonweale, except Tolmides only: who fled from him, & in deſpight of him went to fight with the BOEOTIANS where he was ſlaine. As for all other generals, they wholly put themſelues into his hands, and did obey him for the greatneſſe of his authoritie. But Fabius, although for his part he neuer commit-committed any fault, and that he went orderly to worke in all gouernement: yet because he was not of power to keepe other from doing ill, it seemeth in this respect he was defectiue. For if Fabius had caried like authoritie in ROME, as Pericles did in ATHENS: the ROMAINES had not fallen into so great miserie as they did. And for liberalitie: the one shewed it, in refusing the money offred him: and the other, in giuing vnto those that needed, and redeeming his poore captiue country men. And yet Fabius might dispend no great reuenue for his whole receiptes came only to sixe talents. But for Pericles, it is hard to say how rich he was, who had comming in to him, great presents by his authoritie, aswell of the subiects, as of the friends and allies of the ATHENIANS, as also of Kings and straunge Princes: yet he neuer tooke bribe for all that, of any person liuing. And to conclude, as for the sumptuous building of temples, the stately workes and common buildings: put all the ornaments together that euer were in ROME, before the times of the Cæsars, they are not to be compared with those, wherewith Pericles did beautifie and adorne the citie of ATHENS. For neither in qualitie nor quantitie was there any proportion or like comparison, betweene the exceeding sumptuousnes of the one, and of the other.

ALCIBIADES by his fathers side, was anciently descended of Eurysaces, that was the sonne of Aiax, and by his mother side of Alcmæon: for his mother Dinomacha, was the daughter of Megacles. His father Clinias hauing armed, and set forth a gallie, at his owne proper costes and charges, did winne great honour in the battell by sea, that was fought alongest the coast of ARTEMISIVM, and he was slaine afterwardes in another battell fought at CORONEA, against the BOEOTIANS. His sonne Alcibiades tutors, were Pericles, and Ariphron Xanthippus sonnes: who were also his neere kinsmen. They say, and truely: that Socrates good will and friendshippe did greatly further Alcibiades honour. For

The mothers of famous men neuer knowen what they were it appeareth not, neither was it euer written, what were the names of the mothers of Nicias of Demosthenes, of Lamachus, of Phormion, of Thrasibulus, and of Theramenes: all which were notable famous men in their time. And to the contrarie, we find the nource of Alcibiades, that she was a LACEDÆMONIAN borne, and was called Amicla, and that his schoolemaster was called Zopyrus; of the which, Antisthenes mentioneth the one, and Plato the other. Now for Alcibiades beautie, it made no matter if we speake not of it, yet I will a litle touch it by the way: for he was wonderfull faire, being a child, a boy, and a man, and that at all times, which made him maruellous amiable, and beloued of euery man. For where Euripides saith, that of all the faire times of the yere, the Autumne or latter season is the faireſt: that commonly falleth not out true. And yet it proued true in Alcibiades, though in few other: for he was passing faire euen to his latter time, and of good temperature of bodie. They write of him also that his tongue was somewhat fat, and it did not become him ill, but gaue a certaine naturall pleasant grace in his talke: which Aristophanes mentioneth, mocking one Theorus that did counterfaite a lisping grace with his tongue.

Alcibiades beautie.

Alcibiades lisped by nature.

This Alcibiades, with his fat lisping tongue, into mine eares, this trustie tale, and song full often sung.
Looke vpon Theolus (quoth he) lo there he bowes, behold his comely crow-bright face with fat and flatling blowes.*
The sonne of Clinias, would lispe it thus somewhiles, and sure he lisped neuer a lie, but rightly hit his wiles.

* The equiuocation of these two Greeke wordes Κῶα and Κόλα, is hard to be expressed in English, in stead whereof I haue set flatling blowes, for flattering browes, obseruing the grace of lisping as neere as I could, like to the Latin and Frenchtranslations, likewise Theolus for Theorus.

And Archippus another poet also, mocking the sonne of Alcibiades, saith thus:

Because he would be like his father euery way in his long trayling gowne he would goe ietting day by day.
And counterfaite his speech, his countenance and face:
as though dame nature had him giuen, therein a perfect grace.
To lispe and looke aside, and hold his head awry, euen as his father lookt and lispt, so would he prate and pry.

For his manners they altered and chaunged very oft with time, which is not to be wondred at, seeing his maruellous great prosperity, as also aduersitie that followed him afterwards. But of all the great desires he had, and that by nature he was most inclined to, was ambition, seeking to haue the vpper hand in all things, and to be taken for the best person: as appeareth by certaine of his deedes, and notable sayings in his youth, extant in writing. One day wrestling with a companion of his, that handled him hardly, and thereby was likely to haue gotten him the fall: he got his fellowes arme in his mouth, and bit so hard, as he would haue eaten it off. The other feeling him bite so hard, let goe his holde straight, and said vnto him: what Alcibiades, bitest thou like a woman? No marie doe I not (quoth he) but like a lyon. Another time being but a litle boy, he plaide at skayles in the middest of the streete with other of his companions, and when his turne came about to throw, there came a cart laden by chaunce that way: Alcibiades praied the carter to staie a while, vntill he had plaied out his game, because the skailes were set right in the high way where the cart should passe ouer. The carter was a stubborne knaue, and would not staie for any request the boy could make, but drue his horse on still, in so much as other boyes gaue backe to let him goe on: but Alcibiades lay flat to the ground before the cart, and bad the carter driue ouer and he durst. The carter being afeard, plucked backe his horse to staie them: the neighbours flighted to see the danger, ranne to the boy in all haste crying out. Afterwards when he was put to schoole to learne he was very obedient to all his masters that taught him any thing, sauing that he disdained to learne to plaie of the flute or recorder: saying, that it was no gentlemanly qualitie. For, said he, to play on the violl with a sticke, doth not alter mans fauour, nor disgraceth any gentleman: but otherwise, to play on the flute, his countenance altereth and chaungeth so, that his familiar friends can scant know him. Moreouer, the harpe or violl doth not let him that plaieth on them, from speaking, or singing as he playeth: where he that playeth on the flute, holdeth his mouth so hard to it, that it taketh not onely his wordes from him, but his voice. Therefore, said he, let the children of the THEBANS play on the flute, that can tell how to speake: as for the ATHENIANS, we haue (as our forefathers tell vs) for protectors and patrones of our countrie, the goddesse Pallas, and the god Apollo: of the which the one in olde time (as it is saide) brake the flute, and the other pulled his skinne ouer his eares, that played vpon a flute. Thus Alcibiades alledging these reasons, partly in sport, and partly in good earnest: did not onely himselfe leaue to learne to play on the flute, but he turned his companions mindes also quite from it. For these wordes of Alcibiades, ranne from boy to boy incontinently: that Alcibiades had reason to despise playing on the flute, and that hee mocked all those that learned to play on it. So afterwards, it fell out at ATHENS, that teaching to play on the flute, was put out of the number of honest and liberall exercises, and the flute it selfe was thought a vile instrument, and of no reputation. Furthermore, in the accusations Antiphon wrote against Alcibiades, it is declared: that when he was a boy, he fled out of his tutors house, into the house of Democrates one of his louers, and how Ariphron one of his tutors thought to haue made a beadle crie him through the citie. But Pericles would not suffer him, saying: that if he were dead, they should know it but one day sooner by crying of him: and if he were aliue, that it would be such a shame to him while he liued, that he had bene better he had neuer bene heard of againe. The same Antiphon accuseth him further, that he had killed a seruant of his that attended on him, in the wrestling place of Sibyrtius, with a blow of a staffe. But there is no reason to credite his writing, who confesseth he speaketh all the ill he can of him, for the ill will he did beare him. Now straight there were many great and rich men that made much of Alcibiades, and were glad to get his good will. But Socrates loue vnto him had another ende and cause, which witnessed that Alcibiades had a naturall inclination to vertue. Who perceiuing that vertue did appeare in him, and was ioyned with the other beautie of his face and bodie, and fearing the corruption of riches, dignitie and authoritie, and the great number of his companions, as well of the chiefest of the citie, as of straungers, seeking to entise him by flatterie, and by many other pleasures: hee tooke vpon him to protect him from them all, and not to suffer so goodly an ympe to loose the hope of the good frute of his youth. For fortune doth neuer so intangle nor snare a man without, with that which they commonly call riches, as to let and hinder him so, that philosophy should not take holde on him with her free, seuere, and quicke reasons. So Alcibiades was at the beginning, assaied with all delightes, and shut vp as it were in their companie that feasted him with all pleasures, only to turne him that he should not hearken to Socrates wordes, who sought to bring him vp at his charge, and to teach him. But Alcibiades notwithstanding, hauing a good naturall wit, knewe what Socrates was, and went to him, refusing the companie of all his rich friendes and their flatteries, and fell in a kinde of familiar friendshippe with Socrates. Whom when he had heard speake, he noted his wordes very well, that they were no perswasions of a man seeking his dishonesty, but one that gaue him good counsell, and went about to reforme his faultes and imperfections, and to plucke downe the pride and presumption that was in him: then, as the common prouerbe saith, Socrates loue to Alcibiades.

Like to the crauen cocke, he drooped downe his winges, which cowardly doth runne away, or from the pit out flinges.

And did thinke with himself, that all Socrates loue & following of yong men, was indeede a thing sent from the goddes, & ordeined aboue for them, whom they would haue preserued, and put into the path way of honour. Therefore he beganne to despise himselfe, and greatly to reuerence Socrates, taking pleasure of his good vsing of him, and much imbraced his vertue: so as he had (he wist not how) an image of loue grauen in his heart, or rather (as Plato saieth) a mutuall loue, to wit, an holy & honest affection towards Socrates. Insomuch as all the world wondred at Alcibiades, to see him commonly at Socrates board, to play, to wrestle, and to lodge in the warres with Socrates: and contrarily to chide his other well willers, who could not so much as haue a good looke at his handes, and besides became daungerous to some, as it is saide he was vnto Anytus, the sonne of Anthemion, being one of those that loued him well. Anytus making good cheere to certaine straungers his friendes that were come to see him, went and praied Alcibiades to come and make merie with them: but he refused to goe. For he went to make merie with certaine of his companions at his own house, & after he had well taken in his cuppes, he went to Anytus house to counterfeate the foole amongest them, ſtaying at the hall doore, and ſeeing Anytus table and cubberd full of plate of ſiluer and gol he commaunded his ſeruants to take away halfe of it, and carie it home to his houſe. But wh he had thus taken his pleaſure, he would come no neerer into the houſe, but went his w home. Anytus friendes and gueſtes miſliking this ſtraunge part of Alcibiades, ſaide it ſhamefully and boldly done ſo to abuſe Anytus. Nay, gently done of him, ſaide Anytus he hath left vs ſome, where he might haue taken all. All other alſo that made much of him ſerued after that ſort. Sauing a ſtraunger that came to dwell in ATHENS: who being poore man as the voyce went, ſold all that he had, whereof he made about a hundred ſt which he brought vnto Alcibiades, and praied him to take it at his hands. Alcibiades beg to be merie, and being very glad to vnderſtand his good will towards him, tooke his offer, and praied him to come to ſupper to him: ſo he welcomed him very hartily, and him good cheere. When ſupper was done, he gaue him his money againe, and comma him not to faile the next morning to meete him where the farmes and landes of the citi wont to be let out to thoſe that bid moſt, and charged him he ſhould out bid all. The po man would faine haue excuſed himſelfe, ſaying, the farmes were too great for him to hire Alcibiades threatned to whippe him, if he would not doe it. For beſides the deſire he ha pleaſure him, he bare a priuate grudge againſt the ordinarie farmers of the citie. The morning the ſtraunger was readie in the market place, where they did cry out the letting their farmes, and he raiſed one to a talent more, then all other did offer. The other far were as mad with him as they could be, that they all did ſet vpon him, crying out: let him in ſuertie ſtraight, ſuppoſing he could haue found none. The ſtraunger was marue blanke thereat, and beganne to ſhrinke backe. Then cried Alcibiades out aloud to the cers that ſate there to take the beſt offers: I will be his ſuertie, ſaieth he; put me in the bo for he is a friend of mine. The farmers hearing him ſay ſo, were at their wittes ende, wiſte not what to doe. For they being alwaies accuſtomed to pay their yerely rent as it before, by the helpe of the reſt of the yeres that followed after: perceiuing nowe that ſhould not be able to pay the arrerages of the rentes due to the common weale, and ſo no other remedie, they praied him to take a peece of money, and to leaue the bargaine. Alcibiades would in no wiſe he ſhould take leſſe then a talent, which they gaue him willin So Alcibiades ſuffered the ſtraunger then to depart, and made him gaine by his deuiſe. Socrates loue which he bare him, though it had many mightie and great aduerſaries, did ſtaie much Alcibiades, ſometime by his gentle nature, ſometime by his graue counſel aduiſe: ſo as the reaſon thereof tooke ſo deepe roote in him, and did ſo peirce his hear many times the teares ranne downe his cheekes. Another time alſo being caried away the intiſement of flatterers, that helde vp his humour with all pleaſure and delightes, he away from Socrates, and made him runne after him to fetch him againe, as if he had b ſlaue that had runne away from his maſters houſe: for Alcibiades ſtoode in awe of no but of Socrates only, and in deede he did reuerence him, and did deſpiſe all other. And be fore Cleanthes was wont to ſay, that Alcibiades was held of Socrates by the eares: but th gaue his other louers holde, which Socrates neuer ſought for: for to ſay truely, Alcib was much giuen ouer to luſt and pleaſure. And peraduenture it was that Thucydides me him, when he wrote that he was incontinent of bodie, and diſſolute of life. Thoſe that Alcibiades quite, did ſtill pricke forward his ambition and deſire of honour, and did pu in the head to thruſt himſelfe into great matters betimes, making him beleeue that if he but once beginne to ſhewe himſelfe to deale in matters of ſtate, he would not onely b and deface all other gouernours, but farre excell Pericles, in authoritie and power amo GRECIANS. For like as iron by fire is made ſoft, to be wrought in any forme, and by c alſo doth ſhut and harden in againe: euen ſo Alcibiades being puffed vp with vanitie and nion of himſelfe, as oft as Socrates tooke him in hande, was made faſt and firme againe b good perſwaſions, inſomuch that when he ſaw his owne fault and follie, and how farre he had ſtraied from vertue, he became ſodainely very humble and lowly againe. Now time when he was growen to mans ſtate, he went into a grammer ſchoole, and asked ſcholemaiſter for one of Homers bookes. The ſchoolemaiſter aunſwered him, he had none of them. Alcibiades vp with his fiſte and gaue him a good boxe on the eare, and went his way. Another grammarian told him on a time he had Homer which he had corrected. Alcibiades replied, why what meaneſt thou, to ſtand teaching litle children their abce, when thou art able to correct Homer, and to teach young men, not boyes? Another time he came and knocked at Pericles gate, deſirous to ſpeake with him: aunſwere was made him, he was not at leyſure now, for that he was buſily occupied by himſelf, thinking on his reckonnings he had to make with the ATHENIANS. Why, ſaid he, going his way: it were better he were occupied, thinking how to make no accompt at all. Moreouer, being but a young boie, he was at the iourney of POTIDÆA, where he laie ſtill with Socrates, who would neuer let him be from him in all battels and skirmiſhes he was in: among which there was one, very whot and bloudy, where they both fought valiantly, and Alcibiades was hurt. But Socrates ſtepped before him, and did defend him ſo valiantly before them all, that he ſaued him and his weapon out of the enemies handes. So the honour of this fight out of doubt, in equitie and reaſon, was due vnto Socrates: but yet the captaines would faine haue iudged it on Alcibiades ſide, becauſe he was of a noble houſe. But Socrates, becauſe he would increaſe his deſire of honor, & would pricke him forward to honeſt and commendable things, was the very firſt that witneſſed Alcibiades had deſerued it: and therefore praide the captaines to iudge him the crowne and complet armour. Afterwards, in the battell of DELION, the ATHENIANS hauing receiued the ouerthrow, Socrates retired with a few other a foote. Alcibiades being on horſe backe, and ouertaking him, would not goe from him, but kept him company, and defended him againſt a troupe of his enemies that followed him, and flue many of his company. But that was a prety while after, and before he gaue a boxe of the eare vnto Hipponicus, Callias father: who was one of the greateſt men of power in the city, being a noble man borne, and of great poſſeſſions, which was done vpon a brauerie and certaine luſtines, as hauing laid a wager with his companions he would doe it, and for no malice or quarrell that hee bare the man. This light part was ſtraight ouer all the citie, and euerie one that heard it, ſaide it was lewdly done. But Alcibiades the next morning went to his houſe, and knocking at his gate was let in: ſo he ſtripping himſelfe before him, deliuered him his body to be whipped, and puniſhed at his pleaſure. Hipponicus pardoned him, and was friends with him, & gaue him his daughter Hipparete afterwardes in mariage. Howbeit ſome ſay, it was not Hipponicus that gaue her to him: but Callias ſonne, with ten talents of gold with her. Afterwards at the birth of the firſt childe hee had by her, he asked ten talents more, ſaying: they were promiſed him vpon the contract, if his wife had children. But Callias fearing leaſt this was an occaſion ſought of him to lye in waite to kill him for his goods: declared openly to the people, that he made him his heire generall, if he died without heires ſpeciall of his body. This gentlewoman Hipparete being an honeſt true wife to Alcibiades, miſliking her husband did ſo much miſuſe her, as to entertain cõmon light ſtrũpets, aſwell citizens as ſtrangers: ſhe went abroad one day to her brothers houſe, and tolde him of it. Alcibiades paſſed not for it, and made no further reckonning of the matter: but only bad his wife, if ſhe would, preſent her cauſe of diuorce before the iudge. So ſhee went thither her ſelfe, to ſue the diuorce betweene them, according to the law: but Alcibiades being there alſo, tooke her by the hand, and caried her through the market place home to his houſe, and no man durſt meddle betweene them, to take her from him. And ſo ſhee continued with him all the daies of her life, which was not long after: for ſhe died, when Alcibiades was in his iourney he made to EPHESVS. This force Alcibiades vſed, was not thought altogether vnlawfull, nor vnciuill, becauſe it ſeemeth that the law was grounded vpon this cauſe: that the wife which would be diuorced from her husband, ſhould goe her ſelfe openly before the iudge to put vp her complaint, to the end, that by this meanes, the husband might come to ſpeake with his wife, and ſeeke to ſtay her if he could. Alcibiades had a maruellous faire great dogge, that coſt him three ſcore and tenne minas, and he cut off his taile that was his chiefe beautie. When his friends reproued him, and told him how euerie man blamed him for it: he fell a laughing, and told them he had that he ſought. For, ſaith he, I would haue the ATHENIANS rather prate vpon that, then they ſhould ſay worſe of me. Moreouer, it is ſaide, the firſt time

Howbeit the good affection diuers cities did beare him, contending which should grati made, with this magnificence and state he shewed, gaue the people more cause to speak him then before. For they say there was one Diomedes at ATHENS, a friend of Alcibia and no ill man, who desired once in his life to win a game at the playes Olympicall. This m had made. Diomedes seeing that fell starke mad for anger, and called the gods and men to witnesses, that Alcibiades did him open wrong: and it seemeth, that there fell out sute in law vpon the same. For Isocrates wrote an oration, and drue a plea in defence of Alcibiades, being yet but a childe, touching a couple of horses: yet in this plea, his aduersarie was called Tisias, and not Diomedes. Furthermore, Alcibiades being yet but a young man, when he came to practise and pleade publikelie, he put all other Orators to silence, but only two that were euer against him: the one was Phæax the sonne of Erasistratus, and the other Nicias the sonne of Niceratus. Of these two, Nicias was a man growen, and had won the name and reputation of a good captaine. And Phæax began also to come forward as he did, being of a good and honourable house: but he lacked many things, and among other, eloquence specially. For, he could more properly talke and discourse among his friends priuately, then he had any good grace to open a matter openly before the people. For he had, as Eupolis sayeth:

Alcibiades aduersaries in the common wealth when he came to plead.

Phæax lacked eloquence.

VVords enow, but no eloquence.

There is a certaine oration extant in writing against Alcibiades and Phæax: where among other accusations is brought in, how Alcibiades was ordinarily serued in his house, with gold and siluer plate that belonged to the common weale, and which were vsed to be born for state and magnificence, in solemne processions before them, and how he vsed them as boldly, as if they had bene his own. Now there was one Hyperbolus in ATHENS at that time, borne in the village of Perithoide: of whō Thucydides maketh mention, as of a naughty wicked mā, whose tongue was a fit instrument to deliuer matter to all the Comicall poets of that time, to powre out all their taunts and mocks against them. Howbeit he was so impudent a person, and cared so litle what men said of him, that he passed not though hee were defamed, neither did anie thing grieue him, whatsoeuer they reported of him: which some do call boldnes, and corage, being no better indeede then plaine impudency, extreme madnes, & desperate folly. He would neuer please any man: and if the common people had any grudge to any noble man or magistrate, whom they would any way accuse, Hyperbolus wicked tongue was their instrument to vtter their spite. Now the people (by Hyperbolus procurement) being assembled, were ready to proceede to the banishment of Ostracismon by most voices. The manner and custome of this kinde of banishment was for a time to banish out of their citie such a one, as seemed to haue great authority and credit in the city: and that was, rather to satisfie their enuy, then for to remedy their feare. And because it was manifest it would fall out to one of them three to be banished (to wit, Alcibiades, Nicias, or Phæax) Alcibiades found means to ioine all their three factions in one, becomming friends one to another: and hauing conferred with Nicias about it, he made Hyperbolus selfe to be banished, who was the chiefe instrument to prepare the way of their banishment. Howbeit other say, he spake not with Nicias about it, but with Phæax, and ioyning his part with Phæax, he caused Hyperbolus to be banished, who fearing nothing lesse, for it was neuer seene before, that a man of meane countenance, and of small authority, fell into the hap of this banishment. As Plato the Comicall poet testifieth, speaking of Hyperbolus.

such punishment therefore did seeme (for him) too great of grace.
Since Ostracismon was, not made at first to be, nor yet deuisde as punishment, for such meane folke as he.

But of this matter, we haue spoken more at large before: and now to returne againe to Alcibiades. Nicias had great reputation among straungers, and his enemies grieued at it no lesse, then at the honour the citizens selues did vnto him. For his house was the common inne for all LACEDÆMONIANS when they came to ATHENS, and they euer laie with him. Moreouer he had very well entertained the LACEDÆMON prisoners, that were taken at the port of PYLE. And afterwards when peace was concluded betweene LACEDÆMON and ATHENS, and their prisoners redeliuered home againe by Nicias meanes onely and procurement: they loued him more then euer they did before. This was blowen abroade through GREECE, that Pericles had kindled the warres amongest them, and Nicias had quenched it: so some called this peace Nicium, as one would say, Nicias worke. But Alcibiades stom- king this, and enuying Nicias glorie, determined to breake the peace whatsoeuer came of it. Wherefore to compasse this matter, knowing first of all that the ARGIVES had no liking of the LACEDÆMONIANS, but were their mortall enemies, and that they did but seeke matter to fall out with them: he secretly put them in hope of peace and league with the ATHENIANS. Moreouer hee did perswade them to it, both by letters and word of mouth, speaking with the magistrates, and such as had greatest authority and credite amongest the people, declaring vnto them, that they should not feare the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yeelde to them in all, but to sticke to the ATHENIANS, who would soone repent them of the peace they had made, and breake it with them. Afterwards when the LACEDÆMONIANS had made league with the BOEOTIANS, and had redeliuered the city of PANACTVM to the ATHENIANS defaced and spoyled, contrarie to the league: Alcibiades perceiuing how the people were much offended thereat, made them more earnest against them, and therewithall brought Nicias in disgrace with the people, and charged him with many matters of great likelyhood, at that time when he was generall: that hee would neuer take anie of the LACEDÆMONIANS, when they were shut vp within the Ile of SPHACTERIA, and much lesse distresse them when he might: and moreouer that when other had taken them prisoners by force, that he had found the meanes to deliuer them, and send them home againe, to gratifie the LACEDÆMONIANS. Furthermore, that being their friend, hee did not his duety to disswade the people from making of league offensiue, & defensiue with the BOEOTIANS and the CORINTHIANS: and againe also, if there were any people of GREECE that had a desire to become friends and allies with the ATHENIANS, that he did the best he could to let them, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had no liking of the matter. Now as Nicias was thus in disgrace with the people, for the causes aboue sayd: in the middest of this sturre, ambassadours came by chance from LACEDÆMON to ATHENS, who at their comming gaue very good wordes, saying they had full power and commission to compound all controuersies, vnder reasonable and equall conditions. The Senate heard them, and receiued them curteously, and the people the next day should assemble in counsell to giue them audience: which Alcibiades fearing much, he went to labour the ambassadours, and spake with them apart in this sort. What meane you, my Lordes of SPARTA: doe yee not know that the Senate hath alwaies accustomed to be gracious and fauourable vnto those that sue vnto them for any matter, and that the people contrarily are of a proude nature, and desirous to imbrace all great matters? If therefore at the first sight, yee doe giue them to vnderstand that you are come hither with full power, to treate freely with them in all manner of causes: doe you not thinke that they make you stretch your authoritie farre, to graunt them all that they will demaund. Therefore, my Lords ambassadours, if you looke for indifferency at the ATHENIANS hands, and that they shall not presse you too farre against your willes, to graunt them any thing of aduantage: I would wish you a litle to couer your full commission, and in open manner to propound certaine articles, as reasonable capitulations of peace, not acquainting them otherwise with your full power to agree in all things: and for my part, I will assure you of my good will in fauour of the LACEDÆMONIANS. When he had tolde them this tale, he gaue them his faithfull promise, and vowed as it were to performe his word. Hereupon Alcibiades turned the ambassadours from the trust they reposed in Nicias, and wanne them on his side: in so much as they gaue credit to no man but to him, wondring much at his great wisedome & ready wit, and they thought him a rare and notable man. The next morning the people were assembled to giue the ambassadours audience. They were sent for, and brought into the market place. There Alcibiades gently asked them, what was the cause of their comming. They answered: that they were come to treate of peace, but they had no power to determine any thing. Then began Alcibiades to be angrie with them, as if they had done him wrong, and not he anie to them, calling them vnfaithfull, vnconstant, and fickle men, that were come neither to doe, nor say any thing worth the hearing. The Senate also were offended with them, and the people rated them very roughly: whereat Nicias was so ashamed and amased withall, that hee could not tell what to say, to see so sodaine a chaunge, knowing nothing of Alcibiades malice subtill practise with the ambassadours. So the ambassadours of LACEDÆMON were dispatched without anything done, and Alcibiades chosen generall who presently brought the ARGIVES, the ELIANS, and the MANTINIANS in league with the ATHENIANS. Though no man did commend this practise of his, in working it after this sort: yet was it a marueilous thing of him to deuise to put all PELOPONNESVS in armes, and to procure such a number of souldiers against the LACEDÆMONIANS, as he did before the citie of MANTINEA, and to shift off the miseries of warre and hazard of battell, so farre from ATHENS. Which if the LACEDÆMONIANS did winne, could not profit them much: and if they lost it, they could hardly saue their citie of SPARTA. After this battell of MANTINEA, the thousand men whom the citie by an ancient order did keepe continually in pay, as well in peace as in warre, within the citie of ARGOS, thinking now opportunitie serued them very trimly: attempted to take the soueraigne authoritie from the common people, and to make themselues Lords of the citie. And to bring this to passe, the LACEDÆMONIANS comming in the meane time, did aide them in their purpose, and so did put downe the gouernement of the people: notwithstanding, immediatly after the people tooke armes againe, and became the stronger. Alcibiades comming thither euen at that time, did warrant them the victorie, and so set vp againe the authoritie of the people. Then he perswaded them to make their walles longer to ioyne their citie to the sea, to the end they might more easily be ayded by sea, by the ATHENIANS. He brought them also from ATHENS, many carpenters, masons, stone hewers, and other workmen: and to conclude, he shewed them by all the meanes and waies he could, that he did beare good will vnto them, and thereby wanne himselfe no lesse fauour particularly among them, then generally he did good vnto his countrie. He did perswade also the citizens of PATRAS to ioyne their towne to the sea, by making long walles, which they built out euen to the cliffes of the sea. And when one said vnto them, alas, poore people of PATRAS, what do yee meane? the ATHENIANS will eate you out. Alcibiades answered him, it may well be, but it shall be by litle and litle, beginning first at the feete: but the LACEDÆMONIANS will deuoure you all at once, and begin at the head. Now although Alcibiades did make the citie of ATHENS strong by sea, yet he did not leaue to perswade the ATHENIANS also, to make themselues strong by land. For he did put the young men oftentimes in minde of the othe they were made to sweare in AGRAVLOS, and did aduise them to accomplish it in deed. Which was, that they should take all corne fields, vines, and olyue trees, to be the borders and confines of ATTICA, whereby they were taught to reckon all land theirs, that was manured, and did bring forth fruite. Yet with all these goodly deedes and faire words of Alcibiades, and with this great courage and quicknesse of vnderstanding, he had many great faults and imperfections. For he was too daintie in his fare, wantonly giuen vnto light women, riotous in banketts, vaine and womanish in apparrell: he ware euer a long purple gowne that swept the market place as he walked vp and downe, it had such a traine, and was too riche and costly for him to weare. And following these vaine pleasures and delights, when he was in his galley, he caused the planckes of the poope thereof to be cut and broken vp, that he might lie the softer: for his bed was not laide vpon the ouerlop, but lay vpon girthes strained ouer the hole, cut out and fastened to the sides, and he caried to the warres with him a gilded scutchion, wherein he had no cognizance, nor ordinarie deuise of the ATHENIANS, but onely had the image of Cupid in it, holding lightning in his hand. The noblemen, and best cittizens of ATHENS perceiuing this, they hated his fashions and conditions, and were much offended at him, and were afeard withall of his rashnesse and insolencie: he did so contemne the lawes and customes of their countrie, being manifest tokens of a man that aspired to be King, and would subuert and turne all ouer hand. And as for the good will of the common people towards him, the poet Aristophanes doth plainely expresse it in these words:

Alcibiades chosen generall.

The walles brought to the sea by the Argiues.

Alcibiades vice.

The people most desire, what most they hate to haue:
and what their minde abhorres, euen that they seeme to craue.

And in another place he said also, aggrauating the suspition they had of him.

For state or commonweale, much better should it be, to keepe within the countrie none such lyons lookes as he.

But if they needs will keepe a lyon to their coſt, then muſt they needs obey his will, for he will rule the roſte.

For to ſay truely: his curteſies, his liberalities, and noble expences to ſhew the people great pleaſure and paſtime as nothing could be more: the glorious memorie of his anceſtors the grace of his eloquence, the beautie of his perſon, the ſtrength and valiantneſſe of his body ioyned together with his wiſedome and experience in martiall affaires I were the very cauſes that made them to beare with him in all things, and that the Athenians did patiently endure all his light parts, and did couer his faults, with the beſt wordes and termes they could, calling them youthfull, and gentlemens ſports. As when he kept Agatharcus the painter priſoner in his houſe by force, vntill he had painted all his walles within: and when he had done, did let him go, and rewarded him very honeſtly for his paines. Againe when he gat the boxe of the care to Taureus, who did pay the whole charges of a companie of commoners, in ſpight of him, to carie away the honour of the games. Alſo when he tooke away a young woman of Melia by his authoritie, that was taken among certaine priſoners in the warres, and kept her for his concubine: by whom he had a childe, which he cauſed to be brought vp. Which they called a worke of charitie, albeit afterwards they burthened him that he was the onely cauſe of murthering of the poore Melians, ſauing the litle childe: becauſe he had fauoured and perſwaded that vnnaturall and wicked decree, which another had propounded. Likewiſe where one Ariſtophon a painter, had painted a curtiſan named Nemea, holding Alcibiades in her armes, and ſitting in her lap, which all the people ran to ſee, and tooke great pleaſure to behold it: the graue and ancient men, were angrie at theſe ſhamefull parts, accompting them impudent things, and done againſt all ciuill modeſtie and temperancie. Wherfore it ſeemed Archeſtratus words were ſpoken to good purpoſe, when he ſaid that Greece could not abide two Alcibiades at once. And on a day as he came from the common hall and aſſembly of the citie, where he had made an excellent oration, to the great good liking and acceptation of all the hearers, and by meanes thereof had obtained the thing he deſired: he was accompanied with a great traine that followed him to his honour: Timon, ſurnamed Miſanthropus (as who would ſay, Lorde-garon, or the manhater) meeting Alcibiades thus accompanied, did not paſſe by him, nor gaue him way (as he was wont to do all other men) but went ſtraight to him, and tooke him by the hand, and ſaid. O, thou dooſt well my ſonne, I cannot thanke, that thou goeſt on, and climeſt vp ſtill: for if euer thou be in authoritie, woe be to thoſe that follow thee, for they are vtterly vndone. When they heard theſe words, thoſe that ſtood by fell a laughing: other reuiled Timon, other againe marked well his words, and thought of them many a time after, ſuch ſundrie opinions they had of him for the vncertaincie of his life, and waiwardneſſe of his nature and conditions. Now for the taking of Sicile, the Athenians did marueilouſlie couet it in Pericles life, but yet they did not medle with it vntill after his death: and then they did it at the firſt vnder colour of friendſhip, as to aide thoſe cities which were oppreſſed, and ſpoiled by the Syracuſans. This was in maner but a plaine bridge made, to paſſe afterwards a greater power and armie thither. Howbeit the firſt procurer of the Athenians, and perſwader of them, to ſend ſmall companies thither firſt and more, but to enter with a great armie at once to conquer all the countrie together, was Alcibiades: who had ſo allured the people with his pleaſant tongue, that vpon his perſwaſions they built caſtles in the ayre, and thought to do greater wonders, by winning onely of Sicilia. For where other did ſet their mindes vpon the conqueſt of Sicile, being that they onely hoped after: it was to Alcibiades, but a beginning of further enterpriſes. And where he commonly in all his perſwaſions, did turne the Athenians from their purpoſe to make warres againſt the Syracuſans, as being too great a matter for them to take the citie of Syracuſa: Alcibiades againe had a further reache in his head, to go conquer Libie and Carthage, and that being conquered, to paſſe from thence into Italie, and Peloponneſus: ſo that Sicilia ſhould ſerue but to furniſh them with victuals, and the ſouldiers for their conqueſts which he had imagined. Thus the young men were incontinently caried away with a maruellous hope and opinion of this iorney, and gaue good eare to old mens tales that told the wonders of the countries: inſomuch as there was no other pa-nor exercise among the youth in their meetings, but companies of men to set round together, drawe plats of SICILE, and describe the situation of LIBYA and CARTHAGE. And yet they say, that neither Socrates the Philosopher, nor Meton the Astronomer did euer hope to see any good successe of this iourney. For the one by the reuealing of his familiar spirit, who told him all things to come, as was thought, had no great opinion of it: and Meton, whether it was for the feare of the successe of the iourney he had by reason, or that he knew by diuination of his arte what would follow, he counterfeited the mad man, and holding a burning torche in his hand, made as though he would haue set his house a fire. Other say, that he did not counterfeit, but like a mad man indeed, did set his house a fire one night, & that the next morning betimes he went into the market place to pray the people, that in consideration of his great losse & his grieuous calamity so late happened him, it would please them to discharge his sonne for going this voyage. So by this mad deuise, he obteined his request of the people for his sonne, whom he abused much. But Nicias against his will was chosen captaine, to take charge of men in these warres, who misliked this iourney, alwell for his companion and associate in the charge of these wars, as for other misfortunes he foresaw therin. Howbeit the ATHENIANS thought the warre would fall out well, if they did not commit it wholly to Alcibiades rashnesse and hardinesse, but did ioyne with him the wisedome of Nicias: and appointed Lamachus also for their third captaine, whom they sent thither, though he were waxen now somewhat olde, as one that had shewed himselfe no lesse venturous and hardie in some battels, then Alcibiades himselfe. Now when they came to resolue of the number of souldiers, the furniture and order of these warres, Nicias sought crookedly to thwart this iourney, and to breake it off altogether: but Alcibiades withstood him, and got the better hand of him. There was an orator called Demostratus, who mooued the people also, that the captaines whom they had chosen for these warres, might haue full power and authoritie to leuie men at their discretion, and to make such preparation as they thought good: whereunto the people condescended, and did authorise them. But when they were euen ready to go their way, many signes of ill successe lighted in the neck one of another: and amongst the rest this was one. That they were commanded to take ship on the day of the celebration of the feast of Adonis, on the which the custome is, that women do set vp in diuers places of the citie, in the middest of the streets, images, like to dead corses which they carie to burial, and they represent the mourning and lamentations made at the funerals of the dead, with lamenting, and beating themselues, in token of the sorrow the goddesse Venus made, for the death of her friend Adonis. Moreouer, the Hermes (which are the images of Mercurie, and were wont to be set vp in euery lane and streete) were found in a night all hacked and hewed, and mangled specially in their faces: but this put diuerse in great feare and trouble, yea euen those that made no account of such toyes. Whereupon it was alledged that it might be the CORINTHIANS that did it, or procured that leude acte to be done, fauouring the SYRACUSIANS, who were their auncient kinsemen, and had beene the first founders of them, imagining vpon this ill token, it might be a cause to breake off the enterprise, and to make the people repent them, that they had taken this warre in hand. Nuertheless, the people would not allow this excuse, neither hearken to their words that said, they should not reckon of any such signes or tokens, and that they were but some light brained youthes, that being tippled, had played this shamefull part in their braueric, or for sporte. But for all these reasons, they tooke these signes very greeuously, and were indeed not a little afeard, as thinking vndoubtedly that no man durst haue bene so bolde to haue done such an abhominable facte, but that there was some conspiracie in the matter. Hereupon, they looked vpon euery suspition and coniecture that might be (how litle or vnlikely soeuer it were) and that very seuerely: and both Senate and people also met in councell vpon it very oft, and in a fewe dayes. Now whilest they were busilie searching out the matter, Andocides a common counseller and orator in the commonwealth, brought before the counsell certaine slaues and strangers that dwelt in ATHENS: who deposed that Alcibiades, and other of his friends and companions, had hacked and mangled other images after that sort, and in a mockerie had counterfeited also in a banket that he made, the ceremonies of the holy mysteries, declaring these matters particularly. the rankest enemies he had. These fine fellowes rose vp in open assembly, and said: it was reason, that he that was now chosen one of the generals of so mightie and puissant an a to require iustice and to purge himselfe of such matters as should be obiected against him.

Alcibiades smelling straight the effect he, and perceiuing the practise of his stay, stept vp, declared how they did him great wrong, to make him depart with the charge of a genera so great an armie, his minde being troubled with continuall feare of so grieuous curses, should leaue vpon him: and that he deserued death, if he could not purge and iustifie h head to trouble him, nor to thinke vpon, but to go on lustely to fight with his enemies, to cast behinde him the danger of all his slanderous detracters. But all this could not swade them. And so he was presently commanded in the behalfe of the people, to imba

ATHENIANS, to come and answer certaine accusations laide to his charge. For as wel you before there was at the beginning, certaine light suspicions and accusations put vp him by some slaues and strangers. But afterwards when he was gone, his enemies enfor them, and hurtened him more cruelly, adding to his former fault, that he had broken images of Mercurie: and had committed sacrilege in counterfeiting in ieast and mock the holy ceremonies of the mysteries, and how into the eares of the people; that both one and the other proceeded of one set conspiracie, to change and alter the gouernment o ſtate of the citie. Vpon theſe informations, the people tooke it in ſo ill part, that they committed all to priſon, that were in any ſort accuſed or ſuſpected thereof, and would neuer let them come to their aunſwere: and moreouer did much repent them that they had not condemned Alcibiades, vpon ſo great complaints and informations as were exhibited againſt him, while his offence was in queſtion before them. And the furie and hatred of the people was ſuch towards him, that if any of Alcibiades friends and acquaintance came within their daunger, they were the worſe handled for his ſake. Thucydides did not name his accuſers, but ſome other doe name Dioclides and Teucer: amongſt whom, Phrynicus the Comicall poet is one, who diſcouereth it in his verſes, by bringing in one that ſpeaketh thus to the image of Mercury. Phrynicus the Comicall poet.

My good friend Mercurie, I pray thee take good heede, that thou fall not, and breake thy necke: for ſo thou might ſt me breede, both daunger and diſtruſt, and though I guiltleſſe be, ſome Dioclides falſely might accuſe and trouble me.

Mercury anſwereth.

Take thou no thought for me, my ſelfe I ſhall well ſaue:
and will foreſee full well therewith that Teucer (that falſe knaue) ſhall not the money get, which he by law hath wonne, for his promouters bribing part, and accuſation.

And yet for all this, theſe tokens doe ſhewe no certainetie of any thing. For one of them being asked, how he could know them by their faces in the night, that had broken and defaced theſe images? he anſwered, that he knewe them well enough by the brightneſſe of the moone. And hereby it appeareth plainely that he was periured, becauſe that the ſame night, on the which this fact was committed, there was a coniunction of the moone. This did a litle trouble and ſtay men of iudgement: howbeit the common ſort of people this notwithſtanding, did not leaue to be as ſharpe ſet, to receiue all accuſations and informations, that were brought in againſt him, as euer they were before. Now there was among the priſoners whoſe cauſe was hanging before them, the orator Andocides (whom Hellanicus the hiſtoriographer deſcribeth to deſcende of the race of Vlyſſes) whom they tooke to be a man that hated the gouernment of the common people, and bent altogether to fauour the ſmall number of the nobilitie. But one of the chiefeſt occaſions why he was ſuſpected to be one of them that had broken the images, was: for that hard by his houſe there was a faire great image ſet vp in olde time, by the familie or tribe of the Ægeides, and that alone amongeſt all the reſt of ſo many famous images, was left whole and vnbroken: whereupon it is called at this day, the Mercury of Andocides, and is ſo called generally of euery bodie, albeit the inſcription ſheweth the contrarie. Andocides being in priſon, chaunced to fall in acquaintance with one Timæus, with whom he was more familiar then with all the reſt, who was alſo priſoner with him for the ſelf cauſe. This Timæus was a man not ſo well knowen as he, but beſides, a wiſe man, and very hardie. He perſwaded him, and put into his head, that he ſhould accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: for taking the matter vpon him, and confeſſing it, he ſhould receiue grace and pardon, according to the courſe and promiſe of the law. Where contrarily, if he ſhould ſtand vpon the courteſie of the iudges ſentence, he might eaſily endaunger himſelfe: becauſe iudgements in ſuch caſes are vncertaine to all people, and moſt to be doubted and feared towarde the rich. And therefore he tolde him it were his beſt way, if he looked into the matter wiſely, by lying to ſaue his life, rather then to ſuffer death with ſhame, and to be condemned vpon this falſe accuſation. Alſo he ſaid if he would haue regard to the common wealth, that it ſhould in like caſe be wiſely done of him, to put in daunger a few of thoſe (which ſtood doubtfull whether in troth they were any of them or not) to ſaue from the furie of the people, and terrour of death, many honeſt men, who in deede were innocent of this lewd fact. Timæus words and perſwaſions wrought ſuch effect with Andocides, that they made him yeld vnto them, & brought him to accuſe himſelfe, and certaine other with him: by meanes whereof Alcibiades according to the lawe had his pardon. But all ſuch as he named and accuſed, were euery man put to death, ſauing ſuch as ſaued themſelues by running away. Furthermore, to ſhadowe his accuſation with ſome apparance of troth, Andocides among thoſe Andocides the orator caſt into priſon.

ANS graunted his requeſt, and receiued him very willingly into their citie: where euen his firſt comming, he did three things. The firſt was: That the LACEDÆMONIANS by perſwaſion and procurement, did determine ſpeedily to ſend aid to the SYRACVSANS, w they had long before delaied: and ſo they ſent Gylippus their captaine to ouerthrowe t THENIANS armie, which they had ſent thither. The ſecond thing he did for them, was he made them of GREECE to beginne warre vpon the ATHENIANS. The third, and greateſt matter of importance, was: That he did counſell them to fortifie the citie of DECELEA, which was within the territores of ATTICA ſelfe: which conſumed, and brought the power of the ATHENIANS lower, then any other thing whatſoeuer he could haue done. And if he were welcome, and well eſteemed in SPARTA, for the ſeruice he did to the common wealth: much more he wanne the loue and good wils of priuate men, for that he liued after the LACONIAN manner. So as they that ſaw his skinne ſcraped to the fleſh, and ſaw him waſh himſelfe in cold water, and how he did eate browne bread, and ſup of their blacke broth: would haue doubted (or to ſay better, neuer haue beleeued) that ſuch a man had euer kept cooke in his houſe, nor that he euer had ſeene ſo much as a perfuming panne, or had touched cloth of tiſſue made at MILETVM. For among other qualities and properties he had (whereof he was full) this as they ſay was one, whereby he moſt robbed mens hearts: that he could frame altogether with their manners and faſhions of life, transforming himſelfe more eaſily to all manner of ſhapes, then the Camelion. For it is reported, that the Camelion cannot take white colour: but Alcibiades could put vpon him any manners, cuſtomes or faſhions, of what nation ſoeuer, & could follow, exerciſe, and counterfaite them when he would, as well the good as the bad. For in SPARTA, he was very painefull, and in continuall exerciſe: he liued ſparingly with litle, and led a ſtraight life. In IONIA, to the contrarie: there he liued daintily & ſuperfluouſly, and gaue himſelf to all mirth and pleaſure. In THRACIA, he dranke euer, or was alwaies on horſe back. If he came to Tiſſaphernes, lieutenant of the mightie king of PERSIA: he farre exceeded the magnificence of PERSIA in pompe and ſumptuouſnes. And theſe things notwithſtanding, neuer altered his naturall condition from one faſhion to another, neither did his manners (to ſay truely) receiue all ſorts of chaunges. But becauſe peraduenture, if he had ſhewed his naturall diſpoſition, he might in diuers places where he came, haue offended thoſe whoſe companie he kept, he did with ſuch a viſerd and cloke diſguiſe himſelfe, to fit their maners, whom he companied with, by transforming himſelfe into their naturall countenance. As he that had ſeene him when he was at SPARTA, to haue looked vpon the outward man, would haue ſaid as the common prouerbe ſaieth:

This woman is no chaungeling.

For he entertained Queene Timæa, King Agis wife of SPARTA, ſo well in his abſence, he being abroad in the warres: that he got her with child, and ſhe her ſelfe denied it not. For ſhe being brought a bed of a ſonne, who was named Leotychides, openly to the world called him by that name: but when ſhe was amongeſt her familiars and very friends, ſhe called him ſoftly Alcibiades, ſhe was ſo farre in loue with him. And Alcibiades ieaſting out the matter, ſaide he had done it for no hurt, nor for any luſt of fleſh to ſatisfie his deſire: but onely to leaue of his race, to reigne amongeſt the LACEDÆMONIANS. This matter was brought by diuers vnto King Agis eares, who at the length beleeued it: but ſpecially when he beganne to make a reckoning of the time, how long it was ſince he lay with his wife. For lying with his wife one night when there was a terrible earthquake, he ranne out of his chamber for feare the houſe would fall on his head: ſo that it was tenne moneths after ere he lay againe with her. Whereupon, her ſonne Leotychides being borne at the end of tenne moneths, he ſaide he was none of his: and this was the cauſe that Leotychides did not ſucceede afterwards in the Kingdome, becauſe he was not of the bloud royall. After the vtter ouerthrowe of the ATHENIANS in SICILIA, thoſe of the Iles of CHIO and LESBOS, with the CYZICENIANS, did ſend all about a tenne ambaſſadours to SPARTA: to let the LACEDÆMONIANS vnderſtand, they had good will to leaue the ATHENIANS, ſo they would ſend them aide to defende them. The BOEOTIANS fauored thoſe of LESBOS: Pharnabazus, the king of PERSIAES lieutenant, fauored the CYZICENIANS. This notwithſtanding, the LACEDÆMONIANS were better affected to help thoſe of CHIO firſt, by the perſwaſion of Alcibiades, who tooke their matters in about that time, all the power of the ATHENIANS were almost in the Ile of SAMOS, fro whence with their armie by sea, they sought to suppresse the rebels that were vp against the and to keepe all that which yet remained. For they were yet pretily strong to resist their e mies, at the least by sea: but they stoode in great feare of the power of Tisaphernes, and of hundred & fiftie gallies which were reported to be comming out of the countrie of PHE CIA, to the aide of their enemies, which if they had come, the citie of ATHENS had bene w terly spoyled, and for euer without hope of recouerie. The which Alcibiades vnderstanding sent secretly vnto the chiefest men that were in the armie of the ATHENIANS at SAMOS, t giue them hope he would make Tisaphernes their friend: howbeit not of any desire hee ha to gratifie the people, nor that he trusted to the communaltie of ATHENS, but only to the ho norable, and honest citizens, and that conditionally so as they had the heart and courage, t bridle a litle the ouer licentiousnes and insolencie of the common people, & that they would take vpon them the authoritie to gouerne, and to redresse their state, and to preserue the citie of ATHENS, from finall and vtter destruction. Vpon this aduertisement, all the heads & chiefe men did giue very good eare vnto it, sauing only Phrynichus, one of the captains, & of the town of DRADES. Who mistrusting (that was true in deeds) that Alcibiades cared not which end went forward, nor who had the chiefe gouernment of ATHENS, the nobility, or the communalty, and did but seeke all the deuises & waies he could, to returne again if it might be possible, in any maner of sort, and that he did but curry fauour with the nobility, blaming and accusing the people: he stood altogether against the motion, whereupon Alcibiades deuise was not followed. And hauing now shewed himselfe open enemy to Alcibiades, he did secretly aduertise Astiochus then admirall to the LACEDAEMONIANS of Alcibiades practise, and warned him to take heed of him, & to lay him vp safe, as a double dealer, & one that had intelligence with both sides: but he vnderstood not how it was but one traitour to speake to another. For this Astiochus was a follower of Tisaphernes for his priuate cõmodity: and perceiuing Alcibiades in such credit with him, he did discouer to Alcibiades all that Phrynichus had aduertised him. Alcibiades straight sent men of purpose to SAMOS, vnto the captains there, to accuse Phrynichus of the treason he had reuealed against them. Those of the counsell there, receiuing this intelligence, were highly offended with Phrynichus. So, he seeing no better way to saue himselfe for mending of this fault, went about to make amends with cõmitting a worse fault. Thereupon he sent again to Astiochus, complaining much he had disclosed him, and yet neuerthelesse promised him if he would keepe his counsell, that he would deliuer the whole fleete and army of the ATHENIANS into his hands. Howbeit this treason of Phrynichus did the ATHENIANS no hurt at all, by reason of Astiochus counter treason: for he did let Alcibiades againe vnderstand what offer Phrynichus had made him. Phrynichus looking to be charged with this again, the second time before the counsell, by means of Alcibiades, did first aduertise the chiefe of the army of the ATHENIANS, That their enemies would come and set vpon them, and where, and how, & gaue them therefore warning to keepe neare their ships, to make a strong watch, and to fortifie themselues with all speed, the which forthwith they did. And as they were about it, there came other letters fro Alcibiades, by the which he did warne them againe to take heed of Phrynichus, because he had practised againe with their enemies, to deliuer the whole army of ATHENS into their hands. But they gaue no credit to his second letters: for they thought that he knowing the preparations and minds of the enemies, would seruc his owne turne with the false accusing of Phrynichus. Notwithstanding this, there was some falshood in fellowship: for one Hermon openly in the market place stabbed Phrynichus in with a dagger, and killed him. The fact being pleaded in law, & throughly considered of the dead body by the sentence of the people was condemned for a traytour: and Hermon the murtherer, and his fellowes, were crowned in recompence of their fact they had done to kill a traitour to the common weale. Wherefore all those that were Alcibiades friends, being at that time the stronger and greater men of the counsell of the army at SAMOS: they sent one Pisander to ATHENS, to attempt to alter the gouernment, and to encourage the noblemen to take vpon them the authority, and to plucke it from the people: assuring them that Tisaphernes would giue them aide to do it, by meanes of Alcibiades, who would make him their friend. This was the colour and cloke wherewithall they serued their turne, that did change the gouernment of ATHENS, & that brought it into the hands of a small number of nobility: for they were in all but foure hundred, and yet they called themselues fiue thousand. But so soone as they felt themselues strong, and that they had the whole authority of gouernment without contradiction in their hands, they made them no more seeme of Alcibiades and so they made warres more coldly and slackly then before. Partly because they mistrusted their citizens, who found the chaunge of gouernment very strange: and partly also because they were of opinion that the LACEDAEMONIANS (who at all times did fauour the gouernment of Nobility) would be better inclined to make peace with them, then the common people that remained still in the city, stirred not, but were quiet against their wils for feare of danger, because there were many of them slaine, that boldly tooke vpon them in open presence to resist these foure hundred. But those that were in the campe, in the yle of SAMOS, hearing these newes, were so grieuously offended: that they resolued to returne incontinently againe vnto the hauen of PYRAEA. First of all they sent for Alcibiades, whom they chose their captaine: then they commaunded him straightly to leade them against the tyraunts, who had vsurped the libertie of the people of ATHENS. But neuertheleſſe he not therein, as another would haue done in this caſe, ſeeing him ſelfe ſo ſodainely crept in fauour with the common people: for he did not thinke he ſhould incontinently pleaſe gratifie them in all things, though they had made him now their generall ouer all their and ſo great an army, being before but a baniſhed man, a vacabond, and a fugitiue. But contrary, as it became a generall worthy of ſuch a charge, he conſidered with him ſelfe it was his part wiſely to ſtay thoſe, who would in a rage and fury careleſſly caſt them away, and not ſuffer them to doe it. And truely Alcibiades was the cauſe of the preſe of the city of ATHENS at that time, from vtter deſtruction. For if they had ſodainely (according to their determination) departed from SAMOS to goe to ATHENS: the enemies no man to let them, might eaſely haue won all the countrey of IONIA, of HELLESPO of al the other Iles without ſtroke ſtriking, whileſt the ATHENIANS were buſie fighti againſt another in ciuill warres, and within the compaſſe of their owne wals. This Al alone, and no other, did preuent, not onely by perſwading the whole army, and declari inconuenience thereof, which would fall out vpon their ſodaine departure: but alſo by ting ſome particularly apart, and keeping a number backe by very force. To bring this one Thraſibulus of the towne of STIRA, did helpe him much: who went through the and cried out vpon them that were bent to enterpriſe this iourney. For he had the bigge loudeſt voice as they ſay, of any man that was in all the city of ATHENS. This was a act, and a great peece of ſeruice done by Alcibiades: that hee promiſed fiue hundred the PHENICIANS (which the LACEDÆMONIANS aſſuredly looked for, in their aide king of PERSIA) ſhould not come at all, or elſe if they came, it ſhould be in the fauour of THENIANS. For he departed immediatly, and went with great ſpeede to Tiſapherne: he handled in ſuch ſort, that he brought not the ſhippes that lay at rode before the city PENDA, and ſo he brake promiſe with the LACEDÆMONIANS. Therefore Alcibi marueilously blamed and accuſed, both of the one and the other ſide, to haue altered T nes mind, but chiefely of the LACEDÆMONIANS: who ſaide that he had perſwaded barous captaine, he ſhould neither aide the one nor the other, but rather to ſuffer them deuour and deſtroy each other. For it had beene out of doubt, if this great fleete and the Kings had come, to ioyne their force with either party: that they had taken from of them, the ſigniory and domination of the sea. Shortly after, the foure hundred no that had vſurped the authority and gouernment of ATHENS, were vtterly driuen away uerthrowen, by meanes of the friendly aide and aſſiſtaunce that Alcibiades friendes g that tooke the peoples part. So the citizens were very well pleaſed with Alcibiad much as they ſent for him to returne when he thought good. But he iudging with it would be no honour nor grace vnto him to returne without ſome well deſerning, he had done ſome greater exploite, as only vppon the peoples fauour and good will, otherwiſe his returne might bee both glorious and triumphant: departed firſt from with a ſmall number of gallies, and went layling vp and downe the Iles of COS and DOS. There he was aduertiſed, that Mindarus, the admirall of the LACEDÆMONI gone with all his fleete vnto the ſtraight of HELLESPONT, and that the captaines THENIANS gaue chaſe vnto him. Thereupon he went alſo and ſayled thither with aide the ATHENIANS: and by very good fortune came with eighteene gallies very inſtant, when they were both in the middeſt of their fight, with all their ſhips cie of ARYDOS. The battell was cruelly foughten betweene them from morning both the one and the other hauing the better in one part of the battell, and the worſ ther place. Now at the firſt encounter of Alcibiades comming, both parties had trary imaginations of him. For the enemies tooke heart vnto them: and the ATH beganne to be afeard. But Alcibiades ſet vp ſtraight his flagge in the toppe of the galli admirall, to ſhew what he was. Wherewithall, he ſet vpon the PELOPONNESIANS the better, and had certaine gallies of the ATHENIANS in chaſe: whereupon the PE NESIANS gaue ouer their chaſe, and fled. But Alcibiades followed them ſo luſtely, that diuerse of them a ground, and brake their ships, and slue a great number of men that leapt into the sea, in hope to saue themselues by swimming a land. So notwithstanding that Pharnabazus was come thither to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, and did his best indeuour to saue their allies by the sea shore: yet the ATHENIANS in the end won thirty gallies of their enemies, and saued all their owne, and so did set vp certaine flagges of triumph and victorie. Alcibiades hauing now happily gotten this glorious victory, would needs goe shew himselfe in triumph vnto Tisaphernes. So hauing prepared to present him with goodly rich presents, and appointed also a conuenient traine and number of saile meete for a generall, hee tooke his course directly to him. But he found not that entertainment he hoped for. For Tisaphernes standing in great hazard of displeasure, and feare of punishment at the Kinges handes, hauing long time before bene defamed by the LACEDÆMONIANS, who had complained of him, that hee did not fulfill the Kings commandement, thought that Alcibiades was arriued in very happy houre: whereupon he kept him prisoner in the city of SARDIS, supposing the wrong hee had done, would by this meanes easily discharge, and purge him to the King. Yet at the end of thirty daies, Alcibiades by fortune got a horse, and stealing from his keepers, fled vnto the city of CLAZOMENES: and this did more increase the suspition they had of Tisaphernes, because they thought that vnder hand he had wrought his liberty. Alcibiades tooke then sea again, and went to seeke out the army of the ATHENIANS. Which when he had found, & heard newes that Mindarus, and Pharnabazus were together in the city of CYZICVM: he made an oration to his souldiers, and declared vnto them how it was very requisit they should fight with their enemies, both by sea and by land, and moreouer that they should assault them within their forts and castels, because otherwise they could haue no money to defray their charges. His oration ended, he made them immediatly hoise saile, and so to go lie at anker in the Ile of PROCONESVS: where he tooke order that they should keepe in all the pinnases and brigantines among the shippes of warre, that the enemy might haue no maner of intelligence of his comming. The great showres of raine also, with thunder and darke weather that fell out sodainly vpon it, did greatly further him in his attempt and enterprise. In so much as not onely his enemies, but the ATHENIANS that were there before, knew nothing of his comming. So some made their reckonning, that they could doe litle or nothing all that day: yet he made them sodainely imbarke, and hoise saile. They were no sooner in the maine sea, but they descried a farre off the gallies of their enemies, which lay at rode before the hauen of CYZICVM. And fearing least the great number of his fleete would make them flie, and take land before hee could come to them: he commaunded certaine captaines to stay behinde, and to rowe softely after him, and him selfe with forty gallies with him, went towardes the enemies to prouoke them to fight. The enemies supposing there had beene no more shippes, then those that were in sight: did set out presently to fight with them. They were no sooner ioyned together, but Alcibiades shippes that came behinde, were also descried: the enemies were so afeard thereat, that they cast about, and fled straight. Alcibiades leauing his fleete, followed the chase with twenty of the best gallies he had, and draue them a land. Thereupon he landed also, and pursued them so couragiously at their heeles, that he slue a great number of the on the maine land, who thought by flying to haue saued them selues. Moreouer, Mindarus, & Pharnabazus, being come out of the city to rescue their people, were ouerthrowen both. He slue Mindarus in the field, fighting valiantly: as for Pharnabazus, he cowardly fled away. So the ATHENIANS spoiled the dead bodies (which were a great number) of a great deale of armour and riches, and tooke besides all their enemies shippes. After they tooke the city of CYZICVM, Pharnabazus hauing left it. Then the PELOPONNESIANS being slaine, they had not only the possession of the whole country of HELLESPONT, which they kept: but they draue their enemis by force out of all partes of the sea. There were at that time certaine letters intercepted, whereby a secretary gaue aduertisement vnto the Ephori at SPARTA, of the ouerthrow in this sort. All is lost, Mindarus is slaine, our people die for hunger, and we know not what to do. Now the souldiers of ATHENS that had beene at this iourney and ouerthrow, grew to such a pride and reputation of them selues, that they would not, and disdained also to serue with the other souldiers that had bene beaten many times, & went away with the worse. good will to serue him in that iourney) would sacke and spoile the citie, he made them all to goe out againe: and so concluding peace with the chiefe of the SELYBRIANIANS, he did them no more hurt vpon their humble submission, but made them pay him a summe of money, and so leauing a garrison of the ATHENIANS within the citie, he departed thence. Whilest Alcibiades was in treatie with the SELYBRIANIANS, the other ATHENIAN captaines that lay at the siege of CHALCEDON, made an agreement with Pharnabazus, that he should giue them a summe of money, and giue vp the towne into the ATHENIANS hands, to enioy it as they had before. And with expresse condition also, that the ATHENIANS should make no rodes into Pharnabazus dominions, to hurt or spoile any of his: and likewise should be bound to giue good safe conduct vnto the ambassadours of the ATHENIANS, to go and come safe from time to time, to the King of PERSIA. The other captaines being sworne to this peace, Pharnabazus conditioned also that Alcibiades at his returne should likewise be sworne to the peace and conditions thereof. But Alcibiades said he would not be sworne at all, vnlesse Pharnabazus were first sworne for his part. Thus when othes were taken of either side, Alcibiades went also against those of BYZANTIVM, who in like case had rebelled against the ATHENIANS. At his first comming thither, he enuironned the citie round about with a wall. Afterwards he practised with two secret friends of his, Anaxilaus & Lycurgus, & certain others within the citie, who promised him to deliuer it into his handes, so they might be assured he would do them no hurt. To colour this practise, he gaue it out, that he must needes leaue the siege, and depart with speed, for certaine news that were come out of IONIA: & thereupon he imbarked presently, and went out of the hauen at none daies with all his ships, howbeit he returned againe the same night. And going a land with the choicest and best armed men he had, he approached the walles of the citie, without any manner of noise, hauing left order with them that remained in the ships, that in the meane season they should rowe with all force into the hauen, with as great cries and shoutes as might be, to feare and trouble the enemies: partly to feare the BIZANTINES the more with their sodaine comming among them, & partly that his confederates within the citie, might with better opportunitie receiue him and his companie into the towne with the more assured safetie, whilest euery man ran to the hauen, to relist them that were vpon the gallies. Neuertheless they went not away vnfought with. For those that lay in garrison within the citie, some of the PELOPONNESIANS, other BOEOTIANS, & other MEGARIANS, did so valiantly repulse them that came out of their gallies, that they draue them to retire abord againe. Afterwards hearing how the ATHENIANS were entred the city on the other side, they put themselues in battell ray, & went to meet them. The battell was terrible of both parts: but Alcibiades in the end obtained victorie, leading the right wing of his battell, & Theramenes the left. The victory being gotten, he toke 300 of his enemies prisoners, who had escaped the furie of the battell. But after the battell, there was not a BYZANTINE put to death, neither banished, nor his goods confiscated: because it was capitulated by Alcibiades with his confederats, that neither he, nor his, should hurt any of the BIZANTINES either in person or goods, nor any way should riffle them. And Anaxilaus being afterwardes accused of treason in LACEDÆMON, for this practise: he answered and iustified himselfe in such sort, that they could not find he had committed the fault laide vnto his charge. For he sayd, that he was no LACEDÆMONIAN, but a BYZANTINE: and that hee saw not LACEDÆMON in daunger, but BYZANTIVM, which the enemies had compassed about with a wall they had built, that it was vnpossible to bring any thing into the city. Moreouer he alledged, that they hauing very small store of corne within the city (as was true indeed) the PELOPONNESIANS, and BOEOTIANS, that laie there in garrison did eate it vp, while the poore BYZANTINES themselues, their wiues and children, died for very hunger. Therefore it could not be saide of him, that he had betrayed his countrey, but rather that he had deliuered it from the miseries and calamities the warres brought vpon it: wherein hee had followed the example of the honestest men of LACEDÆMON, who did acknowledge nothing honest and iust, but that which was necessary and profitable for their country. The LACEDÆMONIANS hearing his reasons he alledged for his purgation, were ashamed to condemne him, and therefore they let him goe. Now Alcibiades desirous in the end to see his native countrey againe (or to speake more truely, that his countrimen should see him) after he had so many times ouerthrowen their enemies battell: he hoised saile and directed his course towards ATHENS, bringing with him all the gallies of the ATHENIANS, richly furnished and decked all about with skutchines & targets and other armor & weapon gotten amongst the spoiles of his enemis. Moreouer, he brought with him many other ships which he had wonne and broken in the warres, besides many ensignes and other ornaments: all which being counted together one with the other, made the number of two hundred ships. Furthermore, where Duris SAMIAN writeth (who chalengeth this be came of his house) that at his returne one Chrysogonus, an excellent plaier on flute (that had wonne certaine of the Pythian games) did play such a note, that at the sound thereof the galley slaues would keepe stroke with their owers, and that Callipides another excellent player of tragedies, playing the part of a comedie, did stirre them to row, being in such like garments as euerie master of such science vseth commonly to weare, presenting himself vpon the stage before the people to shew his art: and that the admirall galley wherein himselfe was, was rigged be hauen with a purple sule, as if some maske had come into a mans house to some great banquet made: neither Ephorus, nor Theopompus nor Xenophon, make any mention of this at all. Furthermore, me thinkes it should not be true, that he returning from exile after so long a banishment, and hauing passed ouer such sorrowes and calamities as he had sustained, would so proudly and presumptuously shew himselfe vnto the ATHENIANS, whereby contrarie, it is most certaine, that he returned in great feare and doubt. For when he was arriued in the hauen of PIRÆA, he would not set foote a land, before he first saw his cosen Euryptolemus, and diuerse other of his friends from the hatches of his ship, standing vpon the sands in the hauen mouthe. Who were come thither to receiue and welcome him, and tolde him that he might be bolde to land, without feare of any thing. He was no sooner landed, but all the people ranne out of euery corner to see him: with so great loue and affection that they tooke no heed of the other captaines that came with him, but clustred all to him only, and cried out for ioy to see him. Those that could come neere him, did welcome and embrace him: but all the people wholly followed him. And some that came to him, put garlands of flowers vpon his head: and those that could not come neere him, saw him a far off, and olde folkes did point him out to the yonger sort. But this common ioy was mingled notwithstanding, with teares and sorow, when they came to thinke vpon their former misfortunes & calamities, and to compare them with their present prosperitie: waying with themselues all how they had not lost SICILIA, nor their hope in all things els had failed them, if they had deliuered themselues & the charge of their armie into Alcibiades hands, when they sent for him to appeare in person before them. Considering also how he found the citie of ATHENS in manner put from the seigniorie and commaundement on the sea, and on the other side how their force by land was brought vnto such extreamitie, that ATHENS scantly could defend her suburbes, the city selfe being so deuided and turmoiled with ciuill dissention: yet he gathered together those few, and small force that remained, and had not only restored ATHENS to her former power and soueraintie on the sea, but had made her also a conquerer by land. Now the decree for his repaire home againe, was past before by the people, at the instant request of Callias, the sonne of Callæschrus, who did prefer it: as he him selfe did testifie in his elegies, putting Alcibiades in remembraunce of the good turne he had done him, saying:

Alcibiades honorable returne into his countrie.

I was the first that moued in open conference, the peoples voice to call thee home, when thou wert banisht hence.
So was I eke the first, which there to gaue consent, and therefore may I boldly say, by truth of such intent:
I was the onely meane, to call thee home againe, by such request so rightly made, to moue the peoples vaine.
And this may serue for pledge, what friendship I thee beare:
fast sealed with a faithfull tongue, as plainely shall appeare.

But notwithstanding, the people being assembled all in counsaile, Alcibiades came before them, and made an oration: wherein he first lamented all his mishappes, and found him selfe greeued a litle with the wronges they had offered him, yet he imputed all in the end to his ow-ed fortune, and some spightfull god that enuied his glorie and prosperitie. Then he dilated at large the great hope their enemies had to haue aduantage of them: and therewithall perswaded the people to be of good courage, and a feard of nothing that was to come. And to conclude, the people crowned him with crownes of golde, and chose him generall againe of ATHENS, with soueraigne power & authority both by land and by sea. And at that very instant was decreed by the people, that hee should be restored againe to his goods, and that the priestes Eumolpides should absolue him of all their curses, and that the heraulds should with open proclamation reuoke the execrations and cursings they had thundered out against him before, by commaundement of the people. Whereto they all agreed, and were very willing, sauing Theodorus the Bishop, who saide: I did neither excommunicate him, nor curse him, if he hath done no hurt to the common wealth. Now Alcibiades flourished in his chiefest prosperitie, yet were there some notwithstanding that misliked very much the time of his landing: saying it was very vnlucky and vnfortunate. For the verie day of his returne and arriuall, fell out by chaunce on the feast which they call Plynteria, as you would say, the washing day, which they celebrate in honour of Minerua: on the which day, the priestes that they call Praxiergides, do make certain secret and hidden sacrifices and ceremonies, being the fiue and twentieth day of the moneth of September, and do take from the image of this goddesse, all her rayment and iewels, and keepe the image close couered ouer. Hereupon the ATHENIANS do ascribe that day, for a most vnfortunate day, and are very circumspect to do any matter of importance on it. Moreouer, it was commonly scanned abroade of euery body, that it seemed the goddesse was not content, nor glad of Alcibiades returne: and that she did hide her selfe, because she would not see him, nor haue him come neere her. Notwithstanding all these toyes and ceremonies, when Alcibiades found euery thing fall out well at his returne, and as he would haue wished it: he armed a hundred galleys presently, to returne againe to the warres. Howbeit he wisely regarded the time and solemnitie of celebration of these mysteries, and considerately staied vntill they had finished all. And it fell out, that after the LACEDAEMONIANS had taken & fortified the citie of DECELEA, within the territorie of ATTICA, and that the enemies being the stronger in the field, did keepe the way going from ATHENS to ELEVSIN, so as by no possible meanes they could make their solemne procesiō by land, with such honour and deuotion as they were before accustomed to do: and thereby all the sacrifices, daunces, and many other holy deuoute ceremonies they were wonte to do by the way, in singing the holy songe of Iacchus, came of very necessitie to be left off, and cleane laide a side. Then Alcibiades thought he should do a meritorious deed to the goddes, and an acceptable to men, to bring the olde ceremonies vp againe vpon the said feast: and thereupon purposed to accompanie the procession, & defend it by power against all inuasion and disturbance by the enemies. As one that foresawe one of those two things would come to passe. Either that Agis king of the LACEDAEMONIANS would not sturre at all against the sacred ceremonies, and by this meanes should much imbase and diminish his reputation and glory: or if he did come out to the field, that he would make the battell very gratefull to the goddes, considering it should be in defence of their most holy feast and worshippe, and in the sight of his countrey, where the people should see and witnesse both his valiantnesse, and also his courage. Alcibiades being fully resolued vpon this procession, went and made the priests Eumolpides, their vergers, and other their ministers and officers of these mysteries, priuy to his determination. Then he sent out skoutes to watch on the side of the hilles thereabouts, and to view the way of their perambulation. The next morning very early hee sent out light horsemen also to scowre the countrey. Then he made the priests, she professed, and all the ministers of religion, goe in procession, together with those that followed the same: and he himselfe compassed them about with his army on euery side, marching in battell ray, and verie good order, and with great silence. This was an honourable and deuout leading of an army, and such as if his greatest enemies would confesse a troth, they could not but say, Alcibiades had as much shewed the office of a high bishoppe, as of a noble souldier and good captaine. So he ended this procession, returning to ATHENS in all safe order againe, and not an enemy that durst once looke out into the field to set vppon them. Now this did more in-lost many shippes, for that he regarded not his charge, carelessely putting men in trust, whom he gaue too great credit to, because they were good fellowes, and would drinke drunke with him, and were full of marriners mockes and knauish ieastes, such as they vse commonly amongst themselues. And that he in the meane time tooke his pleasure abroad, here and there, scraping money together where he could come by it, keeping good cheere, and feasting of the Abidenian and Ionian courtisans, when the enemies armie was so neere theirs as it was. Moreouer, they laide to his charge, that he did fortifie a castle in the countrie of Thracia, neere vnto the citie Bisanthe, for a place to retire himselfe vnto, either because hee could not, or rather that he would not, liue any longer in his owne countrie. Vpon those accusations, the Athenians giuing ouer credit to the report: did immediatly chuse new captaines, and thereby declared their misliking. Alcibiades hearing of this, and fearing least they would doe him some worse harme, did leaue straight the Athenians campe, and gathering a certaine number of straungers together, went of himselfe to make warre vpon certaine free people of the Thracians, who were subiect to no prince nor state: where he got a maruellous masse of money together, by meanes whereof he did assure the Grecians inhabiting those marches, from all inuasion of forreine enemies. Now Tydeus, Menander, and Adimantus the Athenians captaines, being afterwardes in a place commonly called the goates riuer, with all the gallies the citie of Athens had at that time vppon that coast: vsed euerie morning commonly to goe to the sea, to offer battell to Lysander, who rode at an ancker before the city of Lampsacus, with all the Lacedæmonians army by sea, and commonly returned againe to the place from whence they came, in very ill order, without either watch or warde, as men that were careless of their enemies. Alcibiades being on the land not farre off, and finding their great fault and negligence: tooke his horse, and went to them, and told them that they lay on an ill shore, where there was no good rode, nor towne, and where they were driuen to seeke their vittels, as farre as to the city of Sestos, and that they suffered their mariners to leaue their shippes, and goe a land when they lay at ancker, straggling vp and downe the countrey as they would themselues, without regard that there lay a great army of their enemies before them, readie to bee set out at their generals commaundement: and therefore hee aduised them to remoue thence, and to goe to cast ancker before the city of Sestos. Howbeit the captaines would not be aduised by him: and that which was worst of all, Tydeus, one of the captaines, stoutly commaunded him to get him away, as one that had nothing to doe with the matter, and that other had charge of the army. Whereupon Alcibiades fearing they would purpose some treason against him, did depart presently from them. And as hee went his way, he saide to some of his friends which accompanied him out of the campe at his returne: that if the captaines of the Athenians had not beene so round with him, he would haue forced the Lacedæmonians to haue come to the battell in despight of their beardes, or else he would haue driuen them to forsake their shippes. Some tooke this for a glorious bragge: other thought he was like enough to haue done it, because he could haue brought from land a great number of Thracians, both archers and horsemen, with whom he might haue giuen a charge vpon the Lacedæmonians, and done great michiefe vnto their campe. But now, how wisely Alcibiades did foresee the faults he tolde the Athenians captaines of: their great misfortune and losse that followed incontinently, did too plainly witnesse it to the worlde. For Lysander came so fiercely vpon them on a sodaine, that of all the ships that they had in their whole fleete, onely eight galleys were saued, with whom Conon fled: and the other being not much lesse then two hundred in number, were euery one of them taken and caried away, with three thousand prisoners whom Lysander put to death. Shortly after, he tooke the citie selfe of Athens, and rased their long walles euen to the grouud. After this great and notable victorie, Alcibiades fearing sore the Lacedæmonians, who then without let or interruption of any, were only Lords and Princes by sea and by land: he went into the countrie of Bithynia, and caused great good to be brought after him, and tooke a maruellous summe of money with him, besides great riches he left also in the castels of Thracia, where he did remaine before. Howbeit he lost much of his goods in Bithynia, which certaine Thracians dwelling in that country, had robbed him of, & taken from him. So he

Now Alcibiades thinking he could vſe no better meane, then Pharna helpe only, to ſee him ſafely conducted to the Kings court: he propoſed his iourney to hi to the countrie of PHRYGIA, where he abode a certain time to attend vpon him, & was honorably entertained and receiued of Pharnabazus. late, after all was loſt (where they might haue recouered againe, if they had bene wiſe) they ganne together to bewaile and lament their miſeries and wretched ſtate, looking backe v all their wilfull faultes and follies committed: among which, they did reckon their ſec time of falling out with Alcibiades, was their greateſt fault. So they baniſhed him only of lice and diſpleaſure, not for any offence himſelfe in perſon had committed againſt them, ſa that his lieutenant in his abſence had ſhamefully loſt a few of their ſhips: and they themſe more ſhamefully had driuen out of their citie, the nobleſt ſouldier, and moſt skilfull capt that they had. And yet they had ſome litle poore hope left, that they were not altogether away, ſo long as Alcibiades liued, and had his health. For before, when he was a forſaken and led a baniſhed life: yet he could not liue idlely, and do nothing. Wherefore now more, ſaid they to themſelues: if there be any helpe at all, he will not ſuffer out of dou inſolencie and pride of the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor yet abide the cruelties and outra theſe thirtie tyrants. And ſurely the common people had ſome reaſon to haue theſe thou in their heads, conſidering that the 30 gouernors themſelues did what they could poſſibly out Alcibiades doings, and what he went about. Inſomuch as Critias at the laſt, declared to ſander, that ſo long the LACEDÆMONIANS might reckon themſelues Lordes ou GREECE, as they kept from the common people the rule and authoritie of the citie THENS. And further he added, that notwithſtanding the people of ATHENS could well to liue like ſubiects vnder the gouernement of a fewe: yet Alcibiades whileſt he liued, w neuer ſuffer them ſo to be reigned ouer, but would attempt by all deuiſe he could to bri change and innouation among them. THE LIFE OF CAIVS Martius Coriolanus.

THE house of the Martians at ROME was of the number of the Patricians, out of the which hath sprong many noble personages, whereof Ancus Martius was one, king Numaes daughters sonne, who was king of ROME after Tullus Hostilius. Of the same house were Publius, & Quintus, who brought to ROME their best water they had by conduites. Censorinius also came of that familie, that was so surnamed, because the people had chosen him Censor twise. Through whose persuasion they made a lawe, that no man from thenceforth might require, or enioy the Censorship twise. Caius Martius, whose life we intend now to write, being left an orphan by his father, was brought vp vnder his mother a widowe, who taught vs by experience, that orphanage bringeth many discommodities to a childe, but doth not hinder him to become an honest man, and to excell in vertue aboue the common sorte: as they that are meanely borne, wrongfully doe complaine, that it is the occasion of their casting awaye, for that no man in their youth taketh any care of them to see them well brought vp, and taught that were meete. This man also is a good proofe to confirme some mens opinions. That a rare and excellent witte vntaught, doth bring forth many good and euill thinges together, like a fat soile bringeth forth herbes & weedes that lieth vnmanured. For this Martius naturall wit and great hart did maruellously sturre vp his courage to doe and attempt notable actes. But on the other side for lacke of education, he was so cholericke and impacient, that he would yeeld to no liuing creature: which made him churlish, vnciuil, and altogether vnfit for any mans conuersation. Yet men marueling much at his constancie, that he was neuer ouercome with pleasure, nor money, and how he would endure easilie all manner of paines and trauailles: thereupon they well liked and commended his stowtnes and temperancie. But for all that, they could not be acquainted with him, as one citizen vseth to be with another in the cittie. His behauiour was so vnpleasant to them by reason of a certaine insolent and sterne manner he had, which because it was too lordly, was disliked. And to say truly, the greatest benefite that learning bringeth men vnto, is this: that it teacheth men that be rude and rough of nature, by compasse and rule of reason, to be ciuill and curteous, & to like better the meane state, then the higher. Now in those dayes, valiantnes was honoured in ROME aboue all other vertues: which they call virtus, by the name of vertue it selfe, as including in that generall name, all other speciall vertues besides. So that virtus in the Latin, was as much as valiantnesse. But Martius being more inclined to the warres, then any other gentleman of his time: beganne from his childehood to giue himselfe to handle weapons, and dayly did exercise himselfe therein. And outward he esteemed armour to no purpose, vnles one were naturally armed within. Moreouer he did so exercise his bodie to hardnes and all kind of actiuitie, that he was very swift in running, strong in wrestling, & mightie in griping, so that no man could euer cast him. Insomuch as those that would trie masterie with him for strengh and nimblenes, would saye when they were ouercome: that all was by reason of his natural strengh, and hardnes of warde, that neuer yeelded to any paine or trauell he tooke vpon him. The first time he went to the warres, being but a stripling, was when Tarquine surnamed the prowde (that had bene king of ROME, and was driuen out for his pride) after many attemptes made by sundry battelles to come in againe, wherein he was euer ouercome (did come to ROME, with all the ayde of the LATINES, & many other people of ITALIE: euen as it were to set vp his whole rest vpon a battell by them, who with a great & mightie armie had vndertaken to put him into his kingdome againe, not so much to pleasure him as to ouerthrow the power of the ROMAINES, whose greatnes they both feared and enuied. In this battell, wherein were many hotte and sharpe encounters of either partie, Martius valiantly fought in the sight of the Dictator: & a ROMAINE souldier being thrown to the ground euen harde by him, Martius straight bestrid him, and slew the enemie with his owne hande that had before ouerthrown the ROMAINE. Hereupon, after the battell was wonne, the Dictator did not forget so noble an acte, and therefore first of all he crowned Martius with a garland of oken boughs. For whosoeuer saueth the life of a ROMAINE, it is a māner among them to honour him with such a garland. This was, either because the lawe did this honour to the oke, in fauour of the ARCADIANS, who by the oracle of Apollo were in olde time called aeges of akornes: or else because the souldiers might easily in euery place come by oke boughes: or lastly, because they thought it very necessarie, to giue him that had saued a citizens life, a crowne of this tree to honour him, being properly dedicated vnto Iupiter, the patron and protectour of their cities, and thought amongst other wilde trees to bring forth most profitable frute, and of plantes to be the strongest. Moreouer, men at the first beginning vsed akornes for their bread, and honie for their drinke: and further, the oke did feede their beastes, and giue them birdes, by taking glue from the okes, with the which they made birdlime to catch seely birdes. They saye that Castor, and Pollux, appeared in this battell, and that incontinently after the battell, men sawe them in the market place at ROME, all their horses being on a white some: and they were the first that brought newes of the victorie, euen in the same place, where remaineth at this present a temple built in the honour of them neere vnto the fountaine. And this is the cause, why the day of this victorie (which was the fifteenth of July) is consecrated yet to this day vnto Castor and Pollux. Moreouer it is daily seene, that honour and reputation lighting on yong men before their time, and before they haue no great courage by nature: the desire to winne more, dieth straight in them, which easily happeneth, the same hauing no deepe roote in them before. Where contrarie wise, the first honour that valiant mindes do come vnto, doth quicken vp their appetite, hasting them forward as with force of winde, to enterprise thinges of high deseruing praise. For they esteeme not, to receiue reward for seruice done, but rather take it for a remembrance and encouragement, to make them doe better in time to come: and be ashamed also to cast their honour at their heeles, not seeking to increase it still by like desert of worthie valiant deedes. This desire being bred in Martius, he strained still to passe himselfe in manlines: and being desirous to shew a daylie increase of his valiantnesse, his noble seruice did still aduance his fame, bringing in spoyles vpon spoyles from the enemie. Whereupon, the captaines that came afterwards (for enuie of them that went before) did contend who should most honour him, and who should beare most honorable testimonie of his valiantnes. Insomuch the ROMAINES hauing many warres and battells in those dayes, Coriolanus was at them all: and there was not a battell fought, from whence he returned not without some reward of honour. And as for other, the only respect that made them valiant, was they hoped to haue honour: but touching Martius, the onely thing that made him to loue honour, was the ioy he sawe his mother did take of him. For he thought nothing made him so happie and honorable, as that his mother might heare euerie body praise and commend him, that shee might alwayes see him returne with a crowne vpon his head, and that she might still imbrace him with teares running downe her cheekes for ioye. Which desire they say Epaminondas did auow, and confesse to haue beene in him: as to thinke himselfe a most happie and blessed man, that his father and mother in their life time had seene the victorie he wanne in the plaine of LEVCTRES. Now as for Epaminondas, he had this good happe, to haue his father and mother liuing, to be partakers of his ioye and prosperitie. But Martius thinking all due to his mother, that had beene also due to his father if he had liued: did not only content himselfe to reioyce and honour her, but at her desire tooke a wife also, by whome he had two children, and yet neuer left his mothers house therefore. Now he being growen to great credit & authoritie in ROME for his valiantnes, it fortuned there grewe sedition in the cittie, because the Senate did fauour the rich against the people, who did complaine of the sore oppression of vsurers, of whom they borrowed money. For those that had litle, were yet spoyled of that litle they had by their creditours, for lacke of abilitie to paye the vsurie: who offered their goodes to be solde to them that would giue most. And such as had nothing left, their bodies were layed hold on, and they were made their bondmen, notwithstanding all the woundes and cuttes they shewed, which they had receiued in many battells, fighting for defence of their countrie and common wealth: of the which, the last warre they made was against the SABINES, wherein they fought vpon the promise the rich men had made them, that from thenceforth they would intreate them more gently and also vpon the word of Marcus Valerius chiefe of the Senate, who by authoritie of the Counsell, & in the behalfe of the rich, sayed they should performe that they had promised. But after that they had faithfully serued in this last battell of all, where they ouercame their enemies, seeing they were neuer a whit the better, nor more gently intreated, and that the Senate would giue no care to them, but made as though they had forgotten their former promise, and suffered them to be made slaues and bondemen to their creditours, and besides, to be turned out of all that euer they had: they fell then euen to flat rebellion and mutinie, and to sturre vp daungerous tumults within the cittie. The ROMAINES enemies hearing of this rebellion did straight enter the territories of ROME with a maruellous great power, spoyling and burning all as they came. Whereupon the Senate immediatly made open proclamation by sound of trumpet, that all those that were of lawfull age to earie weapon, should come and enter their names into the muster masters booke, to goe to the warres: but no man obeied their commaundement. Whereupon their chiefe magistrates, and many of the Senate, began to be of diuers opinions among themselues. For some thought it was reason, they should somewhat yeelde to the poore peoples request, and that they should a litle qualifie the seueritie of the lawe. Other held hard against that opinion, and that was Martius for one. For he alleaged, that the creditours losing their money they had lent, was not the worst thing that was thereby: but that the enitie that was fauored, was a beginning of disobedience, and that the proude attempt of the communaltie, was to abolish law, and to bring all to confusion. Therefore he sayed, if the Senate were wise, they should betimes preuent and quench this ill fauored & worse ment beginning. The Senate met many dayes in consultation about it: but in the end they concluded no thing. The poore common people seeing no redresse, gathered themselues one day together and one encoraging another, they all forsooke the cittie, and encamped themselues vpon a hil called at that daye the holy hill, alongest the riuer of Tyber, offring no creature any hurt violence, or making any shewe of actuall rebellion: sauing that they cried as they went vp and downe, that the rich men had driuen them out of the cittie, and that all ITALIE through the should find aire, water, and ground to burie them in. Moreouer, they sayd, to dwell at Rome was nothing else but to be slaine, or hurt with continuall warres, and fighting for defence of the rich mens goodes. The Senate being afeard of their departure, did send vnto them certaine of the pleasanteſt olde men, and the most acceptable to the people among them. Of those Menenius Agrippa was he, who was sent for chiefe man of the message from the Senate. He, after many good persuasions and gentle requestes made to the people, on the behalfe of the Senate: knit vp his oration in the end, with a notable tale, in this manner. That on a time all the members of mans body did rebell against the bellie, complaining of it, that it onely remained in the middest of the bodie, without doing any thing, neither did beare any labour for the maintenaunce of the rest: whereas all other partes and members did labour paynefully & were very carefull to satisfie the appetites and desires of the bodie. And so the bellie, all notwithstanding laughed at their follie, and sayed. It is true, I first receiue all meates that nourish mans bodie: but afterwardes I send it againe to the norishment of orher partes of the body. Euen so (quoth he) ô you, my maisters, and cittizens of Rome: the reason is alike betweene the Senate & you. For matters being wel digested, & their counsells throughly examined touching the benefite of the common wealth: the Senatours are cause of the common cõmodity that cõmeth vnto euery one of you. These persuasions pacified the people, conditionally that the Senate would graunt there should be yerely chosen fiue magistrates, which they now call Tribuni plebis, whose office should be to defend the poore people from violence and oppression. So Iunius Brutus, and Sicinnius Vellutus, were the first Tribunes of the people that were chosen, who had onely bene the causers & procurers of this sedition. Hereupon the cittie being grown againe to good quiet and vnitie, the people immediately went to the warres, shewing that they had a good will to do better then euer they did, and to be very willing to obey the magistrates in that they would commaund, concerning the warres. Martius also, though liked him nothing to see the greatnes of the people thus increased, considering it was to the preiudice, and imbasing of the nobilitie, and also sawe that other noble Patricians were troubled as well as himselfe: he did persuade the Patricians, to shew themselues no lesse forward and willing to fight for their countrie, then the common people were: and to let them see by their deedes and actes, that they did not so much passe the people in power and riches, as they did exceede them in true nobilitie and valiantnesse. In the countrie of the Volsces against whom the Romaines made war at that time, there was a principall cittie & of great fame, that was called Corioles, before the which the Consul Cominius did laye siege. Wherefore al the other Volsces fearing least that cittie should be taken by assault, came from all partes of the countrie to saue it, entending to giue the Romaines battell before the cittie, and to giue an onset on them in two seuerall places. The Consul Cominius understanding this, deuided his armie also into two partes, and taking the one part with him he marched towards them that were drawing to the cittie, out of the countrie: and the other part of his armie he left in the campe with Titus Latius (one of the valianteſt men the Romaines had at that time) to resist those that would make any saly out of the cittie vpon them. So the Coriolans making small accompt of them that laye in campe before the cittie, made a salye out vpon them, in the which at the first the Coriolans had the better, and draue the Romaines backe againe into the trenches of their campe. But Martius being there at that time, running out of the campe with a fewe men with him, he slew the first enemies he met withal, and made the rest of them stay vpon the sodain, crying out to the Romaines that turned their backes, and calling them againe to fight with a loud voyce. For he was euen such another, as Cato would haue a souldier and a captaine to be, not only terrible, and fierce to looke about him, but to make the enemie afearde with the sounde of his voyce, and grimnes of countenance. Then there flocked about him immediately, a great number of ROMAINES: whereat the enemies were so afeard, that they gaue backe presently. But Martius not staying so, did chase and followe them to their owne gates, that fled for life. And there perceiuing that the ROMAINES retired backe, for the great number of dartes and arrowes which flewe from their gates frō the walles of the cittie, & that there was not one man amongest them that durst venter himselfe to follow the flying enemies into the cittie, for that it was full of men of warre, very well armed, and appointed: he did encorage his fellowes with wordes and deedes, crying out to them, that fortune had opened the gates of the cittie, more for the followers then the flyers. But all this notwithstanding, few had the harte to follow him. Howbeit Martius being in the throng among the enemies, thrust himselfe into the gates of the cittie, and entred the same among them that fled, without that any one of them durst at the first turne their face vpon him, or else offer to stay him. But he looking about him, & seeing he was entred the cittie with very fewe men to helpe him, and perceiuing he was enuironed by his enemies that gathered round about to set vpon him: did things (as it is written) wonderfull and incredible, aswell for the force of his hand, as also for the agilitie of his body, and with a wonderfull courage and valiantnes, he made a lane through the middest of them, and ouerthrew also those he layed at: that some he made runne to the furthest part of the cittie and other for feare he made yeelde themselues, and to let fall their weapons before him. By this meanes, Martius that was gotten out, had some leasure to bring the ROMAINES with more safetie into the cittie. The cittie being taken in this sorte, the most part of the souldiers beganne incontinently to spoile, to carry away, and to looke vpō the bootie they had wonne. But Martius was inwardly angry with them, and cryed out of them, that it was no time now to looke after spoyle, and to runne straglingly heere and there to enrich themselues, whilest the other Consul and their fellowe citizens peraduenture were fighting with their enemies: and how that leaving the spoyle, they should seeke to winde them selues out of daunger and perill. Howbeit (in vaine) he did say, to them what he could, very fewe of them would harken to him. Wherefore taking those that willingly offered themselues to followe him, he went out of the cittie, and tooke his waye towardes that parte, where he vnderstoode the rest of the armie was: exhorting and intreating them by the waye that followed him not to be fainte harted, and often holding vp his handes to heauen, he besought the goddes to be gracious and fauorable vnto him, that he might come in time to the battell, and in a good houre to hazarde his life in defence of his countriemen. Now the ROMAINES when they were put in battell raye, and readye to take their targettes on their armes, and to girde them vpon their arming coates, had a custome to make their willes at that very instant, without any manner of writing, naming him only whom they would make their heir in the presence of three or foure witnesses. Martius came iust to that reckoning, whilest the souldiers were doing after that sorte, and that the enemies were approached so neere, as one stoode in viewe of the other. When they sawe him at his first comming, all blouddy, and in a swet, and but with a fewe men following him: some thereupon beganne to be afeard. But soone after, when they sawe him runne with a liuely cheere to the Consul, and to take him by the hande, declaring howe he had taken the cittie of CORIOLES, and that they sawe the Consul Cominius so kisse and imbrace him: then there was not a man but tooke harte againe to him, and beganne to be of a good courage, some hearing him report from poynt to poynt, the happie successe of his exployte, and other also coniecturing it by seeing their gestures a farre off. Then they all beganne to call vpon the Consul to marche forward, and to delaye no longer but to giue charge vpon the enemie. Martius asked him howe the order of their enemies battell was, and on which side they had placed their best fighting men. The Consul made him answer, that he thought the bandes which were in the vowarde of their battell, were those of the ANTIATES, whom they esteemed to be the warlikest men, and which for valiant courage would giue no place, to any of the hoste of their enemies. Then prayed Martius, to be set directly against them. The Consul granted him, greatly prayising his courage. Then Martius, when both armies came almost to ioyne, aduaunced himselfe a good space before his companie, and went so fiercely to giue charge on the vowarde that came right against him, that they could stand no longer in his handes: hee made such a lane through them, and opened a passage into the battell of the enemies. But the two winges of either side turned one to the other, to compasse him in betweene them: which the Consull perceiuing, he sent thither straight of the best souldiers he had about him. So the battell was maruellous bloudie about Martius, and in a very shorte space many were slaine in the place. But in the end the ROMAINES were so strong, that they distressed the enemies, and brake their arraye: and fourcing them, made them flye. Then they prayed Martius that he would retire to the campe, because they sawe he was able to doe no more, he was already wearied with the great paine he had taken, and so fainte with the great woundes he had on him. But Martius answered them, that it was not for conquerours to yeelde, when he fainted: and thereupon beganne a fresh to chase those that fledde, vntill such time as the armie of the enemies was vtterly ouerthrowne, and numbers of them slaine and prisoners. The next morning betimes, Martius went to the Consull, and the other ROMAINES with him. There the Consull Cominius going vp to his chayr of state, in the presence of the whole armie, gaue thankes vnto the goddes for so great, glorious, and prosperous victorie: then he spake to Martius, whose valiantnesse he commended beyond the moone, both for that he himselfe sawe him do with his eyes, as also for that Martius had reported vnto him. So in the ende he willed Martius, that he should choose out of all the horses he had taken of their enemies, and of all their goodes they had wonne (whereof there was great store) tenne of euerie sorte which he liked best, before any distribution should be made to other. Besides this great honourable offer he had made him, he gaue him in testimonie that he had wonne that daye the price of proweesse aboue all other, a goodly horse with a rich saddle, and all furniture to him: which the whole armie beholding, did maruellously like and commend. But Martius stepping forth, told the Consull, he most thankefully accepted the gift of his horse, and was a glad man besides, that his seruice had deserued his generall commendation: and as for his other offer, which was rather a mercenarie reward, then honorable recompence, he would haue none of it, but was contented to haue his equall part with other souldiers. Onely, this grace (sayed he) I craue and beseech you to graunt me. Among the VOLSCES there is an olde friend and hoast of mine, an honest wealthie man, now a prisoner, who liuing before in great wealth in his owne countrie, liueth now as a poore prisoner, in the handes of his enemies: and yet notwithstanding all this his misfortune, it would do me great pleasure if I could haue him from this one danger: and that is, to haue him from being solde as a slaue. The souldiers hearing Martius wordes, made a maruellous great shoute among them: and there were more that wondred at his great contemning of riches and abstinence, when they sawe so litle couetousnes in him, then they were that highly praised and extolled his valiantnes. For euen they themselues, that did somewhat malice and enuie his glorie, to see him thus honoured, and passingly prayed did thinke him somewhat more worthie of an honorable recompence for his valiant seruice, as the more part of them refused the great offer made vnto him for his profite: and they esteemed more the nobilitie that was in him, that made him refuse such rewards, then that which made them to be offered to him, as vnto a worthie person. For it is farre more commendable, to vse riches well, then to be valiant: and yet it is better not to desire them then to vse them well. After this shoute and noyse of the assembly was somewhat appeased, the Consul Cominius beganne to speake in this sorte. We cannot compell Martius to take these giftes wee offer him if he will not receiue them: but we will giue him such a reward for the noble seruice he hath done, as he shall not refuse. Therefore we do order and decree, that henceforth he be called Coriolanus, for his valiant actes haue wonne him that name before our nomination. And so euer since he hath bare the third name of Coriolanus. And therby it appeareth, that the first name that the ROMAINES haue, as Caius: was our Christian name now. The second as Martius: was the name of the house and familie they came of. The third, was some addition giuen, either for some seruice or notable seruice, or for some marke on their face, or of some shape of their bodie, or else for some speciall vertue they had. Euen so did the GRECIANS in olde time giue additions to Princes, by reason of some notable acte worthie memorie. As when they haue called them Soter and Callinicos: as much to say sauiour and conquerour. Or else of some notable rant marke on ones face, or on his bodie, they haue called him Phiſcon, and Grypos: as ye would ſay, gorebelly, and hooke noſed: or elſe for ſome vertue, as Euergetes, and Phyladelphos: to wit, a benefactour, and louer of his brethren. Or otherwiſe for ones great felicitie, as Eudamon: as much to ſay, as fortunate. For ſo was the ſecond of the * Battes ſurnamed. And ſome Kings haue had ſurnames of ieaſt and mockerie. As one of the Antigones that was called Doſon, to ſay, the Giuer: who was euer promiſing, and neuer giuing. And one of the Ptolomees was called Lamyros: to ſay, conceitiue. The ROMAINES vſe more then any other nation, to giue names of mockerie in this ſort. As there was one Metellus ſurnamed Diadematus, the banded: becauſe he caried a band about his head of long time, by reaſon of a ſore he had in his forehead. One other of his owne familie was called Celer: the quick flie. Becauſe a few dayes after the death of his father, he ſhewed the people the cruell fight of fenſers at vnrebated ſwords, which they found wonderfull for the ſhortneſſe of time. Other had their ſurnames deriued of ſome accident of their birth. As to this day they call him Proculeius, that is borne, his father being in ſome far voyage: and him Poſthumius, that is borne after the death of his father. And when of two brethren twins, the one doth die, and the other ſuruiueth: they call the ſuruiuer, Vopiſcus. Sometimes alſo they giue ſurnames deriued of ſome marke or misfortune of the body. As Sylla, to ſay, crooked noſed: Niger, blacke: Rufus, red: Caecus, blinde: Claudus lame. They did wiſely in this thing to accuſtome men to thinke, that neither the loſſe of their ſight, nor other ſuch misfortunes as may chaunce to men, are any ſhame or diſgrace vnto them, but the manner was to aunſwer boldly to ſuch names, as if they were called by their proper names. Howbeit theſe matters would be better amplified in other ſtories then this. Now when this warre was ended, the flatterers of the people began to ſturre vp ſedition againe, without any new occaſion, or iuſt matter offered of complaint. For they did ground this ſecond inſurrection againſt the Nobilitie and Patricians, vpon the peoples miſerie and misfortune, that could not but fall out, by reaſon of the former diſcorde and ſedition betweene them and the Nobilitie. Becauſe the moſt part of the arable land within the territorie of ROME, was become heathie and barren for lacke of plowing, for that they had no time nor meane to cauſe corne to be brought them out of other countries to ſowe, by reaſon of their wars which made the extreame dearth they had among them. Now thoſe buſie praters that ſought the peoples good will, by ſuch flattering words, perceiuing great ſcarſitie of corne to be within the citie, and though there had bene plenty enough, yet the common people had no money to buie it: they ſpread abroad falſe tales and rumors againſt the Nobilitie, that they in reuenge of the people, had practiſed and procured the extreame dearth among them. Furthermore, in the middeſt of this ſtur, there came ambaſſadours to ROME from the citie of VELITRES, that offered vp their citie to the ROMAINES, and praied them they would ſend new inhabitants to repleniſh the ſame: becauſe the plague had bene ſo extreame among them, and had killed ſuch a number of them, as there was not left aliue the tenth perſon of the people that had bene there before. So the wiſe men of ROME began to thinke, that the neceſsitie of the VELITRIANS fell out in a moſt happy hour, and how by this occaſion it was very meete in ſo great a ſcarſitie of victuals, to diſburden ROME of a great number of citizens: and by this meanes, aſwell to take away this new ſedition, and ſtirlie to rid it out of the citie, as alſo to cleare the ſame of many mutinous and ſeditious perſons, being the ſuperfluous ill humours that grecuouſlie fedde this diſeaſe. Hereupon the Conſuls prickt out all thoſe by a bill, whom they intended to ſend to VELITRES, to go dwell there as in forme of a colonie: and they leauied out of all the reſt that remained in the citie of ROME, a great number to go againſt the VOLSCES, hoping by the meanes of forreine warre, to pacifie their ſedition at home. Moreouer they imagined, when the poore with the riche, and the meane ſorte with the Nobilitie, ſhould by this deuiſe be abroad in the warres, and in one campe, and in one ſeruice, and in one like danger: that then they would be more quiet and louing together. But Sicinius and Brutus, two ſeditious Tribunes, ſpake againſt either of theſe deuiſes, and cried out vpon the noble men, that vnder the gentle name of a colonie they would cloake and colour the moſt cruell and vnnaturall act as might be: becauſe they ſent their poore citizens into a ſore infected citie and peſtilent ayre, full of dead bodies vnburied, and there alſo to dwell vnder the tuition of a ſtrange god.

The com- people being set on a broile and brauerie with these wordes, would not appeare when Consuls called their names by a bill, to prest them for the warres, neither would they be- out to this new colonie: in so much as the Senate knewe not well what to say or do in matter. Martius then, who was now growne to great credit, and a stoute man besides, a- great reputation with the noblest men of ROME, rose vp, and openly spake against these tering Tribunes. And for the replenishing of the citie of VELITRES, he did compell th- that were chosen, to go thither, and to depart the citie, vpon great penalties to him that sho- disobey: but to the warres, the people by no meanes would be brought or constrained. Martius taking his friends and followers with him, and such as he could by faire word- treate to go with him, did runne certaine forreys into the dominion of the ANTIAT- where he met with great plentie of corne, and had a maruellous great spoile, aswell of ca- as of men he had taken prisoners, whom he brought away with him, and reserued not- for himselfe. Afterwards, hauing brought backe againe all his men that went out with safe and sound to ROME, and euery man riche and loden with spoile: then the home-ca- and house-doues that kept ROME still, began to repent them that it was not their hap- with him, and so enuied both them that had sped so well in this iourney, and also of mal- Martius, they spighted to see his credit and estimation increase still more and more, be- they accounted him to be a great hinderer of the people. Shortly after this, Martius for the Consulship: and the common people fauoured his sute, thinking it would be a th- to them to denie, and refuse the chiefest noble man of bloud, and most worthie per- ROME, and specially him that had done so great seruice and good to the commonwealth. the custome of ROME was at that time, that such as did sue for any office, should for ten dayes before be in the market place, onely with a poore gowne on their backes, and wi- any coate vnderneath, to pray the cittizens to remember them at the day of election: w- was thus deuised, either to moue the people the more, by requesting them in such meane- rell, or else because they might shew them their wounds they had gotten in the warres seruice of the commonwealth, as manifest markes and testimonie of their valiantnesse. it is not to be thought that the furers went thus lose in a simple gowne in the marke without any coate vnder it, for feare, and suspition of the common people: for offices nitie in the citie were not then giuen by fauour or corruption. It was but of late time long after this, that buying and selling fell out in election of officers, and that the voic- the electours were bought for money. But after corruption had once gotten way into lection of offices, it hath runne from man to man, euen to the very sentence of iudges also among captaines in the warres: so as in the ende, that onely turned common w- into Kingdomes, by making armes subiect to money. Therefore me thinkes be- reason that said: hee that first made banckets, and gaue money to the common p- was the first that tooke away authoritie, and destroyed commonwealth. But this lence crept in by litle and litle, and did secretly winne ground still, continuing a time in ROME, before it was openly knowne and discouered. For no man can tell was the first man that bought the peoples voices for money, nor that corrupted the tence of the iudges. among the people, but was ashamed of himselfe, to refuse so valiant a man: and one of them said to another, we must needes choose him Consull, there is no remedie. But when the day of election was come, and that Martius came to the market place with great pompe, accompanied with all the Senate, and the whole Nobilitie of the citie about him, who sought to make him Consull, with the greatest instance and intreatie they could, or euer attempted for any man or matter: then the loue and good will of the common people, turned straight to an hate and enuie toward him, fearing to put this office of soueraigne authoritie into his hands, being a man somewhat partiall toward the nobilitie, and of great credit and authoritie amongst the Patricians, and as one they might doubt would take away altogether the libertie from the people. Whereupon for these considerations, they refused Martius in the end, and made two other that were suters, Consuls. The Senate being maruellously offended with the people, did accompt the shame of this refusall, rather to redound to themselues, then to Martius: but Martius tooke it in farre worse parte then the Senate, and was out of all patience. For he was a man too full of passion and choller, and too much giuen to ouer selfe will and opinion, as one of a high minde and great courage, that lacked the gratuitie, and affabilitie that is gotten with iudgement of learning and reason, which onely is to be looked for in a gouernour of state: and that remembred not how wilfulnesse is the thing of the world, which a gouernour of a commonwealth for pleasing should shun, being that which Plato called solitarinesse. As in the end, all men that are wilfully giuen to a selfe opinion and obstinate minde, and who will neuer yeeld to others reason, but to their owne: remaine without companie, and forsaken of all men. For a man that will liue in the world, must needs haue patience, which lustie blouds make but a mocke at. So Martius being a stoute man of nature, that neuer yeelded in any respect, as one thinking that to ouercome alwaies, and to haue the vpper hand in all matters, was a token of magnanimitie, and of no base and faint courage, which spitteth out anger from the most weake and passioned part of the heart, much like the matter of an impostume: went home to his house, full fraighted with spight and malice against the people, being accompanied with all the lustiest young gentlemen, whose mindes were nobly bent, as those that came of noble race, and commonly vsed for to follow and honour him. But then especially they flockt about him, and kept him companie, to his much harme: for they did but kindle and inflame his choller more and more, being sorie with him for the iniurie the people offered him, because he was their captaine and leader to the warres, that taught them all marshall discipline, and stirred vp in them a noble emulation of honour and valiantnesse, and yet without enuie, praising them that deserued best. In the meane season, there came great plentie of corne to Rome, that had bene bought, part in Italie, and part was sent out of Sicile, as giuen by Gelon the tyrant of Syracvsa: so that many stood in great hope, that the dearth of victuals being holpē, the ciuill dissention would also cease. The Senate sate in counsell vpon it immediatly, the common people stood also about the pallace where the counsell was kept, gaping what resolution would fall out: perswading themselues, that the corne they had bought should be solde good cheape, and that which was giuen should be deuided by the polle, without paying any pennie, and the rather, because certaine of the senatours amongst them did so wishe and perswade the same. But Martius standing vpon his feete, did somewhat sharpely take vp those, who went about to gratifie the people therein: and called them people pleasers, and traitours to the nobilitie. Moreouer, he saied, they nourished against themselues, the naughtie seede and cockle of insolencie and sedition, which had bene sowed and scattered abroade amongst the people whom they should haue put off, if they had bene wise, and haue preuented their greatnesse: and not to their owne destruction to haue suffered the people, to stablish a magistrate for themselues, of so great power and authoritie, as that man had, to whome they had granted it. Who was also to be feared, because he obtained what he would, and did nothing but what he listed, neither passed for any obedience to the Consuls, but liued in all libertie, acknowledging no superiour to commaund him, sauing the onely heads and authours of their faction, whom he called his magistrates. Therefore saied he, they that gaue counsell, and perswaded that the corne should be giuen out to the common people gratis, as they vsed to do in the cities of Greece, such like reasons, wonne all the young men, and almost all the riche men to his opinion:

much they range it out, that he was the only man, and alone in the city, who stood out a the people, and neuer flattered them. There were only a fewe old men that spake against fearing least some mischiefe might fall out vpon it, as indeed there followed no great goo terward. For the Tribunes of the people, being present at this consultation of the Senate, w they sawe that the opinion of Martius was confirmed with the more voices, they left th nate, and went downe to the people, crying out for helpe, and that they would assemb saue their Tribunes. Hereupon the people ran on head in tumult together, before who words that Martius spake in the Senate were openly reported: which the people so st ked, that euen in that furie they were ready to flie vpon the whole Senate. But the Tri laide all the fault and burthen wholly vpon Martius, and sent their sergeants forthwi ken in the Senate. Martius stoutly withstood these officers that came to arrest him. Th Tribunes in their owne persons, accompanied with the Ædiles, went to fetche him by and so laide violent hands vpon him. Howbeit the noble Patricians gathering toge bout him, made the Tribunes giue back, and laid it sore vpon the Ædiles: so for that time night parted them, and the tumult appeased. The next morning betimes, the Consuls the people in an vprore, running to the market place out of all parts of the citie, they affraide least all the citie would together by the eares: wherefore assembling the Sena all haste, they declared how it stood them vpon, to appease the furie of the people, with gentle words, or gratefull decrees in their fauour: and moreouer, like wise men they consider, it was now no time to stand at defence and in contention, nor yet to fight fo nour against the communaltie: they being fallen to so great an extremitie, and offering imminent danger. Wherefore they were to consider temperately of things, and to de some present and gentle pacification. The most part of the Senatours that were present a counsell, thought this opinion best, and gaue their consents vnto it. Whereupon the Co rising out of counsell, went to speake vnto the people as gently as they could, and they di cifie their furie and anger, purging the Senate of all the vniust accusations laide vpon and vsed great modestie in perswading them, and also in reprouing the faults they had c mitted. And as for the rest, that touched the sale of corne: they promised there should b of their officers, why he did contemptuously resist and disobey. Lastly, seeing he had driuen and beaten the Ædiles into the market place before all the world: if in doing this, hee had not done as much as in him lay, to raise ciuill warres, and to set one citizen against another. All this was spoken to one of these two endes, either that Martius against his nature should be constrained to humble himself, and to abase his haughtie and fierce mind: or else if he continued still in his stoutnesse, he should incurre the peoples displeasure and ill will so farre, that he should neuer possibly win them againe. Which they hoped would rather fall out so, then otherwise: as in deede they gest vnhappily, considering Martius nature and disposition. So Martius came, and presented himselfe, to answere their accusations against him, and the people held their peace, and gaue attentiue eare, to heare what he would say. But where they thought to haue heard very humble and lowly wordes come from him, he beganne not only to vse his wonted boldnes of speaking (which of it selfe was very rough and vnpleasant, and did more aggrauate his accusation, then purge his innocencie) but also gaue himselfe in his wordes to thunder, and looke therewithall so grimly, as though he made no reckoning of the matter. This stirred coales among the people, who were in wonderfull furie at it, & their hate and malice grew so toward him, that they could hold no longer, beare, nor indure his braueric and careless boldnes. Whereupon Sicinius, the cruellest and stoutest of the Tribunes, after he had whispered a litle with his companions, did openly pronounce in the face of all the people, Martius as condemned by the Tribunes to die. Then presently he commaunded the Ædiles to apprehend him, and carie him straight to the rocke Tarpeian, and to cast him headlong downe the same. When the Ædiles came to lay handes vpon Martius to do that they were commaunded, diuers of the people themselues thought it too cruell and violent a deede. The noble men also being much troubled to see such force and rigour vsed, beganne to crie aloude, helpe Martius: so those that laide handes on him being repulsed, they compassed him in round among themselues, and some of them holding vp their handes to the people, besought them not to handle him thus cruelly. But neither their words, nor crying out could ought preuaile, the tumult and hurly burley was so great, vntill such time as the Tribunes owne friendes and kinsemen weying with themselues the impossibleness to conuey Martius to execution, without great slaughter & murder of the nobilitie: did perswade and aduise not to proceede in so violent and extraordinarie a sort, as to put such a man to death, without lawfull processe in lawe, but that they should referre the sentence of his death, to the free voice of the people. Then Sicinius bethinking himselfe a litle, did aske the Patricians, for what cause they tooke Martius out of the officers handes that went to doe execution? The Patricians asked him againe, why they would of themselues so cruelly and wickedly put to death, so noble and valiant a Romaine as Martius was, and that without law or iustice? Well, then said Sicinius, if that be the matter, let there be no more quarrell or dissention against the people: for they do grant your demaund, that his cause shall be heard according to the law. Therefore said he to Martius, we doe will and charge you to appeare before the people, the third day of our next sitting and assembly here, to make your purgation for such articles as shall be obiected against you, that by free voice the people may giue sentence vpon you as shall please them. The noble men were glad then of the adiornment, and were much pleased they had gotten Martius out of this daunger. In the meane space, before the third day of their next assion came abour, the same being kept euery ninth day continually at Rome, whereupon they call it now in Latin, Nundinæ: there fell out warre against the Antiates, which gaue some hope to the nobilitie, that this adiornment would come to litle effect, thinking that this warre would hold them so long, as that the furie of the people against him would be well assuaged, or vtterly forgotten, by reason of the trouble of the warres. But contrarie to expectation, the peace was concluded presently with the Antiates, and the people returned again to Rome. Then the Patricians assembled oftentimes together, to consult how they might hande to Martius, and keepe the Tribunes from occasion to cause the people to mutinie againe, and rise against the nobilitie. And there Appius Clodius (one that was taken euer as an hereditarie enemie to the people) did auow and protest, that they would vtterly abase the authoritie of the Senate, and destroy the common weale, if they would suffer the common people to haue authoritie by voices to giue iudgement againſt the nobilitie. On the other ſide gaine, the moſt auncient Senatours, and ſuch as were giuen to fauour the common peo ſaide: that when the people ſhould ſee they had authoritie of life and death in their hand they would not be ſo cruell and fierce, but gentle and ciuill. More alſo, that it was not for e tempt of nobilitie or the Senate, that they ſought to haue the authoritie of iuſtice in t handes, as a preheminence and prerogatiue of honour: but becauſe they feared, that th ſelues ſhould be contemned and hated of the nobilitie. So as they were perſwaded, tha ſoone as they gaue them authoritie to iudge by voices: ſo ſoone would they leaue all e and malice to condemne any. Martius ſeeing the Senate in great doubt howe to reſo partly for the loue and good will the nobilitie did beare him, and partly for the feare t ſtoode in of the people: asked aloud of the Tribunes, what matter they would burden with? The Tribunes aunſwered him, that they would ſhewe howe he did aſpire to be and would proue that all his actions tended to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer R Martius with that, riſing vp on his feete, ſaide: that thereupon he did willingly offer ſelfe to the people, to be tried vpon that accuſation. And that if it were proued by him had ſo much as once thought of any ſuch matter, that hee would then refuſe no kinde of niſhment they would offer him: conditionally (quoth he) that you charge me with not elſe beſides, and that ye doe not alſo abuſe the Senate. They promiſed they would not. der theſe conditions the iudgement was agreed vpon, and the people aſſembled. And fir all the Tribunes would in any caſe (whatſoeuer became of it) that the people would ceede to giue their voices by Tribes, and not by hundreds: for by this meanes the mult of the poore needy people (and all ſuch rable as had nothing to looſe, and had leſſe reg honeſtie before their eies) came to be of greater force (becauſe their voices were numb by the polle) then the noble honeſt citizens, whoſe perſons and purſe did dutifully ſerue common wealth in their warres. And then when the Tribunes ſaw they could not prou went about to make him ſelfe King: they beganne to broach a freſh the former wordes Martius had ſpoken in the Senate, in hindering the diſtribution of the corne at meane vnto the common people, and perſwading alſo to take the office of Tribuneſhip from And for the third, they charged him a new, that he had not made the common diſtribu of the ſpoyle he had gotten in the inuading the territories of the ANTIATES: but had d owne authoritie deuided it among them, who were with him in that iourney. But this ter was moſt ſtraunge of all to Martius, looking leaſt to haue bene burdened with that, a any matter of offence. Whereupon being burdened on the ſodaine, and hauing no re excuſe to make euen at that inſtant: he beganne to fall a praiſing of the ſouldiers that had ued with him in that iourney. But thoſe that were not with him, being the greater numb cried out ſo loud, and made ſuch a noiſe that he could not be heard. To conclude, when came to tell the voices of the Tribes, there were three voices odde, which condemned to be baniſhed for life. After declaration of the ſentence, the people made ſuch ioy, as they uer reioyced more for any battell they had wonne vpon their enemies, they were ſo braue liuely, and went home ſo iocondly from the aſſembly, for triumph of this ſentence. The nate againe in contrarie manner were as ſad and heauie, repenting themſelues beyond ſure, that they had not rather determined to haue done and ſuffered any thing whatſoeue fore the common people ſhould ſo arrogantly and outragiouſly haue abuſed their author There needed no difference of garments I warrant you, nor outward ſhewes to know beian from a Patrician, for they were eaſily diſcerned by their lookes. For he that was o peoples ſide, looked cheerely on the matter: but he that was ſad, and hung downe his h he was ſure of the noble mens ſide. Sauing Martius alone, who neither in his countenance in his gate, did euer ſhew himſelfe abaſhed, or once let fall his great courage: but he on all other gentlemen that were angry at his fortune, did outwardly ſhew no manner of pa nor care at all of himſelfe. Not that he did patiently beare and temper his good hap, in re of any reaſon he had, or by his quiet condition: but becauſe he was ſo caried away wit vehemencie of anger, and deſire of reuenge, that he had no ſenſe nor feeling of the hard he was in, which the common people iudge not to be ſorow, although in deede it be th

ſame. For when ſorow (as you would ſay) is ſet a fire, then it is conuerted into ſpite and malice, and driueth away for that time all faintneſſe of heart and naturall feare. And this is the cauſe why the cholericke man is ſo altered and mad in his actions, as a man ſet on fire with a burning agew: for when a mans heart is troubled within, his pulſe will beate maruellous ſtrongly. Now that Martius was euen in that taking, it appeared true ſoone after by his doings. For when he was come home to his houſe againe, and had taken his leaue of his mother and wife, finding them weeping and ſhreeking out for ſorrow, and had alſo comforted and perſwaded them to be content with his chaunce: he went immediatly to the gate of the citie, accompanied with a great number of Patricians that brought him thither, from whence he went on his way with three or foure of his friendes onely, taking nothing with him, nor requeſting any thing of any man. So he remained a few daies in the countrie at his houſes, turmoyled with ſundry ſorts and kinds of thoughts, ſuch as the fire of his choller did ſtirre vp. In the end, ſeeing he could reſolue no way, to take a profitable or honourable courſe, but onely was pricked forwarde ſtill to be reuenged of the ROMAINES: he thought to raiſe vp ſome great wars againſt them, by their neereſt neighbours. Whereupon he thought it his beſt way, firſt to ſtirre vp the VOLSCES againſt them, knowing they were yet able enough in ſtrength and riches to encounter them, notwithſtanding their former loſſes they had receiued not long before, and that their power was not ſo much impaired, as their malice and deſire was increaſed to be reuenged of the ROMAINES. Now in the citie of ANTIVM, there was one called Tullus Aufidius, who for his riches, as alſo for his nobilitie and valiantneſſe was honoured among the VOLSCES as a King. Martius knewe very well that Tullus did more malice and enuie him, then he did all the ROMAINES beſides: becauſe that many times in battels where they met, they were euer at the encounter one againſt another, like luſtie couragious youthes, ſtriuing in all emulation of honour, and had encountered many times together. Inſomuch as beſides the common quarrell betweene them, there was bred a maruellous priuate hate one againſt another. Yet notwithſtanding, conſidering that Tullus Aufidius was a man of great mind, and that he aboue all other of the VOLSCES moſt deſired reuenge of the ROMAINES, for the iniuries they had done vnto them: hee did an acte that confirmed the true wordes of an auncient Poet, who ſaide:

Tullus Aufidius, a great perſon among the Volſces.

It is a thing full hard, mans anger to withſtand, if it be ſtiffely bent to take an enterpriſe in hand.
For then moſt men will haue, the thing that they deſire, although it coſt their liues therefore, ſuch force hath wicked ire.

And ſo did he. For he diſguiſed himſelfe in ſuch array and attire, as he thought no man could euer haue knowen him for the perſon he was, ſeeing him in that apparell he had vpon his backe: and as Homer ſaid of Vlyſſes,

So did he enter into the enemies towne.

It was euen twy-light when he entred the citie of ANTIVM, and many people met him in the ſtreetes, but no man knew him. So he went directly to Tullus Aufidius houſe, and when he came thither, he got him vp ſtraight to the chimney harth, and ſate him downe, and ſpake not a word to any man, his face all muffled ouer. They of the houſe ſpying him, wondered what he ſhould be, and yet they durſt not bid him riſe. For ill fauouredly muffled and diſguiſed as he was, yet there appeared a certaine maieſtie in his countenance, and in his ſilence: whereupon they went to Tullus who was at ſupper, to tell him of the ſtrange diſguiſing of this man. Tullus roſe preſently from the board, and comming towards him, asked him what he was, and wherefore he came. Then Martius vnmuffled himſelfe, and after he had pauſed a while, making no anſwere, he ſaid vnto him. If thou knoweſt me not yet, Tullus, and ſeeing me, doſt not perhappes beleeue me to be the man I am in deede, I muſt of neceſſitie bewray my ſelfe to be that I am. was a citizen of ROME called Titus Latinus, a man of meane qualitie & condition, but ot that had deliuered a bondman of his that had offended him, into the hands of other ſlaues bondmen, and had commaunded them to whip him vp and downe the market place, & a

He that had once abidden this punishment, and was seene in that manner, was proclaimed and cried in euery market towne: so that no man would euer trust him after, and the called him Furcifer, because the LATINES call the wod that runneth into the axletree of the coch, Furca, as much to say, as a forke. Now when Latinus had made report to the Senate of the vision that had happened to him, they were deuising whom this vnpleasaunt daunser should be, that went before the procession. Thereupon certaine that stoode by, remembred the poore slaue that was so cruelly whipped through the market place, whom they afterwardes put to death: and the thing that made them remember it, was the straunge and rare manner of his punishment. The priestes hereupon were repaired vnto for their aduise: they were wholly of opinion, that it was the whipping of the slaue. So they caused the slaues master to be punished, and beganne againe a new procession, and all other shewes and sightes in honour of Iupiter. But hereby appeareth plainely, how king Numa did wisely ordaine all other ceremonies concerning deuotion to the goddes, and specially this custome which he stablished, to bring the people to religion. For when the magistrates, bishoppes, priestes, or other religious ministers goe about any deuine seruice, or matter of religion, an herauld euer goeth before them, crying out aloud, Hoc age: as to say, doe this, or minde this. Hereby they are specially commanded, wholly to dispose them selues to serue God, leauing all other busines and matters a side: knowing well enough, that whatsoeuer most men doe, they doe it as in a manner constrained vnto it. But the ROMAINES did euer vse to beginne againe their sacrifices, processions, playes, and such like shewes done in honour of the goddes, not onely vpon such an occasion, but vppon lighter causes then that. As when they went a procession through the city, and did carie the images of their goddes, and such other like holy reliques vpon open hallowed coches or charrets, called in LATIN Thensæ: one of the coche horses that drue them stoode still, and would draw no more: and because also the coche man tooke the raines of the bridle with the left hand, they ordained that the procession should be begunne againe a new. Of later time also, they did renew and beginne a sacrifice thirty times one after another, because they thought still there fell out one fault or other in the same, so holy and deuout were they to the goddes. Now Tullus and Martius had secret conference with the greatest personages of the citie of ANTIVM, declaring vnto them, that now they had good time offered them to make warre with the ROMAINES, while they were in dissention one with another. They answered them, they were ashamed to breake the league, considering that they were sworne to keepe peace for two yeares. Howbeit shortly after, the ROMAINES gaue them great occasion to make warre with them. For on a holy day common playes being kept in ROME, vpon some suspicion, or false report, they made proclamation by sound of trumpet, that all the VOLSCES should auoide out of ROME before sunne set. Some thinke this was a craft and deceipt of Martius, who sent one to ROME to the Consuls, to accuse the VOLSCES falsely, aduertising them how they had made a conspiracy to set vppon them, whilest they were busie in seeing these games, and also to set their city a fire. This open proclamation made all the VOLSCES more offended with the ROMAINES, then euer they were before: and Tullus aggrauating the matter, did so inflame the VOLSCES against them, that in the end they sent their ambassadours to ROME, to summon them to deliuer their lands and townes againe, which they had taken from them in times past, or to looke for present warres. The ROMAINES hearing this, were maruellously netled: and made no other aunswer but thus. If the VOLSCES be the first that beginne warre: the ROMAINES will be the last that will end it. Incontinently vpon returne of the VOLSCES ambassadours, and deliuerie of the ROMAINES aunswer: Tullus called an assemby generall to be made of the VOLSCES, and concluded to make warre vppon the ROMAINES. This done, Tullus did counsell them to take Martius into their seruice, and not to mistrust him for the remembraunce of any thing past, but boldly to trust him in any matter to come: for he would doe them more seruice in fighting for them, then euer he did them displeasure in fighting against them. So Martius was called forth, who spake so excellently in the presence of them all, that he was thought no lesse eloquent in tongue, then warlike in shew: and declared him selfe both expert in warres, and wise with valiantnes. Thus he was ioyned in commission with Tullus as generall of the VOLSCES, hauing absolute authority betweene them to follow and pursue the warres. But Martius fearing least tract of time bring this army together with all the munition and furniture of the VOLSCES, would rob him of the meane he had to execute his purpose and intent: left order with the rulers & chiefe of the city, to assemble the rest of their power, and to prepare all necessary prouision for the campe. Then he with the lightest souldiers he had, and that were willing to follow him, stale away vppon the sodaine, and marched with all speede, and entred the territories of ROME, before the ROMAINS heard any newes of his comming. In so much as the VOLSCES found such spoile in the fields, as they had more then they could spend in their campe, & were weary to driue and cary away that they had. Howbeit the gaine of the spoile and the hurt they did to the ROMAINS in this inuasion, was the least part of his intent. For his chiefest purpose was, to increase still the malice and dissention betweene the nobility, and the commonalty: and to draw that on, he was very carefull to keepe the noble mens landes and goods from harme and burning, but spoiled all the whole countrey besides, and would suffer no man to take or hurt any thing of the noble mens. This made greater sturre and broile betweene the nobility & the people, then was before. For the noble mē fell out with the people, because they had so vniustly banished a man of so great valure and power. The people on the other side accused the nobility, how they had procured Martius to make these wars, to be reuenged of the people, because it pleased them to see their goods burnt and spoiled before their eyes, whilest they themselues were well at ease, and did behold the peoples losses and misfortunes, and knowing their owne goods safe and out of daunger: and how the warre was not made against the rich men, that had the enemy abroad, to keepe that they had in safety. Now Martius hauing had this first exploite (which made the VOLSCES bolder, and lesse fearefull of the ROMAINS) brought home all the army againe, without losse of any man. After their whole army (which was maruellous great, and very forward to seruice) was assembled in one campe: they agreed to leaue part of it for garrison in the countrey about, and the other part should goe on, to make the warre vpon the ROMAINES. So Martius bad Tullus choose, and take which of the two charges he liked best. Tullus made him aunswere, hee knew by experience that Martius was no lesse valiant then himselfe, and how hee euer had better fortune and good hap in all battells, then himselfe had. Therefore he thought it best for him to haue the leading of those that should make the warres abroad: and himselfe would keepe home, to prouide for the safetie of the cities and of his countrey, and to furnish the campe also of all necessary prouision abroade. So Martius being stronger then before, went first of all vnto the city of CORIOLES, inhabited by the ROMAINES, who willingly yeelded them selues, and therefore had no hurt. From thence he entred the countrey of the LATINES, imagining the ROMAINES would fight with him there, to defend the LATINES, who were their confederats, & had many times sent vnto the ROMAINES for their aide. But on the one side, the people of Rome were very ill willing to goe: and on the other side the Consuls being vpon their going out of their office, would not hazard them selues for so small a time: so that the ambassadours of the LATINES returned home againe, and did no good. Then Martius did besiege their city, and hauing taken by force the townes of the TOLERINIANS, VICANIANS, PINIANS, and the BOLANIANS, who made resistaunce: hee sacked all their goods, and tooke them prisoners. Such as did yeeld them selues willingly vnto him, he was as carefull as possible might be, to defend them from hurt: and because they should receiue no damage by his will, he remoued his campe as farre from their confines as he could. Afterwards, he tooke the city of BOLES by assault, being about an hundred furlong from ROME, where he had a maruellous great spoile, and put euery man to the sword that was able to carie weapon. The other VOLSCES that were appointed to remaine in garrison for defence of their countrey, hearing this good newes, would tary no longer at home, but armed them selues, and ranne to Martius campe, saying they did acknowledge no other captaine but him. Hereupon his fame ranne through al ITALIE, and euery one praised him for a valiant captaine, for that by change of one man for another, such and so straunge euents fell out in the state. In this while, all was still to wracke at ROME. For, to come into the field to fight with the enemy, they could not abide to heare of it, they were one so much against another, and full of seditious wordes, nobility against the people, and the people against the nobility. Vntill they had intelligence at the length that the enemies had laide siege to the city of LAVINIVM, in the which were all the temples and images of the goddes their protectours, and from whence came first their auncient originall, for that Æneas at his first arriuall into ITALIE did builde that citie. Then fell there out a maruellous sodaine chaunge of minde among the people, and farre more straunge and contrary in the nobility. For the people thought good to repeale the condemnation and exile of Martius. The Senate assembled vppon it, would in no case yeeld to that. Who either did it of a selfe will to bee contrary to the peoples desire: or because Martius should not returne through the grace and fauour of the people. Or else, because they were throughly angry and offended with him, that he would set vppon the whole, being offended but by a few, and in his doinges would shew him selfe an open enemy besides vnto his countrey: notwithstanding the most part of them tooke the wrong they had done him, in maruellous ill part, and as if the iniurie had beene done vnto them selues. Report being made of the Senates resolution, the people found them selues in a straight: for they coulde authorise and confirme nothing by their voices, vnlesse it had beene first propounded and ordained by the Senate. But Martius hearing this sturre about him, was in a greater rage with them then before: in so much as he raised his siege incontinently, before the city of LAVINIVM, and going towardes ROME, lodged his campe within forty furlong of the citie, at the ditches called Cluilia. His incamping so neare ROME, did put all the whole city in a wonderfull feare: howbeit for the present time it appeased the sedition and dissention betwixt the Nobility and the people. For there was no Consull, Senatour, nor Magistrate, that durst once contrary the opinion of the people, for the calling home againe of Martius. When they saw the women in a maruellous feare, running vp and downe the city: the temples of the goddes full of olde people, weeping bitterly in their prayers to the goddes: and finally, not a man either wise or hardy to prouide for their safety: then they were all of opinion, that the people had reason to call home Martius againe, to reconcile them selues to him, and that the Senate on the contrary part, were in maruellous great fault to bee angry and in choller with him, when it stoode them vppon rather to haue gone out and intreated him. So they all agreede together to send ambassadours vnto him, to let him vnderstand how his countrey men did call him home againe, and restored him to all his goods, and besought him to deliuer them from this warre. The ambassadours that were sent, were Martius familiar friends, and acquaintaunce, who looked at the least for a curteous welcome of him, as of their familiar friend and kinseman. Howbeit they found nothing lesse. For at their comming, they were brought through the campe, to the place where he was set in his chaire of state, with a maruellous and an vnspeakeable maiesty, hauing the chiefest men of the VOLSCES about him: so hee commaunded them to declare openly the cause of their comming. Which they deliuered in the most humble and lowe wordes they possibly could deuise, and with all modest countenaunce and behauiour agreable for the same. When they had done their message for the iniury they had done him, he answered them very wholly, and in great choller. But as generall of the VOLSCES, he willed them to restore vnto the VOLSCES, all their landes and cities they had taken from them in former warres: and moreouer, that they should giue them the like honour and freedome of ROME, as they had before giuen to the LATINES. For otherwise they had no other meane to end this warre, if they did not graunt these honest and iust conditions of peace. Thereupon he gaue them thirty daies respit to make him answere. So the ambassadours returned straight to ROME, and Martius forthwith departed with his army out of the territories of the ROMAINES. This was the first matter wherewith the VOLSCES (that most enuied Martius glory and authority) did charge Martius with. Among those, Tullus was chiefe: who though hee had receiued no priuate iniurie or displeasure of Martius, yet the common malice and imperfection of mans nature wrought in him, and it grieued him to see his owne reputation blemished, through Martius great fame and honour, and so him selfe to bee lesse esteemed of the VOLSCES, then he was before. This fell out the more, because euery man honoured Martius, and thought he only could do all, and that all other gouernors and captaines must be content with such credite and authority, as he would please to countenaunce him with. From hence they deriued all their first accusations and secret murmurings against Martius. For priuate captains conspiring against him, were very angry with him: and gaue it out that the remouing of the campe was a manifest treason, not of the townes, nor fortes, nor armes, but of time and occasion, which was a losse of great importaunce, because it was that which in treason might both lose and binde all, and preserue the whole. Now Martius hauing giuen the ROMAINES thirty daies respit for their answer, and specially because they haue not accustomed to make any great changes, in lesse space of time then that: hee thought it good yet, not to lie a sleepe and idle all the while, but went and destroyed the lands of his enemies allies, and tooke seuen great cities of theirs well inhabited, and the ROMAINES for not once put themselues into the fielde, to come to their aide and helpe: they were so faint hearted, so mistrustfull, and loth besides to make warres. In so much as they properly resembled the bodies paralyticke, and losed of their limmes and members: as those which through the palsey haue lost all their sence and feeling. Wherefore, the time of peace expired, Martius being returned into the dominions of the ROMAINES againe with all his army, and sent another ambassade vnto him, to pray peace, and the remoue of the VOLSCES out of their countrey: that afterwardes they might with better leysure fall to such agreementes together as should bee thought most meete and necessary. For the ROMAINES were no meete would euer yeelde for feare. But if he thought the VOLSCES had any ground to demand reasonable articles and conditions, all that they would reasonably aske should bee granted vnto, by the ROMAINES, who of themselues would willingly yeelde to reason, considering finally, that they did lay downe armes. Martius to that aunswered: that as generall of the VOLSCES he would reply nothing vnto it. But yet as a ROMAINE citizen, he would counsell them to let fall their pride, and to be conformable to reason, if they were wise: and that they should returne againe within three daies, deliuering vp the articles agreed vpon, which he had first deliuered them. Or otherwise, that hee would no more giue them assurance of safe conduite to returne againe into his campe, with such vaine and friuolous motions. When the ambassadours were returned to ROME, and had reported Martius aunswere to the Senate: their city being in extreame daunger, and as it were in a terrible storme of pest, they threw out (as the common prouerbe saieth) their holy ancker. For then they appointed all the bishoppes, priestes, ministers of the gods, and keepers of holy things, and also the augures or soothsayers, which foreshew thinges to come by obseruation of the flight of birdes (which is an olde auncient kinde of prophecying and diuination amongest the ROMAINES) to goe to Martius apparelled, as when they doe their sacrifices: and first to intreate him to leaue off warre, and then that hee would speake to his countrey men, and conclude peace with the VOLSCES. Martius suffered them to come into his campe, but yet he answered them nothing the more, neither did he entertaine them or speake more curteously to them, then he did the first time that they came vnto him, sauing onely that hee willed them to take the one of the two: either to accept peace vnder the first conditions offered, or else to receiue warre. When all this goodly rable of superstition and priestes were returned, it was determined in counsell that none should goe out of the gates of the citie, and that they should watch and ward vppon the wals, to repulse their enemies if they came to assault them, referring themselues and all their hope to time, and fortunes vncertaine fauour, not knowing otherwise how to remedy the daunger. Now all the city was full of tumult, feare, and tedious doubt what would happen: vntill at the length there fell out such a like matter as Homer oftimes saide they would least haue thought of. For in great matters, that happen seldome, Homer saieth, and crieth out in this sort.

Many reckon not of Homer, as referring matters vnpossible, and fables of no likelyhood or troth, vnto mans reason, freewill, or iudgement: which in deed is not his meaning. But things true and likely, he maketh to depend of out owne free will and reason. For he oft speaketh these wordes:

I haue thought it in my noble heart:

And in another place:

And againe in another place:

Bellerophon (she) could not moue with her faire tongue, so honest and so vertuous, he was the rest among.

But in wonderous and extraordinarie things, which are done by secret inspirations and motions, he doth not say that God taketh away, from man his choice and freedom of will, but that he doth moue it: neither that he doth worke desire in vs, but obiecteth to our mindes certaine imaginations whereby we are led to desire, and thereby doth not make this our action proceed, but openeth the way to our will, and addeth thereto courage, and hope of successe. For, either we must say, that the gods meddle not with the causes and beginnings of our actions: or else what other meanes haue they to helpe and further men? It is apparant that they haue not our bodies, nor mooue not our feete and hands, when there is occasion to vse them: but that part of our minde from which these motions proceed, is induced thereto, or caried away by such obiects and reasons, as God offereth vnto it. Now the ROMAYNE ladies and gentlewomen did visite all the temples and gods of the same, to make their praiers vnto them: but the greatest ladies (and more part of them) were continually about the aulter of Iupiter Capitolin, among which troope by name, was Valeria, Publicolaes owne sister. The selfe same Valeria, who did such notable seruice to the ROMAYNES, both in peace and warres: and was said also certaine yeares before, as we haue declared in his life. His sister Valeria was greatly honoured and reuerenced among all the ROMAYNES: and did so modestly and wisely behaue her selfe, that she did not shame nor dishonour the house she came off. So she sodainly fell into such a fansie, as we haue rehearsed before, and had (by some god as I thinke) taken hold of a good deuise. Whereupon she rose, and the other ladies with her, and they all together went straight to the house of Volumnia, Martius mother: and comming in to her, found her, and Martius wife her daughter in law set together, and hauing her husband Martius young children in her lap. Now all the traine of these ladies sitting in a ring round about her, Valeria first began to speake in this sort vnto her. We ladies, are come to visite you ladies (my lady Volumnia and Virgilia) by no direction from the Senate, nor commaundement of other magistrate: but through the inspiration (as I take it) of some god aboue. Who hauing taken compassion and pittie of our praiers, hath moued vs to come vnto you, to intreate you in a matter, as well beneficiall for vs, as also for the whole citizens in general: but to your selues in especiall (if it please you to credit me) and shall redound to our more fame and glorie, then the daughters of the SABYNES obtained in former age, when they procured louing peace, in stead of hatefull warre, between their fathers and their husbands. Come on good ladies, and let vs go altogether vnto Martius, to intreate him to take pittie vpon vs, and also to report the trothe vnto him, how much you are bound vnto the citizens: who notwithstanding they haue sustained great losse and losses by him, yet they haue not hitherto sought reuenge vpon your persons by any discourteous vsage, neither euer conceiued any such thought or intent against you, but do deliuer you safe into his hands, though thereby they looke for no better grace or clemencie from him. When Valeria had spoken this vnto them, all the other ladies together with one voice confirmed that she had said. Then Volumnia in this sort did answer her. My good ladies, we granted vs singular graces: peace, and amitie, albeit themselues haue no lesse part of both, then we. Of which good, if so it came to passe, thy selfe is the onely author, and so hast thou the only honour. But if it faile, and fall out contrarie: thy selfe alone deseruedly shall carie the shamefull reproach and burthen of either partie. So, though the end of warre be vncertaine, yet this notwithstanding is most certaine: that if it be thy chance to conquer, this benefit shalt thou reape of thy goodly conquest, to be chronicled the plagtie and destroier of thy countrie. And if fortune also ouerthrow thee, then the world will say, that through desire to reuenge thy priuate iniuries, thou hast for euer vndone thy good friends, who did most louingly and courteously receiue thee. Martius gaue good eare vnto his mothers words, without interrupting her speach at all: and after she had said what she would, he held his peace a prety while and answered not a word. Hereupon she began againe to speake vnto him, and said. My sonne, why doest thou not answer me? doest thou thinke it good altogether to giue place vnto thy choller and desire of reuenge, and thinkest thou it not honestie for thee to graunt thy mother request, in so weighty a cause? doest thou take it honorable for a noble man, to remember the wrongs and iniuries done him: and doest not in like case thinke it an honest noble mans parte, to be thankfull for the goodnesse that parents do shew to their children, acknowledging the dutie and reuerence they ought to beare vnto them? No man liuing is more bound to shew himselfe thankefull in all parts and respects, then thy selfe: who so vnnaturally sheweth all ingratitude. Moreouer (my sonne) thou hast lately taken of thy country, exacting grieuous paiments vpon them, in reuenge of the iniuries offered thee: besides, thou hast not hitherto shewed thy poore mother any courtesie. And therefore, it is not only honest, but due vnto me, that without compulsion I should obtaine my so iust and reasonable request of thee. But since by reason I cannot perswade thee to it, to what purpose do I defer my last hope? And with these words, her selfe, his wife and children, fell downe vpon their knees before him. Martius seeing that, could refraine no longer, but went straight and lift her vp, crying out: Oh mother, what haue you done to me? And holding her hard by the right hand, oh mother, said he, you haue wonne a happy victorie for your countrie, but mortall and vnhappy for your sonne: for I see my selfe vanquished by you alone. These words being spoken openly, he spake a little apart with his mother and wife, and then let them returne againe to ROME, for so they did request him: and in remaining in campe that night, the next morning he dislodged, and marched homewards into the VOLSCES countrie againe, who were not all of one minde, nor all alike contented. For some misliked him, and that he had done. Other being well pleased that peace should be made, said that neither the one, nor the other, deserued blame nor reproche. Other, though they misliked that was done, did not thinke him an ill man for that he did, but said: he was not to be blamed, though he yeelded to such a forcible extremitie. Howbeit no man contraried his departure, but all obeied his commandement, more for respect of his worthinesse and valiancie, then for feare of his authoritie. Now the citizens of ROME plainly shewed, in what feare and danger their citie stood of this war, when they were deliuered. For so soone as the watch vpon the wals of the citie perceiued the VOLSCES campe to remoue, there was not a temple in the citie but was presently set open, and full of men, wearing garlands of flowers vpon their heads sacrificing to the gods, as they were wont to do vpon the newes of some great obtained victorie. And this common ioy was yet more manifestly shewed, by the honourable courtesies the whole Senate, and people did bestow on their ladies. For they were all throughly perswaded, and did certainly beleeue, that the ladies onely were cause of the saiuing of the citie, and deliuering themselues from the instant danger of the war. Whereupon the Senate ordained that the magistrates to gratifie and honour these ladies, should grant them all that they would requite. And they onely requested that they would builde a temple of Fortune of the women: for the building whereof they offered themselues to defray the whole charge of the sacrifices, & other ceremonies belonging to the seruice of the gods. Neuertheless, the Senate commending their goodwill and forwardnesse, ordained, that the temple and image should be made at the common charge of the citie. Notwithstanding that, the ladies gathered money among them, and made with the same a second image of Fortune, which the ROMAINES say did speake as they offred her vp in the temple, and did set her in her place: and they affirme, that she spake these words: Ladies, ye haue deuoutly offered me vp. Moreouer, that she spake that twise together, making vs to beleeue things that neuer were and are not to be credited. For to see images seeme to sweate or weepe, or to put forth any humor red or bloudie, it is not a thing vnpossible. For wood and stone do commonly receiue certaine moisture, whereof is ingendred humour, which do yeeld of themselues, or do take of the aire, many sorts and kinds of colours: by which signes and tokens it is not amisse we thinke, that the gods sometimes warne men of things to come. And it is possible also, that these images and statues do sometime put forth sounds, like vnto sighes or mourning, when in the middest or bottome of the same there is made some violent separation, or breaking asunder of things, blowne or denised in the aire: but that a body which hath neither life nor soule, should haue any direct or exquisite voice formed in it by expresse voice, that is altogether vnpossible. For the soule, nor god himselfe cannot distinctly speake without a bodie, hauing necessarie organes and instruments meete for the seuerall parts of the same, to forme and vtter distinct words. But where stories many times do force vs to beleeue a thing reported to be true, by many graue testimonies: there we must say, that some passion contrarie to our fiue naturall sences, which being begotten in the imagination part or vnderstanding, draweth an opinion vnto it selfe, euen as we do in our sleeping, when many times we thinke we heare, that we do not heare: & we imagine we see, that we see not. Yet notwithstanding, such as are godly bent, & zealously giuen to thinke on heauenly things, so as they can no way be drawne from beleeuing that which is spoken of them, they haue reason to ground the foundation of their beleefe vpo. That is, the omnipotency of God who is wonderfull, and hath no maner of resemblance or likenesse of proportion vnto ours, but altogether contrarie as touching our nature, our moouing, our art, and our force: and therefore if he do any thing vnpossible to vs, or do bring forth & deuise things, without mans compasse reach and vnderstanding, we must not therfore thinke it vnpossible at all. For if in other things he is far contrarie to vs, much more in his workes and secret operations, he farre passeth all the rest: but the most part of Gods doings, as Heraclitus saith, for lack of faith, are hidden and vnknowne vnto vs. Now when Martius was returned againe into the citie of Antium from his voyage, Tullus that hated and could no longer abide him for the feare he had of his authoritie: sought diuerse meanes to make him out of the way, thinking if he let slip that present time, he should neuer recouer the like and fit occasion againe. Wherefore Tullus hauing procured many other of his confederacie, required Martius might be deposed from his estate, and render vp account to the Volsces of his charge & gouernment. Martius fearing to become a priuate man again vnder Tullus being generall (whose authority was greater otherwise than any other among all the Volsces) answered: he was willing to giue vp his charge, and would resigne it into the hands of the lords of the Volsces, if they did all command him. So by all their commandement he receiued it. And moreouer, that he would not refuse even at that present to giue vp an account vnto the people, if they would tarie the hearing of it. Then the people hereupon called a common counsell, in which assembly there were certaine orators appointed, that stirred vp the cõmon people against him: & whe they had told their tales, Martius rose vp to make the answer. Now, notwithstãding the mutinous people made a marueilous great noise, yet when they saw him, for the reuerence they bare vnto his valiantnesse, they reposed themselues, and gaue still audience to alledge with leasure what he could for his purgation. Moreouer, the honestest men of the Antiates, and who most reioyced in peace, shewed by their countenance that they would heare him willingly, and iudge also according to conscience. Whereupon Tullus fearing that if he did let him speake, he would proue his innocencie to the people, because amongst other things he had an eloquent tongue, besides that his first good seruice he had done to the people of the Volsces, did win him more fauour, than these last accusations could purchase him displeasure: and furthermore, the offence they laid to his charge, was a testimonie of the good will they ought him, for they would neuer haue thought he had done them wrong for that they tooke not the citie of Rome, if they had not been very neere taking of it, by meanes of his approache and conduction. For these causes Tullus thought he might no longer delay his pretence and enterprise, neither to tarie for any mutining and rising of the common people against him: wherefore, those that were of conſpiracie, beganne to crie out that he was not to be heard, nor that they would not ſuffer a traytour to vſurpe tyrannicall power ouer the Tribe of the VOLSCES, who would not yeeld vp his eſtate and authoritie. And in ſaying theſe words, they all fell vpon him, and killed him in the market place, none of the people once offering to reſcue him. Howbeit it is a clere caſe, that this murder was not generally conſented vnto, of the moſt part of the VOLSCES: for men came out of all partes to honour his bodie, and did honourably burie him, ſetting out his tombe with great ſtore of armour and ſpoiles, as the tombe of a worthy perſon and great captaine. The ROMAINES vnderſtanding of his death, ſhewed no other honour or malice, ſauing that they graunted the ladies the requeſt they made: that they might mourne tenne monethes for him, and that was the full time they vſed to weare blackes for the death of their fathers, brethren, or husbands, according to Numa Pompilius order, who ſtabliſhed the ſame, as we haue enlarged more amply in the deſcription of his life. Now Martius being dead, the whole ſtate of the VOLSCES hartily wiſhed him aliue againe. For firſt of al they fell out with the ÆQVES (who were their friends & confederates) touching preheminence and place: and this quarrel grew on ſo farre betweene them, that fraies and murders fell out vpon it one with another. After that the ROMAINES ouercame them in battell, in which Tullus was ſlaine in the field, and the flower of all their force was put to the ſword: ſo that they were compelled to accept moſt ſhamefull conditions of peace, in yeelding themſelues ſubiect vnto the conquerers, and promiſing to be obedient at their commaundement.

THE COMPARISON OF Alcibiades with Martius Coriolanus.

NOW that we haue written all the deedes of worthie memorie, done by either of them both: we may preſently diſcerne, that in matters of warre, the one hath not greatly exceeded the other. For both of them in their charge, were alike hardie & valiant for their perſons, as alſo wiſe and politike in the warres: vnleſſe they will ſay, that Alcibiades was the better captaine, as he that had foughten more battels with his enemies, both by ſea and land, then euer Coriolanus had done, and had alwaies the victorie of his enemies. For otherwiſe, in this they were much alike: that where they were both preſent and had charge and power to commaund, all things proſpered notably, and with good ſucceſſe on the part they were of: and alſo when they tooke the contrarie ſide, they made the firſt haue the worſe euery way. Now for matters of gouernement, the noble men and honeſt citizens did hate Alcibiades manner of rule in the common weale, as of a man moſt diſſolute, and giuen to flatterie: becauſe he euer ſtudied by all deuiſe he could, to currie fauour with the common people. So did the ROMAINES malice also Coriolanus gouernmēt, for that it was too arrogā proud, and tyrannicall: whereby neither the one nor the other was to be commended. Nō withstanding he is lesse to be blamed, that seeketh to please and gratifie his common people then he that despiseth and disdaineth them, and therefore offereth them wrong and iniurie cause he would not seeme to flatter them, to winne the more authoritie. For as it is an e thing to flatter the common people to winne credit: euen so is it besides dishonesty, and in stice also, to attaine to credit and authoritie, for one to make himselfe terrible to the people offering them wrong and violence. It is true that Martius was euer counted an honest ma red man, plaine and simple, without art or cunning: Howbeit Alcibiades merely contra for he was fine, subtill, and deceiptfull. And the greatest fault they euer burdened Alcibia for, was his malice and deceipt, wherewith he abused the ambassadours of the LACEDE NIANS, & that he was let that peace was not cōcluded, as Thucydides reporteth. Now, tho by this acte he sodainely brought the citie of ATHENS into warres, yet he brought it ther to be of greater power, and more fearefull to the enemies, by making alliance with the M TINIANS and the ARGIVES, who by Alcibiades practise entred into league with the AT NIANS. And Martius, as Dionysius the historiographer writeth: did by craft and deceipt bri the ROMAINES into warres against the VOLSCES, causing the VOLSCES maliciously wrongfully to be suspected, that went to ROME to see the games plaide. But the cause why did it, made the fact so much more foule and wicked. For it was not done for any ciuill dis tion, nor for any iealousie and contention in matters of gouernement, as Alcibiades did: onely following his cholericke moode, that would be pleased with no thing, as Dion said would needes trouble and turmoyle the most part of ITALIE, and so being angrie with countrie, he destroyed many other townes and cities that could not helpe it, nor doe with This is true also, that Alcibiades spight & malice did worke great mischiefe and miserie to countrie: but when he saw they repented them of the iniurie they had done him, he came himself, & did withdraw his armie. Another time also, when they had banished Alcibiades would not yet suffer the captaines of the ATHENIANS to run into great errors, neither wo he see them cast away, by following ill counsell which they tooke, neither would he for them in any daunger they put themselues into. But he did the very same that Aristides done in old time vnto Themistocles, for which he was then, and is yet so greatly praised. he went vnto the captaines that had charge then of the armie of the ATHENIANS, altho they were not his friends, and told them wherein they did amisse, and what they had fur to doe. Where Martius to the contrarie, did first great hurt vnto the whole citie of Ro though all in ROME had not generally offended him: yea, and when the best and chiefest of the citie were grieued for his sake, and were very sory and angry for the iniurie done h Furthermore, the ROMAINES sought to appease one onely displeasure and despight they done him by many ambassades, petitions and requestes they made, wherunto he neuer yeel while his mother, wife and children came, his heart was so hardned. And hereby it appea he was entred into this ciuill warre (when he would harken to no peace) of an intent wi to destroy and spoile his countrie, and not as though he ment to recouer it, or to returne ther againe. Here was in deede the difference betwene them: that spials being laid by the L CEDÆMONIANS to kil Alcibiades, for the malice they did beare him, as also for that they affraide of him, he was compelled to returne home againe to ATHENS. Where Martius trari wife, hauing bene so honorably receiued and entertained by the VOLSCES, he could with honestie forsake them, considering that they had done him that honour, as to chuse their generall, & trusted him so farre, as they put all their whole army & power into his and not as the other, whom the LACEDÆMONIANS rather abused then vsed him, suffe him to go vp and downe their citie (and afterwardes in the middest of their campe) wit honour or place at all. So that in the ende Alcibiades was compelled to put himselfe into hands of Tisaphernes: vnlesse they will say that he went thither of purpose to him, with to saue the citie of ATHENS frō vtter destruction, for the desire he had to returne home a Moreouer, we read of Alcibiades, that he was a great taker, and would be corrupted with ney: and when he had it, he would most licentiously and dishonestly spend it. Where Ma in contrarie manner would not so much as accept gifts lawfully offered him by his captaines to honour him for his valiantnesse. And the cause why the people did beare him such ill will, for the controuersie they had with the Nobilitie about clearing of debts, grew: for that they knew well enough it was not for any gaine or benefite he had gotten thereby, so much as it was for spight and displeasure he thought to doe them. Antipater in a letter of his, writing of the death of Aristotle the philosopher, doth not without cause commende the singular gifts that were in Alcibiades, and this inespecially: that he passed all other for winning mens good willes. Whereas all Martius noble actes and vertues, wanting that affabilitie, became hatefull vnto those that receiued benefite by them, who could not abide his seueritie and selfe will: which causeth desolation (as Plato saith) and men to be ill followed, or altogether forsaken. Contrariwise, seeing Alcibiades had a trimme entertainment, and a very good grace with him, & could fashion himselfe in all companies: it was no maruell if his well doing were gloriously commended, and himselfe much honoured and beloued of the people, considering that some faultes he did, were oftentimes taken for matters of sport, and toyes of pleasure. And this was the cause, that though many times he did great hurt to the common wealth, yet they did oft make him their generall, and trusted him with the charge of the whole citie. Where Martius suing for an office of honour that was due to him, for the sundrie good seruices he had done to the state, was notwithstanding repulsed, and put by. Thus doe we see, that they to whom the one did hurt, had no power to hate him: and the other that honoured his vertue, had no liking to loue his person. Martius also did neuer any great exploit, being generall of his countrie men, but when he was generall of their enemies against his naturall countrie: wheras Alcibiades, being both a priuate person, and a generall, did notable seruice vnto the ATHENIANS. By reason whereof, Alcibiades whersoeuer he was present, had the vpper hand euer of his accusers, euen as he would himselfe, and their accusations tooke no place against him: vnlesse it were in his absence. Where Martius being present, was condemned by the ROMAINES: and in his person murdered and slaine by the VOLSCES. But here I can not say they haue done well, nor iustly, albeit himselfe gaue them some colour to doe it: when he openly denied the ROMAINE Ambassadors peace, which after he priuately granted, at the request of women. So by this deede of his, he tooke not away the enmitie that was betweene both people: but leauing warre still betweene them, he made the VOLSCES (of whom he was generall) to choose the oportunitie of noble victorie. Where in deede he should (if he had done as he ought) haue withdrawen his armie with their counsell & consent, that had reposed so great affiance in him, in making him their generall: if he had made that account of them, as their good will towards him did in dutie binde him. Or else, if he did not care for the VOLSCES in the enterprise of this warre, but had only procured it of intent to be reuenged, and afterwards to leaue off when his anger was blowen ouer: yet he had no reason for the loue of his mother to pardone his countrie, but rather he should in pardoning his countrie, haue spared his mother, because his mother & wife were members of the bodie of his countrie & citie, which he did besiege. For in that he vncourteously reiected all publique petitions, requests of Ambassadors, intreaties of the bishops and priestes, to gratifie onely the request of his mother with his departure: that was no act so much to honour his mother with, as to dishonour his countrie by, the which was preserued for the pitie and intercession of a woman, & not for the loue of it selfe, as if it had not bene worthie of it. And so was, this departure a grace, to say truly, very odious & cruell, and deserued no thankes of either partie, to him that did it. For he withdrew his armie not at the request of the ROMAINES, against whom he made warre: not with their consent, whose charge the warre was made. And of all his misfortune and ill hap, the austeritie of his nature, and his haughtie obstinate minde, was the only cause: the which of it selfe being hateful to the world, when it is ioyned with ambition, it groweth then much more churlish, fierce, and intollerable. For men that haue that fault in nature, are not affable to the people, seeming thereby as though they made no estimation or regard of the people: and yet on the other side, if the people should not giue them honour & reuerence, they would straight take it in scorne, and litle care for the matter. For so did Metellus, Aristides, & Epaminondas, all vsed this manner not to seeke the goodwil of the cõmon people by flattery & dissimulation: which was indeed, becauſe they deſpiſed that which the people could giue or take away. Yet would they not be offended with their citizens, when they were amerced, and ſet at any fines, or that they baniſhed them, or gaue them any other repulſe: but they loued them as well as they did before, ſoone as they ſhewed any token of repentance, & that they were ſorie for the wrong they had done them, & were eaſily made friends againe with them, after they were reſtored from their baniſhment. For he that diſdaineth to make much of the people, & to haue their fauour, hath much more ſcorne to ſeeke to be reuenged when he is repulſed. For, to take a repulſe and loſſe all of honour ſo inwardly to the heart, cõmeth of no other cauſe, but that he did too earneſtly deſire it. Therefore Alcibiades did not diſſemble at all, that he was not very glad to ſee himſelfe honored, and ſorie to be reiected & denied any honour: but alſo he ſought all the meanes he could to make himſelfe beloued of thoſe amongeſt whom he liued. Whereas Martius ſtoutnes, & haughtie ſtomacke, did ſtay him from making much of thoſe, that might haue loued and honour him: and yet his ambition made him gnaw himſelfe for ſpight and anger, when he ſaw he was deſpiſed. And this is all that reaſonably may be reproued in him: for otherwiſe he lacked no good commendable vertues and qualities. For his temperance, and cleane hands from taking of bribes and money, he may be compared with the moſt perfect, vertuous, and honeſt men of all GREECE: but not with Alcibiades, who was in that vndoubtedly alwaies too licentious and looſely giuen, and had too ſmall regard of his regard and honeſtie.

The actes done by both.

THE LIFE OF Paulus Æmilius.

WHEN I firſt beganne to write theſe liues, my intent was to profit other: but ſince, continuing and going on, I haue much profited myſelfe by looking into theſe hiſtories, as if I looked into a glaſſe, to frame and faſhion my life, to the mould and patterne of theſe vertuous gentlemen. For running ouer their manners in this ſort, and ſeeking to deſcribe their liues: me thinkes I am ſtill conuerſant and familiar with them, and do as it were lodge them with me, one after another. And when I come to peruſe their hiſtories, and to waye the vertues and qualities they haue had, and what ſingularitie ech of them poſſeſſed: and to chuſe and cull out the chiefeſt things of note in them, and their beſt ſpeeches and doings moſt worthie of memorie: Then I crie out,

O goddes, can there be no more paſsing pleaſure in the world?

Or is there any thing of more force, to teach man ciuill manners, and a ruled life, or to reforme the vice in man: Democritus the philoſopher writeth, that we ſhould pray we might euer ſee happie images and ſightes in the aire, and that the good which is meete and proper to our nature, may rather come to vs, then that is euill and vnfortunate: preſuppoſing a falſe opinion and doctrine in philoſophy, which allureth men to infinit ſuperſtitions. That there are good and bad images flying in the aire, which giue a good or ill impreſſion vnto men, and inuite men to vice, or to vertue. But as for me, by continuall reading of auncient hiſtories, and gathering theſe lines together which now I leaue before you, and by keeping alwaies in mind the actes of the moſt noble, vertuous, and beſt giuen men of former age, and worthie memorie: I doe teache and prepare my ſelfe to ſhake off and baniſh from me all lewd and diſhoneſt condition: if by chaunce the company and conuerſation of them whoſe companie I keepe, and muſt of neceſſitie haunt, doe acquaint mee with ſome vnhappy or vngracious touche. This is eaſie vnto me, that do diſpoſe my quiet minde, and not troubled with any paſſion, vnto the deepe conſideration of ſo many noble examples. As I doe preſent vnto you now in this volume the lines of Timoleon the CORINTHIAN, and of Paulus AEmylius the ROMAINE, who had not only a good and an vpright mind with them, but were alſo fortunate and happy, in all the matters they both did take in hand. So as you ſhall hardly iudge, when you haue red ouer their lines, whether wiſedome, or good fortune brought them to atchieue to ſuch honourable actes and exploits as they did. Many (and the moſt part of hiſtoriographers) doe write, that the houſe and family of the AEmylians in ROME, was alwaies of the moſt auncient of the nobility, which they call Patricians. Some writers affirme alſo, that the firſt of the houſe that gaue name to all the poſterity after, was Marcus, the ſonne of Pythagoras the wiſe, whom king Numa for the ſweetneſſe and pleaſaunt grace of his tongue, ſurnamed Marcus AEmylius. And thoſe ſpecially affirme it, that ſay king Numa was Pythagoras ſcholler. Howſoeuer it was, the moſt part of this family that obtained honour and eſtimation for their vertue, were euer fortunate alſo in all their doings, ſauing Lucius Paulus only, who died in the battell of CANNES. But his misfortune doth beare manifeſt teſtimony of his wiſedome and valiancy together. For he was forced to fight againſt his will, when hee ſaw he could not bridle the raſhneſſe of his fellow Conſul that would needes ioyne battell, and to doe as he did, ſauing that he did not as the other, who being firſt procurer of the battell, was the firſt that ranne awaie: where he to the contrary, to his power did what he could to let him, and did ſticke by it, and fought it valiantly vnto the laſt gaſpe. This AEmylius left a daughter behind him called AEmylia, which was maried vnto Scipio the great: and a ſonne, Paulus AEmylius, being the ſame in whoſe life we preſently treat of. His youth fortunatly fell out in a floriſhing time of glory and honour, through the ſundry vertues of many great and noble perſons liuing in thoſe dayes, among whom he made his name famous alſo: and it was not by that ordinary art and courſe, which the beſt eſteemed young men of that age did take and follow. For he did not vſe to plead priuate mens cauſes in law, neither would creepe into mens fauour by fawning vpon any of them: though he ſaw it a common practiſe, and policy of men, to ſeeke the peoples fauour and good wils by ſuch meanes. Moreouer, he refuſed not that common courſe which other tooke, for that it was contray to his nature, or that he could not frame with either of both, if he had beene ſo diſpoſed: but he rather ſought to winne reputation by his honeſtie, his valiantneſſe, and vpright dealing, as chooſing that the better way, then either of the other two, in ſo much as in maruellous ſhort time he paſſed all thoſe that were of his age. His firſt office of honor he ſued for, was the office of AEdilis, in which ſute he was preferred before twelue other that ſued for the ſelfe ſame office: who were men of no ſmall quality, for all came afterwardes to be Conſuls. After this, he was choſen to be one of the number of the prieſtes, whom the ROMAINES call Augures: who haue the charge of all the diuination and ſoothſayings, in telling of things to come by flying of birdes, and ſignes in the aire. He was ſo careſull, and tooke ſuch paines to vnderſtand how the ROMAINES did vſe the ſame, and with ſuch diligence ſought the obſeruation of the auncient religion of ROMAINS in holy matters: that where that prieſthood was before eſteemed but a title of honour, and

So, leauing all that countrey quiet and in good hauing receiued their fealty by othe made betweene his hands, he returned againe to not enriched the value of a Drachma more then before. For then he tooke litle rega expences, he spent so franckly, neither was his purse his maister, though his reuenue great to beare it out: as it appeared to the world after his death, for all that he had enough to satisfie his wifes ioynter. His first wife was Papyria, the daughter of a nob full Papyrius Masso, and after they had liued a long time together, he was diuorced notwithstanding he had goodly children by her. in writing: but me thinkes the tale that is told concerning the seperation of a certaine is true. That a certaine ROMAINE hauing forsaken his wife, her friends fell out wit asked him: what fault dost thou find in her? is she not honest of her body? is shee not fa she not bring thee goodly children? But he putting forth his foote, shewed them his s aunswered them. Is not this a goodly shooe? is it not finely made? and is it not new?

say there is neuer a one of you can tell where it wringeth me. For to say truely, gre pen faultes are commonly occasions to make husbands put away their wiues: but ye times houshold wordes runne so betweene them (proceeding of crooked condition diuersity of natures, which straungers are not priuie vnto) that in processe of time beget such a straunge alteration of loue and mindes in them, as one house can n holde them. So AEmylius, hauing put away Papyria his first wife, he maried ano brought him two sonnes, which he brought vp with him selfe in his house, and two first sonnes (to wit, Scipio the second, and Fabius Maximus) in adoption, to two noblest and richest families of the city of ROME. The elder of the twaine, vnto Fabius Maximus, he that was fiue times Consul, and the yonger vnto the house of the Cornelians, whom the sonne of the great Scipio the AFRICAN did adopt, being his cosin germaine and named him Scipio. Concerning his daughters, the sonne of Cato maried the one, and AElius Tubero the other, who was a maruellous honest man, and did more nobly maintaine him selfe in his pouerty, then any other ROMAINE: for they were sixteene persons all of one name, and of the house of the AElians, very neare a kinne one to the other, who had all but one litle house in the city, and a small farme in the countrey, wherewith they entertained them selues, and liued all together in one house, with their wiues, and many litle children. Amongest their wiues, one of them was the daughter of Paulus AEmylius, after he had bene twise Consul, and had triumphed twise, not being ashamed of her husbands pouerty, but wondering at his vertue that made him poore. Wheras bretheren and kinsemen, as the world goeth now, if they dwell not farre a sunder, and in other countries, not one neare another, and that riuers part them not, or wals deuide their lands, leauing great large wastes betweene them: they are neuer quiet, but still in quarrell one with another. Goodly examples doth this story lay before the wise, and well aduised readers, to learne thereby how to frame their life, and wisely to behaue them selues. Now AEmylius being chosen Consul, went to make warre with the LIGVRIANS, who dwelled in the ALPES, and which otherwise are called LIGVSTINES. These are very valiaunt and warlike men, and were very good souldiers at that time, by reason of their continuall wars against the ROMAINES, whose neare neighbours they were. For they dwelt in the furthest part of ITALY, that bordereth vpon the great ALPES, and the row of ALPES, whereof the foote ioyneth to the THVSCAN sea, and pointeth towards AFRICK, and are mingled with the GAVLES and SPANIARDS, neighbours vnto the sea coast: who scowring all the Mediterranian sea at that time, vnto the straight of Hercules pillers, did with their litle light pinnases of pirats, let all the trafficke and entercourse of marchandise. AEmylius being gone to seeke them in their countrey, they tried his comming with an army of forty thousand men: neuertheles, though he had but eight thousand men in all, and that they were fiue to one of his, yet he gaue the onset vpon them, and ouerthrew them, and draue them into their cities. Then he sent to offer thē peace, for the ROMAINS would not altogether destroy the LIGVRIANS, because their countrey was as a rampier or bulwarke against the inuasion of the GAVLS, who lay lurking for oportunity and occasion to inuade ITALIE: whereupon these LIGVRIANS yeelded them selues vnto him, and put all their fortes and ships into his hands. AEmylius deliuered vnto them their holdes againe, without other hurt done vnto them, sauing that he rased the walles of their fortifications: howbeit he tooke all their shippes from them, leauing them litle botes of three owers onely, and no greater, and set all the prisoners at liberty they had taken, both by sea and by land, aswell ROMAINS as other, which were a maruellous number. These were all the notable actes he did worthy memory, in the first yeare of his Consulship. Afterwards, he oftentimes shewed himselfe very desirous to be Consul againe, and did put forth himselfe to sue for it: but when he was denied it, he neuer after made sute for it againe, but gaue himselfe onely to study diuine things, and to see his children vertuously brought vp, not onely in the ROMAINE tongue which him selfe was taught, but also a litle more curiously in the GREEKE tongue. For he did not only retaine Grammarians, Rethoritians, and Logitians, but also painters, grauers of images, riders of horses, and hunts of GREECE about his children: and he him selfe also (if no matters of common wealth troubled him) was euer with them in the schoole when they were at their bookes, and also when they otherwise did exercise them selues. For he loued his children as much, or more then any other ROMAINE. Now concerning the state of the common wealth, the ROMAINS were at wars with king Perseus, and they much blamed the captaines they had sent thither before, for that for lacke of skill and courage, they had so cowardly behaued them selues, as their enemies laughed them to scorne: and they receiued more hurt of them, then they did vnto the King. For not long before, they had driuen King Antiochus beyond mount Taurus, and had made him forsake the rest of ASIA, and had shut him vp within the borders of SYRIA, who was glad that hee had bought that countrey with fifteene thousand talents, which he paid for a fine. A litle before also, they had ouercome

Philip, king of MACEDON, in THESSALY, and had deliuered the GRECIANS from the bondage of the MACEDONIANS. And moreouer, hauing ouercom Hanniball (vnto whom no Prince nor King that euer was in the world was comparable, either for his power or valiantnes) they thought this too great a dishonour to them, that this warre they had against Perseus, should hold so long of euen hand with them, as if he had beene an enemy equall with the people of ROME: considering also that they fought not against them, but with the rebell and scattered people of the ouerthrowen army his father had lost before, and knew not that Philip had left his army stronger, and more expert by reason of his ouerthrow, then it was before. As I will briefly rehearse the story from the beginning. Antigonus, who was of the greatest power of all the captaines and successours of Alexander the great, hauing obtained for him selfe and his posterity the title of a King, had a sonne called Demetrius, of whom came Antigonus the second, that was surnamed Gonatas, whose sonne was also called Demetrius, raigned no long time, but died, and left a young sonne called Philippe. By reason whereof the Princes and Nobility of MACEDON, fearing that the Realme should be left without heire, they preferred one Antigonus, cosin to the last deceased King, and made him marie the mother of Philip the lesse, giuing him the name at the first of the Kings protectour onely, and lieutenaunt generall of his maiesty. But after, when they had found he was a good and wise prince and a good husband for the Realme, they then gaue him the absolute name of a King, and surnamed him Doson, to say, the giuer: for he promised much and gaue litle. After him succeeded Philip, who in his greene youth gaue more hope of him selfe, then any other of the Kings before: in so much they thought that one day he would restore MACEDON her ancient fame and glory, and that he alone would plucke downe the pride and power of the ROMAINS, who rose against all the world. But after that he had lost a great battell, and was ouerthrowen by Titus Quintus Flaminius neare vnto the city of SCOTVSA: then he began to quake for feare, and to leaue all to the mercy of the ROMAINES, thinking hee escaped cheapt, for any light ransome or tribute the ROMAINES should impose vpon him. Yet afterwards comming to vnderstand him selfe, he grew to disdaine it much, thinking that to reigne through the fauour of the ROMAINES, was but to make him selfe a slaue, to seeke to liue at pleasure at his ease, and not for a valiaunt and noble prince borne. Whereupon he set all his minde, to study the discipline of wars, and made his preparations as wisely and closely, and possibly he could. For he left all his towns alongst the sea coast, and standing vpō any high waies without any fortification at all, and in manner desolate without people, to the end there should appeare no occasion of doubt or mistrust in him: and in the meane time, in the high countries of his Realme farre from great beaten waies, he leuied a great number of men of war, and replenished his towns and strong holds that lay scatteringly abroad, with armour and weapons, money, and men, prouiding for war, which he kept as secretly as he could. For he had prouision of armour in his armory, to arme thirty thousand men, and eight million busshels of corne safely lockt vp in his forts and stronger places, and ready money, as much as would serue to maintaine tenne thousand straungers in pay, to defend his countrey for the space of tenne yeares. But before he could bring that to passe he had purposed, he died for griefe and sorrow, after he knew he had vniustly put Demetrius the best of his sonnes to death, vppon the false accusation of the worst, that was Perseus: who as he did inherite the Kingdome of his father by succession, so did he also inherite his fathers malice against the ROMAINES. But he had no shoulders to beare so heauy a burden, and especially being as he was, a man of so vile and wicked nature: for among many lewd and naughty conditions he had, he was extreme couetous & miserable. They say also, that he was not legitimate, because Philippes wife had taken him from Gnathonia (a tailours wife borne at ARGOS) immediatly after he was borne, & did adopt the child to be hers. And some thinke that this was the chiefest cause why he practised to put Demetrius to death, fearing least this lawfull son would seeke occasion to proue him a bastard. Notwithstanding, simple though he was, and of vile and base nature, he found the strength of his Realme so great, that he was contented to take vpon him to make warre against the ROMAINES, which he maintained a long time, and fought against their Consuls, that were their generals, & repulsed great armies of theirs both by sea and land, and ouercame some. mong other, the first that inuaded MACEDON, was ouerthrowen by him in a battel of horsmen, where he slew at that time two thousand fiue hundred good mē of his, & tooke sixe hundred prisoners. And their armie by sea, riding at ancker before the citie of OREVM, he did sodainly set vpon, and tooke twentie great ships of burden, & all that was in them, and sunke the rest, which were all loden with corne: and tooke of all sorts besides, about 54. foystes, and galliots of fiftie owers a peece. The second Consull and generall he fought with all, was Hostilius, whom he repulsed, attempting by force to inuade MACEDON by way of the citie of ELVMIA. Another time againe, when he entred in by stealth vpon the coast of THESSALY, he offered him battell, but the other durst not abide it. Furthermore, as though the war troubled him nothing at all, & that he had cared litle for the ROMAINES: he went & fought a battell in the meane time with the DARDANIANS, where he slew ten thousand of those barbarous people, & brought a maruellous great spoile away with him. Moreouer he procured the nation of the GAVLES dwelling vpon the riuer of Danubie, which they call Bastarnæ (men very warlike, & excellent good horsemē) & did practise with the ILLYRIANS also by mean of their king Genthius, to make them ioine with him in these wars: so that there ran a rumour all about, that for money he had gotten these GAVLES to come downe into ITALIE, from the high country of GAVLE, al alongst the Adriatike sea. The ROMAINES being aduertised of these news, thought the time serued not now to dispose their offices in warres any more by grace and fauour vnto those that sued for them: but contrariwise, that they should call some noble man that were very skilful and a wise captain, and could discreetly gouerne & performe things of great charge. As Paulus Æmilius, a man well stepped on in yeres, being three score yere old, and yet of good power, by reason of the lustie young men his sonnes, & sonnes in law, besides a great number of his friends and kinsefolke. So all that bare great authoritie, did altogether with one consent counsell him to obey the people, which called him to the Consulship. At the beginning indeede he delayed the people much that came to importune him, and vtterly denied them: saying, he was no meete man neither to desire, nor yet to take vpon him any charge. Howbeit in the end, seeing the people did vrge it vpon him, by knocking continually at his gates, & calling him aloud in the streetes, willing him to come into the market place, & perceiuing they were angrie with him, because he refused it: he was content to be perswaded. And when he stood among them that sued for the Consulship, the people thought straight that he stood not there so much for desire of the office, as for that he put them in hope of assured victorie, and happie successe of this begunne warre: so great was their loue towards him, and the good hope they had of him, that they chose him Consull againe the second time. Wherefore so soone as he was chosen, they would not proceede to drawing of lots according to their custome, which if the two Consuls should happen to go into MACEDON: but presently with a full and whole consent of them all, they gaue him the whole charge of the warres of MACEDON. So being Consull now, and appointed to make warre vpon king Perseus, all the people did honourably companie him home vnto his house: where a litle girle (a daughter of his) called Tertia, being yet an infant, came weeping vnto her father. He making much of her: asked her why she wept. The poore girle answered, colling him about the neck, and kissing him: Alas, father, wote you what? our Perseus is dead. She ment it by a little whelpe so called, which was her play fellow. In good houre, my girle, said he, I like the signe well. Thus doeth Cicero the orator report of it, in his booke of diuinations. The ROMAINES had a custome at that time, that such as were elected Consuls (after that they were openly proclaimed) should make an oration of thankes vnto the people, for the honour and fauour they had shewed him. The people then (according to the custome) being gathered together to heare Æmylius speake, he made this oration vnto them. That the first time he sued to be Consull, was in respect of himselfe, standing at that time in neede of such honour: now he offered himselfe the second time vnto it, for the good loue he bare vnto them, who stood in neede of a generall, wherefore he thought himselfe nothing bound nor beholding vnto them now. And if they did thinke also his warre might be better followed by any other, then by himselfe, he would presently with a glad heart resigne the place. Furthermore, if they had any trust or confidence in him, that they thought him a man sufficient to discharge it: then that they would not speake nor meddle in but his gold and siluer that wonne the cities of GREECE. And Alexander when he went to quer the INDIANS, seeing the MACEDONIANS caty with them all the welth of PERSIA, w made his campe very heauie, and slowe to marche: he himselfe first of all set fire of his o

marche more lightlie, and eaſlier go on the iourney. But Perſeus contrarily would not ſpend any part of his goods, to ſaue himſelfe, his children and realme, but rather yeelded to be led priſoner in triumphe with a great ranſome, to ſhewe the ROMAINES how good a husband he had bene for them. For he did not onely ſend away the GAVLES without giuing them pay as he had promiſed, but moreouer hauing perſwaded Gentius king of ILLYRIA to take his part in theſe warres, for the ſumme of three hundred talents which he had promiſed to furniſh him with, he cauſed the money to be told, and put vp in bags by thoſe whom Gentius ſent to receiue it. Whereupon Gentius thinking himſelfe ſure of the money promiſed, committed a fond and fowle part: for he ſtayed the ambaſſadours the ROMAINES ſent vnto him, and committed them to priſon. This part being come to Perſeus eares, he thought now he needed not hire him with money to be an enemie to the ROMAINES, conſidering he had waded ſo farre, as that he had already done, was as a manifeſt ſigne of his ill will towards them and that it was no late to looke back and repent him, now that his foule part had plunged him into certaine warres, for an vncertaine hope. So did he abuſe the vnfortunate King, and defrauded him of the three hundred talents he had promiſed him. And worſe then this, ſhortly after he ſuffered Lucius Anicius the ROMAINE Prætor, whom they ſent againſt him with an armie, to pluck king Gentius, his wife, and children, out of his realme and kingdome, and to carie them priſoners with him. Now when Æmylius was arriued in MACEDON, to make warre againſt ſuch an enemie, he made no manner of reckoning of his perſon, but of the great preparation and power he had. For in one campe he had foure thouſand horſemen, & no leſſe then fortie thouſand footemen, with the which armie he had planted himſelfe alongſt the ſea ſide, by the foote of the mount Olympus, in a place vnpoſſible to be approached: & there he had ſo well fortified all the ſtraites and paſſages vnto him with fortifications of wood, that he thought himſelfe to lie ſafe out of all danger, and imagined to dally with Æmylius, and by tract of time to eate him out with charge. Æmylius in the meane ſeaſon lay not idle, but occupied his wits throughly, and left no meanes vnattempted, to put ſome thing in proofe. And perceiuing that his ſouldiers by ouermuch licentious libertie (wherein by ſufferance they liued before) were angrie with delaying and lying ſtill, and that they did buſſilie occupie themſelues in the generals office, ſaying this, and ſuch a thing would be done that is not done: he tooke them vp roundly, and commaunded them they ſhould medle no more too curiouſlie in matters that pertained not to them, and that they ſhould take care for nothing elſe, but to ſee their armour, and weapon ready to ſerue valiantly, and to vſe their ſwords after the ROMAINES faſhion, when their generall ſhould appoint and commaund them. Wherefore, to make them more carefull to looke to themſelues, he commanded thoſe that watched, ſhould haue no ſpeares nor pikes, becauſe they ſhould be more wakefull, hauing no long weapon to reſiſt the enemie, if they were aſſaulted. The greateſt trouble his armie had, was lack of freſh water, becauſe the water that ranne to the ſea was very little, & maruellous foule by the ſea ſide. But Æmylius conſidering they were at the foote of the mount Olympus (which is of a maruellous height, and full of wood withall) coniectured, ſeeing the trees ſo freſh and greene, that there ſhould be ſome little pretie ſprings among them, which ran vnder the ground. So he made them dig many holes and wels alongſt the mountaine, which were ſtraight filled with faire water, being pent within ground before for lack of breaking open the heads, which then ran downe in ſtreames, and met together in ſundrie places. And yet ſome do denie, that there is any meeting of waters within the ground, from whence the ſprings do come. For they ſay, that running out of the earth as they do, it is not for that, that the water breaketh out by any violence, or openeth in any place, as meeting together in one place of long time: but that it ingendreth and riſeth at the ſame time and place where it runneth out, turning the ſubſtance into water, which is a moiſt vapour, thickneth & waxeth cold by the coldneſſe of the earth, and ſo becommeth a ſtreame, and runneth downe. Euen ſo, ſay they, as womens breſts are not alwaies full of milke, as milke pans are that continually keepe milke, but do of themſelues conuert the nutriment women take into milke, and after commeth forth at their nipples: the very like are ſprings and watery places of the earth, from whence the fountaines come, which haue no meeting of hidden waters, nor hollow places capable, readily to deliuer water ſto them, as one would draw it out of a pompe or ſeſterne,

Yet the Geometricians say, that there is no mountaine higher, nor sea deeper, then the length of tenne furlongs: so that I thinke this Xenagoras (in my opinion) did not take his measure at auenture, and by gesse, but by true rules of the arte, and instrumentes Geometricall. There Nasica rested all night. King Perseus perceiuing in the meane time that Æmilius stirred not from the place where he lay, mistrusted nothing his practise, and the comming of Nasica who was at hand: vntill such time as a trayrour of CRETA (stealing from Nasica) did reueale vnto him the pretended practise, as also the ROMAINES compassing of him about. He wondred much at these newes, howbeit he remoued not his campe from the place he laie in, but dispatched one of his captaines called Milon, with tenne thousand straungers, and two thousand MACEDONIANS: and straightly commanded him with all the possible speede he could, to get the toppe of the hill before them. Polybius saieth, that the ROMAINES came and gaue them an alarom, when they were sleeping. But Nasica writeth, that there was a marueilous sharpe and terrible battell on the toppe of the mountaine: and saide plainely, that a THRACIAN souldier comming towardes him, he threw his dart at him, and hitting him right in the breast, slew him starke dead: and hauing repulsed their enemies, Milon their captaine shamefully running away in his coat without armour or weapon, he followed him without any danger, and so went downe to the valley, with the safetie of all his companie. This conflict hapning thus, Perseus raised his campe in great haste from the place where he was, and being disapointed of his hope, he retired in great feare, as one at his wits ende, and not knowing how to determine. Yet was he constrained either to stay, and incampe before the citie of PYDNE, there to take the hazard of battell: or else to deuide his armie into his cities & strong holdes, and so receiue the warres within his owne countrie, the which being once crept in, could neuer be driuen out againe, without great murder & bloudshed. Hereupon his friends did counsell him, to chuse rather the fortune of battell: alledging vnto him, that he was the stronger in men a great way, and that the MACEDONIANS would fight lustily with all the courage they could, considering that they fought for the safetie of their wiues & children, and also in the presence of their king, who should both see euery mans doing, & fight himselfe in person also for them. The king moued by these perswasions, determined to venter the chance of battell. So he pitched his campe, and viewed the situation of the places all about, and deuided the companies amongest his captaines, purposing to giue a whotte charge vpon the enemies when they should draw neere. The place and countrie was such, as being all champion, there was a goodly valley to raunge a battell of footemen in, and litle pretie hils also one depending vpon another, which were very commodious for archers, naked men, and such as were lightly armed, to retire themselues vnto being distressed, & also to enuiron their enemies behinde. There were two small riuers also, Æson and Leucus that ranne through the same, the which though they were not very deepe, being about the latter end of the sommer, yet they would annoy the ROMAINES notwithstanding. Now when Æmilius was ioyned with Nasica, he marched on straight in battell ray towards his enemies. But perceiuing a farre off their battell marched in very good order, and the great multitude of men placed in the same: he wondred to behold it, and sodainely staied his armie, considering with himselfe what he had to doe. Then the young captaines hauing charge vnder him, desirous to fight it out presently, went vnto him to pray him to giue the onset: but Nasica specially about the rest, hauing good hope in the former good lucke he had at his first encounter. Æmilius smiling, answered him: So would I doe, if I were as young as thou. But the sundry victories I haue wonne heretofore, hauing taught me by experience the fashion the vanquished doe commit: do forbid me to goe so wholly to worke (before my souldiers haue rested, which did returne but now) to assault an armie set in such order of battell. When he had answered him thus, he commaunded the first bands that were now in view of the enemies, should imbattell themselues, shewing a countenance to the enemie as though they would fight: and that those in the rereward should lodge in the meane time, and fortifie the campe. So, bringing the foremost men to be hindmost, by chaunging from man to man before the enemies were ware of it: he had broken his battell by litle and litle, and lodged his men, fortified within the campe without any tumult or noise, and the enemies neuer perceiuing it. But when night came, and euery man chaunce, thinking by this sound to call her againe, and to make her come to her light, vp many torches lighted, and firebrands into the aire. The MACEDONIANS on the other did no such matter within their campe, but were all together striken with an horrible and there ranne straight a whispering rumour through the people, that this signe in the ment signified the eclipse of the King. For AEmylius was not ignorant of the diuersities eclipses, and he had heard say the cause is, by reason that the moone making her ord course about the world (after certaine reuolutions of time) doth come to enter into the shadowe of the earth, within the which she remaineth hidden: vntill such time as past the darke region of the shadow, she commeth afterwardes to recouer her light which taketh of the sunne. Neuertheless, he being a godly deuout man, so soone as he perceiued moone had recouered her former brightnesse againe, he sacrificed eleuen calues. And the morning also by the breake of day, making sacrifice to Hercules, he could neuer haue any or tokens that promised him good lucke, in sacrificing twentie oxen one after another: the one & twentieth he had signes that promised him victorie, so he defended himself. Wherefore, after he had vowed a solemne sacrifice of a hundred oxen to Hercules, and also gam prices at the weapons, he commaunded his captaines to put their men in readines to fight so sought to winne time, tarying till the sunne came about in the after noone towards West, to the end that the ROMAINES which were turned towards the East, should not it in their faces when they were fighting. In the meane time, he reposed him selfe in his which was all open behind towardes the side that looked into the valley, where the ca his enemies lay. When it grew towardes night, to make the enemies set vpon his men say he vsed this policie. procuring the skirmish. Other say, that the THRACIANS seruing vnder the charge taine Alexander, did set vpon certaine forragers of the ROMAINES, that brought to to the campe: out of the which, seuen hundred of the LAOVRIANS ranne so lustily rescue, and relieue comming still from both armies, at the last the maine battell followed Wherefore AEmylius like a wise generall foreseeing by the daunger of this skirmish, stirring of both campes, what the furie of the battell would come to: came out of his and passing by the bandes did encourage them, and praied them to sticke to it like men. meane time, Nasica thrusting himselfe into the place where the skirmish was whotte ceiued the armie of the enemies marching in battell, readie to ioine. the vpward, were the THRACIANS, who seemed terrible to looke vpon, as he waited selfe: for they were mightie made men, and caried meruellous bright targets of steele them, their legges were armed with greaues, and their thighes with tases, their coates blacke, and marched shaking heauie halberds vpon their shoulders. Next vnto these OIANS, there followed them all the other straungers and souldiers whom the King had diuersely armed and set forth: for they were people of sundrie nations gathered toge mong whom the PEONIANS were mingled. The third squadron was of MACEDONI and all of them chosen men, aswell for the flower of their youth, as for the valiantnesse persons: and they were all in goodly gilt armours, & braue purple cassocks vpon them and spanne new. And at their backes came after them, the old bandes to shew themselues of the campe, with targets of copper, that made all the plaine to shine with the bright their steele and copper. And all the hilles and mountaines thereabouts did bing again an Eccho, with the crie and noyse of so many fighting men, one incouraging another order they marched so fiercely with so great heart burning, and such swiftnesse: th first which were slain at the incounter, fell dead two furlongs frō the camp of the ROMA The charge being giuen and the battell begunne, AEmylius galloping to the vpward battell, perceiued that the captaines of the MACEDONIANS which were in the first ran had alreadie thrust their pikes into the ROMAINES targets, so as they could not come neere them with their swordes: and that the other MACEDONIANS carying their targets behinde them, had now plucked them before them, and did base their pickes all at one time, and made a violent thrust into the targets of the ROMAINES. Which when he had considered, and of what strength and force his wall and ranke of targets was, one ioyning so neere another, and what a terrour it was to see a front of a battell with so many armed pikes and steele heades: he was more afeard and amazed withall, then with any sight he euer saw before. Nertheless he could wisely dissemble it at that time. And so passing by the companies of his horsemen, without either curaces or helmet vpon his head, he shewed a noble cheresull countenance vnto them that fought. But on the contrarie side, Perseus the king of MACEDON, as Polybius writeth, so soone as the battell was begunne, withdrew himselfe, and got into the citie of PYDNE, vnder pretence to goe to doe sacrifice vnto Hercules: who doth not accept the faint sacrifice of cowardes, neither doth receiue their praiers, because they be vnreasonable. For it is no reason, that he that shooteth not, should hit the white: nor that he should winne the victorie, that bideth not the battell: neither that he should haue any good, that doeth nothing toward it: nor that a naughtie man should be fortunate, and prosper. The goddes did fauour AEmylius praiers, because he prayed for victorie with his sworde in his hande, and fighting did call to them for aide. Howbeit there is one Posidonius a writer, who saieth he was in that time, and moreouer, that he was at the battell: and he hath written an historie containing many bookes of the actes of king Perseus, where he saith that it was not for faint heart, nor vnder colour to sacrifice vnto Hercules, that Perseus went from the battell: but because he had a stripe of a horse on the thigh the day before. Who though he could not verie well helpe himselfe, and that all his friends sought to perswade him not to go to the battell: yet he caused one of his horse to be brought to him notwithstanding (which he commonly vsed to ride vp and downe on) and taking his backe, rode into the battell vnarmed, where an infinite number of darts were throwen at him from both sides. And among those, he had a blow with a dart that hurt him somewhat, but it was ouerthwart, and not with the point, and did hit him on the left side glansing wise, with such a force, that it rent his coate, and rased his skinne vnderneath, so as it left a marke behinde a long time after. And this is all that Posidonius writeth to defend and excuse Perseus. The ROMAINES hauing their hands full, and being stayed by the battell of the MACEDONIANS that they could make no breach into them: there was a captaine of the PELIGNIANS called Salius, who tooke the ensigne of his band, and cast it among the prease of his enemies. Then all the PELIGNIANS brake in vpon them, with a marueilous force and furie into that place: for all ITALIANS thinke it too great a shame and dishonour for souldiers to lose or forsake their ensigne. This was there marueilous force of both sides vsed in that place: for the PELIGNIANS prouoked to cut the MACEDONIANS pikes with their swordes, or else to make them giue backe with their great targets or to make a breach into them, and to take the pikes with their handes. But the MACEDONIANS to the contrarie, holding their pikes fast with both handes, ranne them thorow that came neere vnto them: so that neither target nor corselet could hold out the force and violence of the push of their pikes, in so much as they turned vp the heeles of the PELIGNIANS and TERRACINIANS, who like desperate beastes without reason, shutting in themselues among their enemies, ranne wilfully vpon their owne deathes, and their first rancke were slaine euerie man of them. Thereupon those that were behind, gaue backe a litle, but fled not turning their backes, and only retired giuing backe towards the mountaine Olocrus. AEmilius seeing that (as Posidonius writeth) rent his armour coate from his backe for anger, because that some of his men gaue backe: other durst not from the battell of the MACEDONIANS, which was so strongly imbattelled on euerie side, and so mured in with a wall of pikes, presenting their armed heads on euery side a man could come, that it was impossible to breake into them, no not so much as come neere them onely. Yet notwithstanding, because the fielde was not altogether plaine and euen, the battell that was large in the front, could not alwayes keepe their wall, continuing their targets close one to another, but they were driuen of necessitie to breake and open in many places, as it happeneth oft in great battels, according to the great force of the ſouldiers: that in one place they thruſt forward, and in another they giue back and leaue a hole. Wherefore AEmilius ſodainely taking the vantage of this occaſion deuided his men into ſmall companies, and commaunded them they ſhould quickly thruſt in betwixt their enemies, and occupie the places they ſaw voide in the front of their enemies, and that they ſhould ſet on them in that ſort, and not with one whole continuall charge, but diuerſly pying them here and there with diuers companies in ſundry places. AEmilius gaue this charge vnto the priuate captaines of euery band and their lieutenantes, and the captaines alſo gaue the like charge vnto their ſouldiers that could skilfully execute their commaundement. For they went preſently into thoſe parts where they ſawe the places open, and being once entred in among them, ſome gaue charge vpon the flankes of the MACEDONIANS, who they were all naked and vnarmed: other ſet vpon them behind: ſo that the ſtrength of all the corpes of the battell (which conſiſteth in keeping cloſe together) being opened in this ſort was ſtraight ouerthrowen. Furthermore, when they came to fight man for man, or two againſt a fewe: the MACEDONIANS with their litle ſhort ſwordes, came to ſtrike vpon the great ſhields of the ROMAINES, which were very ſtrong, and couered all their bodies downe to the foote. And they to the contrarie, were driuen of neceſſitie to receiue the blowes of the ſtrong heauie ſwordes of the ROMAINES, vpon their litle weake targets: ſo that what with their heauineſſe, and the vehement force wherewith the blowes lighted vpon them, there was no target nor corſelet, but they paſſed it through, and ranne them in. By reaſon whereof they could make no long reſiſtance, whereupon they turned their backes and ranne away. But when they came to the ſquadron of the olde beaten ſouldiers of the MACEDONIANS, there was the cruelleſt fight and moſt deſperate ſeruice, where they ſay that Marcus Cato (ſonne to great Cato, and ſonne in lawe of AEmylius) ſhewing all the valiantneſſe in his perſon that noble minde could poſſibly performe, loſt his ſword which fell out of his hand. But he being a young man of noble courage, that had bene valiantly brought vp in all diſcipline, and knew how to follow the ſteppes of his father (the nobleſt perſon that euer man ſawe) was more ſorie then his value and worthineſſe, and thought it more honour for him there to die, then liue to ſuffer his enemies to enioy any ſpoile of his. So, by and by he ranne into the ROMAINES armie, to find out ſome of his friends, whom he tolde what had befallen him, and prayed them to helpe him to recouer his ſword: whereto they agreed. And being a good company of luſtie valiant ſouldiers together, they ruſhed ſtraight in among their enemies, at the place where he brought them, and ſo did ſet vpon them with ſuch force and furie, that they made a way through the middeſt of them, and with great ſlaughter and ſpilling of bloud, euen by force they cleared the way ſtill before them. Now when the place was voyded, they ſought for the ſword, and in the ende found it with great a doe, amongeſt a heape of other ſwordes and dead bodies, whereat they reioyced maruellouſly. Then ſinging a ſong of victorie, they went againe more fiercely then before to giue a charge vpon their enemies, who were not broken a ſunder: vntill ſuch time as at the length, the three thouſand choſen MACEDONIANS fighting valiantly euen to the laſt man, and neuer forſaking their rankes, were all in the place. After whoſe ouerthrow, there was a great ſlaughter of other alſo that fled: ſo that all the vallie and foote of the mountaines thereaboutes was couered with dead bodies. The next day after the battell, when the ROMAINES did paſſe ouer the riuer of Leuca, they found it running all a bloud. For it is ſaide there were ſlaine at this fielde, of Perſeus men aboue fiue and twentie thouſand: and of the ROMAINES ſide, as Poſidonius ſaieth, not aboue ſixe ſcore, or as Naſica writeth, but foureſcore onely. And for ſo great an ouerthrowe, it is reported it was wonderfull quickly done and executed. For they beganne to fight about three of the clocke in the after noone, and had wonne the victorie before foure, and all the reſt of the day they followed their enemies in chaſe, an hundred and twentie furlongs from the place where the battell was fought: ſo that it was verie late, and farre foorth night, before they returned againe into the campe. So ſuch as returned, were receiued with maruellous great ioye of their pages that went out with linckes and torches lighted, to bring their maſters into their tents, where their men had made great bonfires, and decked them vp with crownes and garlands of laurell, ſauing the generals tent onely: who was very heauie, for that of his ſonne sonne he brought with him to the warres, the younger could not be found, which he loued best of the twaine, because he saw he was of a better nature then the rest of his brethren. For euen then, being new crept out of the shell as it were, he was marueilous valiaunt and hardy, and desired honour wonderfully. Now AEmylius thought he had been cast away, fearing least for lacke of experience in the warres, and through the rashnesse of his youth, he had put himselfe too farre in sight amongst the preasse of the enemies. Hereupon the campe heard straight what sorrow AEmylius was in, and how grieuously he tooke it. The Romaines being set at supper rose from their meate, and with torch light some ran to AEmylius tent, other went out of the campe to seek him among the dead bodies, if they might know him: so all the campe was full of sorrow and mourning, the vallies and hilles all about did ring againe with the cries of those that called Scipio by name. For euen from his childhood he had a naturall gift in him aboue all the rest, and singular paine required in a captaine and wise gouernour of the commonweale aboue all the young men of his time. At the last, when they were out of all hope of his comming againe, he happily returned from the chase of the enemies, with two or three of his familiars only, all bloudied with new blood (like a swift running greyhound flobbed with the blood of the hare) hauing pursued very farre for ioy of the victory. It is that Scipio which afterwards destroyed both the cities of Carthage and Numantia, who was the greatest man of warre, and valiantest captaine of the Romaines in his time, and of the greatest authority and reputation among them. Thus fortune deferring till another time her reuenge of her spite, which she did beare to so noble an exploite, suffered AEmylius for that time to take his full pleasure of this noble victory. And as for Perseus, he fled straight from the city of Pydna, vnto the city of Pella, with his horsemen, which were in number all armed. Whereupon the footmen that saued themselues by flying, meeting them by the way, called them traitours, cowards, and villaines: and worse then that, they turned head of their owne accord, and fought it out lustely with them. Perseus seeing that, and fearing least this might turne to light on his necke, he rowelled his horse out of the high way, and put off his purple coate, and caried it before him, and tooke his diademe, fearing least they should know him by these tokens: and because he might more easily speake with his friends by the way, he lighted a foote, and led his horse in his hand. But such as were about him, one made as though he would mend the lacket of his shooe, another seemed to water his horse, another as though he would drinke: so that one dragging after another in this sort, they all left him at last, and ranne their way, not fearing the enemies fury so much, as their Kinges cruelty: who being grieued with his misfortune, sought to lay the fault of the ouerthrow vpon all other but himselfe. Now he being come into the city of Pella by night, Eudeus and Eudeus, two of his treasurers came vnto him, & speaking boldly (but out of time) presumed to tell him the great fault he had committed, and did counsell him also what he should do. The King was moued with their presumption, that with his owne hands he stabbed his dagger in their sides, and slue them outright. But after this fact, all his seruaunts and friends refused him, and left him onely caried with him but Euander Cretan, Archedamus Aetolian, and Neobolo Macedon. And as for the mean souldiers, there were none that followed him but the Cretans, and that was not for the good will they did beare him, but for the loue of his gold and siluer, as they that keepe their liues for loue of the hony. For he caried with him a great treasure, and gaue them leaue to spoile certaine plate and vessell of golde and siluer, to the value of fifty talents. But first of all, when he was come into the city of Amphipolis, and afterwards into the city of Alexander, and that the feare was well blowen ouer: he returned againe to his old humour, which was borne and bred with him, and that was, auarice and misery. For he made his complaint vnto those that were about him, that he had vnwares giuen to the souldiers of Crete all his plate and vessell of gold to be spoiled, being those which in old time belonged vnto the great, and praied them with teares in his eyes, that had the plate, they would be content to chāge it for ready money. Now such as knew his nature, found straight this was but a fraude and a Cretan lie, to deceiue the Cretans with: but those that trusted him, and did restore againe the plate they had, did lose it euery iotte, for he neuer paid them penny of it. He got of his friends the value of thirty talents, which his enemies soone after did take from fame is more to be wondred at. For foure daies after Perſeus had loſt the battell, and the citie of PELLA was taken, as the people of ROME were at the liſtes or ſhew place, for games: ſodainly there roſe a rumour at the entring into the liſtes where they were, how AEmylius had wonne a great battell of king Perſeus, and had conquered MACEDON. Newes brought to Rome out of Macedon in 4. daies, of AEmylius victorie there: and no man knew how they came.

And ſurely, the maruellous fortune he happened on in the citie of PELLA, doth confirme it much, which a man cannot aſcribe otherwiſe, but to the grace of the goddes. For one day beginning to doe ſacrifice, lightning fell from heauen, ſet all the wodde a fire vpon the aulter, and ſanctified the ſacrifice. But yet the miracle Wonders.

These newes was rife ſtraight in euery mans mouth, and there followed vpon maruellous ioy and great cheere in euery corner, with ſhouts and clapping of hands, that continued all the day through the citie of ROME. Afterwardes they made diligent enquirie, this rumor firſt came vp, but no certaine author could be knowen, and euery man ſaid heard it ſpoken: ſo as in the end it came to nothing, and paſſed away in that ſort for vaine. But ſhortly after, there came letters, and certaine newes that made them wonder more before, from whence the meſſenger came that reported the firſt newes of it: which could deuiſed by no naturall meanes, and yet proued true afterwardes. We doe read alſo of tell that was fought in ITALIE, neare vnto the riuer of SAGRA, whereof newes was the very ſame day vnto PELOPONNESVS. And of another alſo in like maner that was in ASIA againſt the MEDES, before the citie of MEDIA: the newes whereof came day vnto the campe of the GRECIANS, lying before the citie of PLATONIA. And in the iourney where the ROMAINES ouerthrew the Tarquines, and the army of the LATINES immediatly after the battell was wonne, they ſaw two goodly young men come newly from campe, who brought newes of the victory to ROME, and they iudged they were Caſtor and Pollux. The firſt man that ſpake to them in the market place before the fountaine, where he watered their horſe being all of a white ſome, told them: that they wondred how they could ſo quickly bring theſe newes. And they laughing came to him, and rooke him ſoftly by the beard with both their handes, and euen in the market place his haire being blacke before, preſently turned yellow. This miracle made them beleeue the report the man made, who after was called AEnobarbus, as you would ſay, bearded as yellow as gold. Another matter that happened in our time, maketh all ſuch newes credible. For when Antonius rebelled againſt the Emperour Domitian, the citie of ROME was in a maruellous perplexity, becauſe they looked for great warres towardes GERMANIE. But in this feare, there grew a ſodaine rumor of victory, and it went currantly through ROME, that Antonius him ſelfe was ſlaine, and his army ouerthrowen, & not a man left aliue. This rumor was ſo rife, that many of the feſt men of ROME beleeued it, and did ſacrifice thereupon vnto the gods, giuing them thanks for the victory. But when the matter came to fifting, who was the firſt author of the rumor, man could tell. For one put it ouer ſtill to another, & it died ſo in the end amongſt them, as in a bottomleſſe matter, for they could neuer bouke out any certaine ground of it: but as it came flying into ROME, ſo went it flying away againe, no man can tell how. Notwithſtanding, Domitian holding on his iourney to make this warre, met with poſtes that brought him letters for the certaine victory: and remembring the rumor of the victory that ranne before in ROME, he found it true, that it was on the very ſame day the victory was gotten, the diſtance betweene ROME and the place where the fielde was wonne, was aboue two thouſand furlongs off. Euery man in our time knoweth this to be true. But againe to our ſtory. Cn. Octauius, lieutenant of the army of AEmylius by ſea, came to ancker vnder the iſle SAMOTHRACIA, where he would not take Perſeus by force out of the ſanctuary where he was, for the reuerence he did beare vnto the goddes Caſtor and Pollux: but he did beſiege AEnobarbus why ſo called. Cn. Octauius AEmylius lieutenant by ſea.

in such sort, as he could not scape him, nor flie by sea out of the Iland. Yet he had secretly practised with one Oroandes a CRETAN, that had a brigantine, and was at a prise with him for a summe of money to conuay him away by night: but the CRETAN serued him a right CRETANS tricke. For when he had taken a bord by night into his vessell, all the Kings treasure of golde and siluer, he sent him word that he should not faile the next night following to come vnto the peere by the temple of Ceres, with his wife, his children and seruants, where in deed was no possibility to take shipping: but the next night following he hoised saile, and got him away. It was a pittifull thing that Perseus was driuen to do and suffer at that time. For he came downe in the night by ropes, out of a litle straight window vpon the wals, and not only him selfe, but his wife and litle babes, who neuer knew before what flying and hardnes ment. And yet he fetched a more grieuous bitter sigh, when one told him on the peere, that he saw Oroandes the CRETAN vnder saile in the main seas. Then day beginning to breake, & seeing him self voide of all hope, he ran with his wife for life to the wall, to recouer the sanctuary againe, before the ROMAINES that saw him could ouertake him. And as for his children, he had giuen them him selfe into the hands of one Ion, whom before he had maruellously loued, and who then did traiterously betray him: for he deliuered his children vnto the ROMAINES. Which part was one of the chiefest causes that draue him (as a beast that will follow her litle ones being taken from her) to yeeld him selfe into their hands that had his children. Now hee had a special confidence in Scipio Nasica, and therefore he asked for him when he came to yeeld him selfe, but it was aunswered him, that he was not there. Then hee beganne to lament his hard and miserable fortune euery way: And in the end, considering how necessity enforced him, he yeelded him selfe into the handes of Cneus Octauius, wherein he shewed plainely, that he had another vice in him more vnmanly and vile, then auarice: that was, a faint heart, and fear to die. But hereby he depriued him selfe of others pity and compassion towards him, being that only thing which fortune cannot deny and take from the afflicted, and specially from them that haue a noble hart. For he made request they wold bring him vnto the generall AEmylius, who rose from his chaire when he saw him come, and went to meete him with his friends, the water standing in his eyes, to meete a great King by fortune of warre, and by the will of the gods, fallen into that most lamentable fact. But he to the contrary, vnmanly, and shamefully behaued him selfe. For he fell downe at his feete, and embraced his knees, and vttered such vncomely speach and vile requestes, as AEmylius selfe could not abide to heare them: but knitting his browes against him, being heartely offended, he spake thus vnto him. Alas poore man, why dost thou discharge fortune of this fault, wher thou mightest iustly charge & accuse her to thy discharge, doing things, for the which euery one iudgeth thou hast deserued thy present misery, and art vnworthy also of thy former honor? why dost thou defame my victory, and blemish the glory of my doings, shewing thy selfe so base a man, as my honor is not great to ouercome vnworthy an enemy? The ROMAINES haue euer esteemed magnanimity, euen in their greatest enemies: but dastardlines, though it be fortunate, yet it is hated of euery body. Notwithstanding, he tooke him vp, and taking him by the hand, gaue him into the custody of Aelius Tubero. Then Amylius went into his tent, and caried his sonnes, and sons in law with him, and other men of quality, and specially the younger sort. And being set downe, he continued a great space very pensiue with him selfe, not speaking a word: in so much that all the standers by wondered much at the matter. In the end he began to enter into discourse and talke of fortune, and the vnconstancy of these worldly things, and said vnto them. Is there any man liuing, my frends, who hauing fortune at will, should therefore boast and glory in the prosperitie of his doings, for that he hath conquered a countrey, city, or Realme: and not rather to feare the vnconstancy of fortune? who laying before our eyes, and all those that professe armes at this present, so notable an example of the common frailty of men, doth plainely teach vs to thinke, that there is nothing constant or perdurable in this world. For when is it, that men may think them selues assured, considering that when they haue ouercome others, then are they driuen to mistrust fortune most, and to mingle fear & mistrust, with ioy of victory: if they will wisely consider the cõmon course of fatall destiny that altereth daily, sometime fauouring one, otherwhile throwing down another? you see, that in an houres space we haue troden vnder our feet mission from the Senate of ROME, to suffer his souldiers who had done seruice in the battell, and ouerthrowe of king Perseus, to spoile all the cities of that countrie. Wherefore that he might surprise them on a sodaine, and that they should mistrust nothing, he sent to all the cities that they should send him by a certaine day, tenne of the chiefest men of euerie citie. Who when they were come, he commaunded them to go and bring him by such a day, all the gold and siluer they had within their cities, aswell in their priuate houses, as in their temples and Churches, and gaue vnto euerie one of them a captaine and garrison with them, as if it had beene onely to haue receiued and searched for the golde and siluer he demaunded. But when the day appointed was come, the souldiers in diuers places (and all at one time) set vpon their enemies, and did rifle and spoile them of that they had, and made them also pay ransome euerie man: So as by this policie, there were taken and made slaues in one day, a hundred and fiftie thousand persons, and three score and tenne cities spoiled and sacked euery one. And yet when they came to deuide the spoile of this generall destruction of a whole Realme by the polle, it came not to euerie souldiers part, aboue eleuen siluer Drachmes a peece. Which made euerie one to wonder greatly, and to feare also the terrour of the warres, to see the wealth and riches of so great a Realme, to amount to so litle for euerie mans share. When Æmylius had done this fact against his owne nature, which was verie gentle and courteous: he went vnto the sea side to the citie of ORICA, and there imbarked with his army bound for ITALIE. Where when he was atriued, he went vp the riuer of Tyber against the streame, in king Perseus cheefe galley, which had sixteene owers on a side, richely set out with the armour of the prisoners, riche clothes of purple colour, and other such spoiles of the enemies: so that the ROMAINES running out of ROME in multitudes of people to see this galley, and going side by side by her as they rowed softly, Æmylius tooke as great pleasure in it, as in any open games or feastes, or triumphe that had bene shewed in deed. But when the souldiers saw, that the golde and siluer of king Perseus treasure was not deuided amongst them according vnto promise, and that they had a great deale lesse then they looked for, they were maruellously offended, and inwardly grudged Æmylius in their hearts. Neuerthelesse they durst not speake it openly, but did accuse him, that he had bene too straight vnto them in his warre: and therefore they did shewe no great desire, nor forwardnesse, to procure him the honour of triumphe. Which Seruius Galba vnderstanding, that had bene an olde enemie of his, notwithstanding he had the charge of a thousand men vnder him in this warre: he like an enuious viper tolde the people, how Æmylius had not deserued the honor of triumph, and sowed seditious words against him among the souldiers, to aggraduate their ill will the more against him. Moreouer, he craued a day of the Tribunes of the people, to haue respit to bring forth such matter as they determined to obiect against him: saying, the time then was ouer spent, the sunne being but foure houres high, and that it would require longer time and leysure. The Tribunes made him answer, that he should speake then what he had to say against him, or otherwise they would not graunt him audience. Hereupon he began to make a long oration in his dispraise, full of railing wordes, and spent all the rest of the day in that railing oration. Afterwardes when night came on, the Tribunes broke vp the assembly, and the next morning the souldiers being incouraged by Galbaes oration, and hauing conferred together, did flocke about Galba, in the mount of the Capitoll, where the Tribunes had giuen warning they would keepe their assembly. Now being broad day, Æmylius triumphe was referred to the most number of voices of the people, and the first tribe flatly did denie his triumphe. The Senate, and the residue of the people hearing that, were very sory to see they did Æmylius so open wrong and iniury. The common people saide nothing to it, but seemed to be very sory, howbeit they sought no redresse. The Lords of the Senate cried out vpon them, and saide it was too much shame, and exhorted one another to bridle the insolency and boldnesse of these souldiers, who would grow in the end to such tumult and disorder, that they would commit all mischiefe and wickednesse, if betimes they were not looked to, and preuented, seeing they did so openly stand against their generall, seeking to deprine him of the honour of his triumphe and victory. So they assembled a good company of them together, and went vp to the Capitoll, and prayed the Tribunes they would stay to take the voices of round targets of the CRETANS, and iauelings of the THRACIANS, and arrowes amongst the armed pikes: all this armour and cariage, being bound one to another so trimly (neither being too lose, nor too straight) that one hitting against another, as they drew them vpon the cartes through the citie, they made such a sound and noise, as it was fearefull to heare it: so that the only sight of these spoiles of the captaines being ouercome, made the sight so much more terrible to behold it. After these carts loden with armor, there followed three thousand men, which caried the ready money in seuen hundred and fiftie vessels, which waighed about three talents a peece, and euery one of them were caried by foure men: and there were other that caried great bowles of siluer, cups and goblets fashioned like hornes, and other pots to drinke in, goodly to behold, aswell for ther bignes, as for their great and singular imbossed workes about it. The third day early in the morning, the trumpets beganne to sound and set forwards, sounding no march nor sweet note, to beautifie the triũph withall: but they blew out the braue alarõ they sound at an assault, to giue the souldiers courage for to fight. After them followed fixe score goodly fat oxen, hauing all their hornes gilt, and garlands of flowers & nosegaies about their heads, and there went by them certaine young men, with aprons of needle worke, girt about their middle, who led them to the sacrifice, & young boyes with them also, that caried goodly basons of gold and siluer, to cast & sprinkle the bloud of the sacrifices about. And after these, followed those that caried all coynes of gold deuided by basons & vessels, and euery one of them waying three talents as they did before, that caried the great holy cup, which Æmylius had caused to be made of massie gold, set full of precious stones, waying the weight of ten talents, to make an offering vnto the gods. And next vnto them went other that caried plate, made & wrought after antike fashion, and notable cups of the ancient kings of MACEDON: as the cup called Antigonus, and another Seleucus: and to be short, all the whole cubberd of plate of golde and siluer of king Perseus. And next them came the charret of his armour, in the which was all king Perseus harneſſe, and his royall band (they call a Diademe) vpon his armour. And a litle space betweene them, followed next the Kings children, whom they led prisoners, with the traine of their scholemasters and other officers, & their seruants, weeping and lamenting: who held vp their hands vnto the people that looked vpon them, and taught the kings young children to do the like, to aske mercie and grace at the peoples hands. There were three prety litle children, two sonnes and a daughter amongst them, whose tender yeares and lacke of vnderstanding, made them (poore soules) they could not feele their present miserie, which made the people so much more to pittie them, when they saw the poore litle infants, that they knew not the change of their hard fortune: so that for the compassion they had of them, they almost let the father passe without looking vpon him. Many peoples hearts did melt for very pittie, that the teares ran downe their cheekes, so as this sight brought both pleasure & sorow, together to the lookers on, vntil they were past & gone a good way out of sight. King Perseus the father, followed after his children and their traine, and he was clothed in a blacke gowne, wearing a paire of slippers on his feete after his country maner. He shewed by his countenance his troubled mind, oppreſt with sorrow of his most miserable state and fortune. He was followed with his kinsefolks, his familiar friends, his officers and houshold seruants, their faces disfigured by blubbering, shewing to the world by their lamenting teares, and sorrowfull eyes cast vpon their vnfortunate maister, how much they sorrowed & bewailed his most hard and cruell fortune, litle accounting of their own misery. The voice goeth, that Perseus sent vnto Æmylius to intreat him, that he should not be led through the city in the shew & sight of the triumph. But AEmylius mocking (as he deserued) his cowardly faint heart, aunswered: as for that, it was before, and is now in him, to do if he will. Meaning to let him vnderstand thereby, that he might rather chuse to die, then liuing to receiue such open shame. Howbeit his hart would not serue him, he was so cowardly, and made so effeminate, by a certaine vaine hope hee knew not what, that he was contented to make one among his owne spoils. After all this, there followed 400. princely crownes of gold, which the cities and towns of GREECE had purposely sent by their ambassadours vnto AEmylius, to honour his victory: and next vnto them, he came him selfe in his charret triumphing, which was passing sumptuously set forth and adorned. It was a noble sight to behold: and yet the person of him selfe onely was worth the looking on, without al that great pomp & magnificence. For he was apparelled in a purple gown branched with gold, & caried in his right hand a laurell bough, as all his army did beside which being deuided by bands & companies, followed the triumphing charret of their captaine, some of the souldiers singing songs of victorie, which the ROMAINES vse to sing in their triumphs, mingling them with merrie pleasant toyes, reioycing at their captaine. Other of them also did sing songs of triumph, in the honor & praise of Æmylius noble conquest and victorie. He was openly praised, blessed, & honored of euery bodie, & neither hated nor enuied of honest men. Sauing the ordinarie vse of some god, whose propertie is alwaies to lesson or cut off some part of mans exceeding prosperitie & felicitie, mingling with mans life the sence & feeling of good and euill together: because that no liuing person should passe all his time of life without some aduersitie or misfortune, but that such (as Homer saith) should only thinke themselues happie, to whom fortune hath equally sorted the good with the euill. And this I speake because Æmylius had 4. sonnes, two of the which he gaue in adoption vnto the families of Scipio & of Fabius, as we haue said before: and two other which he had by his second wife, he brought vp with him in his owne house, & were both yet very young. Of the which the one died, being 14. yeres of age fiue daies before his fathers triumph: and the other died also 3. daies after the pompe of triumph, at 12. yeres of age. When this sorowfull chance had befallen him, euerie one in ROME did pittie him in their hearts: but fortunes spight and crueltie did more greeue and feare them, to see her litle regard towards him, to put into a house of triumphe (full of honour and glorie, and of sacrifices and ioy) such a pittifull mourning, and mingling of sighs, sorowes and lamentations of death, amongst such songs of triumphe and victory. Notwithstanding this, Æmylius taking things like a wise man, thought that he was not only to vse constancie & magnanimitie, against the sword and pike of the enemy: but a like also against all aduersitie and enmitie of spightfull fortune. So, he wisely waied and considered his present fortune with his former prosperitie: & finding his misfortune counterpeased with felicity, & his priuate griefes cut off with common ioy, he gaue no place to his sorowes & mischance, neither blemished any way the dignity of his triumphe & victory. For when he had buried the eldest of his two last sonnes, he left not to make his triumphant entrie, as you haue heard before. And his second sonne also being deceased after his triumph, he caused the people to assemble, and in face of the whole city he made an oration, not like a discomforted man, but like one rather that did comfort his sorowfull countrimen for his mischance. He told them, that concerning mens matters, neuer any thing did feare him: but for things aboue, he euer feared fortune, mistrusting her change and inconstancie, and specially in the last warre, doubting for so great prosperitie as could be wished, to be paide home with an after intollerable aduersitie, or sinister chance. For as I went (said he) I passed ouer the gulfe of the Adriatike sea, from BRUNDUSIVM vnto CORCYRE in one day. And from thence in fiue daies after, I arriued in the citie of DELPHES, where I did sacrifice vnto Apollo. And within fiue other daies, I arriued in my campe, where I found mine army in MACEDON. And after I had done the sacrifice, and also ceremonies for purifying of the same, I presently began to follow the purpose and cause of my comming: so as in 15. daies after, I made an honorable end of all those warres. But yet, mistrusting fortune alwaies, seeing the prosperous course of my affaires, and considering that there were no other enemies, nor dangers I needed to feare: I feared sorely she would change at my returne, when I should be vpon the sea, bringing home so goodly & victorious an army, with so many spoiles, and so many Princes and Kings taken prisoners. And yet when I was safely arriued in the hauen, and seeing all the city at my returne full of ioy, and of feasts and sacrifices, I still suspected fortune, knowing her manner well enough, that she vseth not to gratifie men frankly, nor to graunt them so great things clearly, without some certain sparke of enuy waiting on them. Neither did my minde being still occupied in feare of some thing to happen to the common wealth, shake off this fear behind me: but that I saw, this home mishap and misery lighted vpon me, enforcing me with mine own hands in these holy daies of my triumph, to bury my two young sonnes one after another, which I onely brought vp with me, for the succession of my name & house. Wherefore, me thinkes now I may say, I am out of all danger, & the least touching my chiefest and greatest misfortune: and do begin to stablish my selfe with this assured hope, that this good fortune henceforth shall remaine with vs euermore, without feare of other vnlucky or siniſter chance. For ſhe hath ſufficiently countermailed the fauorable victorie ſhe gaue you, with the enuious miſhap wherewith ſhe hath plagued both me & mine: ſhewing the conquerer and triumpher, as noble an example of mans miſerie & weaknes, as the partie conquered, that had bene led in triumph. Sauing that Perſeus yet conquered as he is, hath this comfort left him: to ſee his children liuing, & that the conquerour Aemylius hath loſt his. And this was the ſumme of Æmylius notable oration he made vnto the people of ROME, proceeding of a noble and honorable diſpoſed minde. And though it pitied him in his heart to ſee the ſtraunge chaunge of king Perſeus fortune, and that he heartily deſired to helpe him, and to doe him good: yet he could neuer obtaine other grace for him, but onely to remoue him from the common priſon (which the ROMAINES call Carter) into a more cleanly and ſweeter houſe: where being ſtraightly garded & looked vnto, he killed himſelfe by abſtinence from meate, as the moſt part of hiſtoriographers do write. Yet ſome writers tell a maruellous ſtraunge tale, and manner of his death. For they ſay the ſouldiers that garded him, kept him from ſleepe, watching him ſtraightly when ſleepe tooke him, & would not ſuffer him to ſhut his eye lidde (onely vpon malice they did beare him, becauſe they could not otherwiſe hurt him) keeping him awake by force, not ſuffering him to take reſt: vntill ſuch time as nature being forced to giue ouer, he gaue vp the ghoſt. Two of his ſonnes died alſo: but the third called Alexander, became an excellent turner and ioyner, and was learned, and could ſpeake the ROMAINES tongue very well, and did write it ſo trimly, that afterwards he was chancelour to the magiſtrates of ROME, and did wiſely and diſcreetly behaue himſelfe in his office. Furthermore, they do adde to this goodly conqueſt of the realme of MACEDON, that Æmylius conquered another ſpeciall good thing, that made him maruellouſlie well liked of the common people: that is, that he brought ſo much golde and ſiluer vnto the treaſurie ſtore of ROME, as the common people needed neuer after to make contribution for any thing, vntill the very time and yeare that Hirtius and Panſa were Conſuls, which was about the beginning of the firſt warres of Auguſtus and Antonius. And yet Æmylius had one ſingular good gift in him: that though the people did greatly loue and honour him, yet he euer tooke part with the Senate and nobilitie, and did neuer by worde nor deed any thing in fauour of the people, to flatter or pleaſe them, but in matters concerning gouernment, he did euer leane to the nobilitie and good men. And this did Appius afterwards caſt in his ſonnes teethe, Scipio Africanus. For both of them being two of the chiefeſt men of their time, and contending together for the office of Cenſor: Appius had about him to fauour his ſute, all the Senate and Nobilitie, as of auncient time the familie of the Appians had euer held on their part. And Scipio Africanus, though he was a great man of himſelfe, yet he was in all times fauoured and beloued of the common people. Whereupon when Appius ſawe him come into the market place, followed with men of ſmall quality and baſe condition, that had bene ſlaues before, but otherwiſe could skilfully handle ſuch practiſes, bring the people together, and by opportunity of cries and loud voices (if neede were) obtaine what they would in the aſſemblies of the city: he ſpake out aloud, and ſaide. O Paulus Æmylius, now haſt thou good cauſe to ſighe and mourne in thy graue where thou lieſt (if the dead doe know what we doe here on earth) to ſee Æmylius a common ſergeant, and Licinius a prattling fellow, how they bring thy ſonne vnto the dignity of a Cenſor. And as for Scipio, he was alwaies beloued of the common people, becauſe he did fauour them in all things. But Æmylius alſo, although hee tooke euer the noble mens part, he was not therefore leſſe beloued of the common people, then thoſe that alwaies flattered them, doing all things as the people would, to pleaſe them: which the common people did witneſſe, aſwell by other honors and offices they offred him, as in the dignity of the Cenſor which they gaue him. For it was the higheſt office of all other at that time, & of greateſt power and authority, ſpecially for inquiry and reformation of euery mans life & manners. For he that was Cenſor, had authority to put any Senatour of the counſell, and ſo diſgrade him, if he did not worthely behaue him ſelfe according to his place and calling: & might name and declare any one of the Senat, whom he thought to be moſt honeſt, and fitteſt for the place again. Moreouer, they might by their authority, take frõ licẽtious yong men, their horſe which was kept at the charge of the common weale. Furthermore, they be the seſſours of the people, and the muſter maſters, keeping bookes of the number of perſons at euery muſter. So there appeared numbred in the regiſter booke Æmilius made then of them, three hundred ſeuen and thirtie thouſand, foure hundred and two and fiftie men, and Marcus Æmylius Lepidus named preſident of the Senate, who had that honour foure times before, and did put out of counſell three Senators, that were but meane men. And the like meane and moderation he and his companion, Martius Philippus kept, vpon view and muſter taken of the Romane horſemen. But during this time of his abſence, the ROMAINES ſhed for him many a time and often. And when they were gathered together in the Theatre to ſee the playes and ſportes, they cryed out diuerſe times for him: whereby they ſhewed how they had a great deſire to ſee him againe. Time being come about when they vſed to make the ſolemne yearely ſacrifice, and Æmilius finding himſelfe alſo in good perfect health, he returned againe to ROME, where he made the ſacrifice with the other prieſtes, all the people of ROME gathering about him, reioycing much to ſee him. The next day after, he made another particular ſacrifice, to giue thankes vnto the gods for recouerie of his health. After the ſacrifice was ended, he went home to his houſe, and ſate him downe to dinner: but ſuddenly he many goodly glorious ornaments, neither with golde, ſiluer, nor iuorie, nor with other ſumptuouſneſſe or magnificence of apparell, but with the loue and good will of the people of them confeſsing his vertue and well doing: and this did not onely his naturall countrie performe in memorie of him, but his very enemies alſo. For all thoſe that met in Rome by chance at that time, that were either come out of SPAINE, from GENNA, or out of MACEDON, all thoſe that were young and ſtrong, did willingly put themſelues vnder the bier where his bodie laye, to helpe to carrie him to the churche: and the olde men followed his bodie to accompanie the ſame, calling Æmylius the benefactour, ſauiour, and father of their countrie. For he did not onely intreate them gently, and graciouſlie, whom he had ſubdued: but all his life time hee was euer readie to pleaſure them, and to ſet forwarde their cauſes, euen as they had bene his confederates, very friends, and neere kinſmen. The end of Paulus AEmylius life

THE LIFE OF Timoleon.

BEFORE Timoleon was sent into SICILE, thus stoode the state of the SYRACVSANS. After that Dion had driuen out the tyraunt Dionysius, he himselfe after was slaine immediatly by treason, and those that ayded him to restore the SYRACVSANS to their libertie, fel out, and were at diffention among themselues. By reason whereof, the cittie of SYRACVSA chaunging continually newe tyrantes, was so troubled and turmoiled with all sort of euills, that it was left in manner desolate, & without inhabitants. The rest of SICILE in like case was vtterly destroyed, and no cities in maner left standing, by reason of the long warres: and those few that remained, were most inhabited of forreine souldiers & straungers (a company of lose men gathered together that tooke pay of no prince nor cittie) & the dominions of the same being easily vsurped, & as easie to change their lord. Insomuch, Dionysius, the tyrant, ten yeres after Dion had driuen him out of SICILE, hauing gathered a certen number of souldiers together againe, and through their helpe driuen out Nisetus, that reigned at that time in SYRACVSA: he recouered the Realme againe, and made himselfe King. So, if he was strangely expulsed by a small power out of the greatest kingdom that euer was in the world: likewise he more strangely recouered it againe, being banished and very poore, making himselfe King ouer them, who before had driuen him out. Thus were the inhabitantes of the cittie compelled to serue this tyrant: who besides that of his owne nature he was neuer courteous nor ciuill, he was now growne to be far more dogged and cruell, by reason of the extreme miserie and misfortune he had endured. But the noblest cittizens repaired vnto Icetes, who at that time as lord ruled the cittie of the LEONTINES, and they chose him for their generall in these wars: not for that he was any thing better then the other tyrants, but because they had no other to repaire vnto, at that time, and they trusted him best, for that he was borne (as themselues) within the cittie of SYRACVSA, and because also he had men of war about him, to make head against this tyrant. But in the meane time, the CARTHAGINIANS came downe into SICILE with a great armie, and inuaded the countrie. The SYRACVSANS being afraid of them, determined to send ambassadours into GRECE vnto the CORINTHIANS, to praye ayde of them against the barbarous people, hauing better hope of them, then of any other the GRECIANS. And that not altogether because they were lineally descended from them: that they had receiued in times past many pleasures at their hands: but also for that they knew that CORINTHE was a cittie, that in all ages and times, did euer loue libertie and hate tyrannie: & that had always made their greatest warres, not for ambition of kingdoms, nor of couetous desire to conquer and rule, but onely to defend and maintaine the libertie of the GRECIANS. But Icetes in another contrarie sort, he tooke vpon him to be generall, with a minde to make himselfe king of SYRACVSA. For he had secretly practised with the CARTHAGINIANS: and openly notwithstanding, in wordes he commended the counsell and determination of the SYRACVSANS, & sent ambassadours from himselfe also with theirs, vnto PELOPONNESVS: not that he was desirous any ayde should come from them to SYRACVSA, but because he hoped if the CORINTHIANS refused to send them ayde (as it was very likely they would for the warres and troubles that were in GREECE) that he might more easilie turne all ouer to the CARTHAGINIANS, and vse them as his friendes, to ayde him against the SYRACVSANS and the tyrant Dionysius. And that this was his full purpose and intent, it appeared plainelie soone after. Now when their ambassadours arriued at CORINTHE, and had deliuered their message to the CORINTHIANS, who had euer beene careful to defend such cities as had sought vnto them, and specially SYRACVSA: very willingly determined in counsell to send them ayde, and the rather for that they were in good peace at that time, hauing warres with none of the GRECIANS. So their onely stay rested vpon choosing of a generall to lead their armie. Now when the magistrates and gouernours of the cittie were naming such citizens, as willingly offered their seruice, desirous to aduaunce themselues: there stept vp a meane commoner who named Timoleon, Timodemus sonne, a man that vntill that time was neuer called on for seruice, neither looked for any such preferment. And truly it is to be thought it was the secret worke of the gods, that directed the thought of this meane commoner to name Timoleon: whose fortune fauored very much, and ioyned to his valiantnes and vertue, maruellous good successe in all his doings afterwardes. This Timoleon was borne of noble parents, both by father and mother: his father was called Timodemus, and his mother Demarete. He was naturally inclined to loue his countrie and common weale: and was alwayes gentle and courteous to all men, sauing that he mortally hated tyrants & wicked men. Furthermore nature had framed his bodie apt for warres and for paines: he was wise in his greenest youth, in all things behauing himselfe in hand, and in his age he shewed himselfe very valiant. He had an elder brother called Timophanes, who was nothing like to him in condition: for he was a rash harebraind man, and of a greedie desire to reigne, being put into his head by a companie of meane men, that banded in hand they were his friends, and by certeine souldiers gathered together which he had alwaies about him. And because he was very hotte and forward in warres, his citizens tooke him for a noble captaine, and a man of good seruice, and therefore oftentimes they gaue him charge of men. And therein Timoleon did helpe him much to hide his fault he committed, or at the least, made them seeme lesse, & lighter then they were, still increasing that small good grace nature brought forth in him. As in a battell the CORINTHIANS had against the ARGIVES and the CLEONEIANS, Timoleon serued as a priuate souldier amongest the footemen: but Timophanes his brother, hauing charge of horsemen, was in great daunger to be cast away if present helpe had not beene. For his horse being hurte, threwe him on the ground in the middest of his enemies. Whereupon part of those that were about him, were afraide and dispersed themselues here and there: and those that remained with him, being fewe in number and hauing many enemies to fight withall, did hardly withstand their force and charge. Then his brother Timoleon seeing him in such instant danger a farre off, ranne with all speede possible to helpe him, & clapping his target before his brother Timophanes, that lay on the ground receiuing many woundes on his body with sword and arrowes, with great difficultie he repulsed the enemies, & saued his owne and his brothers life. Now the CORINTHIANS seeing the like matter to come that before had happened vnto them, which was to lose their citie through default of their friends helpe: they resolued in counsell, to entertaine in pay continually foure hundreth souldiers that were straungers, whom they assigned ouer to Timophanes charge. Who, abandoning all honestie and regard of the trust reposed in him, did presently practise all the wayes he could to make himselfe lord of the cittie: and hauing put diuers of the chiefest cittizens to death without order of lawe, in the end he openly proclaimed himselfe King. Timoleon being very sorie for this, & taking his brothers wickednes would be the very high way to his fall and destruction: sought first to winne him with all the good words and persuasion he could, to moue him to leaue his ambitious desire to reigne, and to salue (as neere as might be) his hard dealing with the cittizens. Timophanes set light by his brothers persuasions, and would giue no eare vnto them. Thereupon Timoleon then went vnto one Æschilus his friend, and brother vnto Timophanes wife, and to one Satyrus a soothsayer (as Theopompus the historiographer calleth him, and Ephorus calleth him Orthagoras) (with whom he came againe another time vnto his brother: and they three comming to him instantly beought him to beleeue good counsell. And to leaue the kingdome, Timophanes at the first did but laugh them to scorne, and sported at their persuasions: but afterwards he waxed warme, and grewe into great choller with them. Timoleon seeing that, went a litle aside, and couering his face fell a weeping: & in the meane season, the other two drawing out their swordes, slewe Timophanes in the place. This murther was straight blowen abroade through the cittie, & the better sorte did greatly commend the noble minde and hate Timoleon bare against the tyrant: considering that he being of a gentle nature, and louing to his kinne, did notwithstanding regard the benefit of his countrie, before the naturall affection of his brother, and preferred iustice and iustice, before nature and kinred. For, before he had saued his brothers life, fighting for the defence of his countrie: and now in seeking to make himselfe king and to rule the same, he made him to be slaine. Such then as misliked popular gouernment and libertie, and alwayes followed the Nobilitie: they set a good face on the matter, as though they had bene glad of the tyrants death. Yet still reprouing Timoleon for the horrible murther he had committed against his brother, declaring how detestable it was both to the gods and men: they so handled him, that it greeued him to the hart he had done it. But when it was told him that his mother tooke it maruellous euill, and that shee pronounced horrible curses against him, and gaue him terrible wordes of him, he went vnto her in hope to comfort her: howbeit she could neuer abide to see him, but alwayes shut her doore against him. Then he being wounded to the hart with sorrow, tooke a conceite so dainly, to kill himselfe by absteining from meate: but his friends would neuer forsake him in this despaire, and vrged him so farre by intreatie and perswasion that they compelled him to eate. Thereupon he resolued thenceforth to giue himselfe ouer to a solitarie life in the countrie, secluding himselfe from all companie and dealings: as at the beginning, he did not onely refuse to repaire vnto the cittie, and all accesse of companie, but wandring vp and downe in most solitarie places, consumed himselfe and his time with melancholie. And thus we see, that counsells and iudgments are lightly caried awaye (by prayse or dispraise) if they be not shored vp with rule of reason, and philosophie, and rest not grounded in themselues. And therefore it is very requisite and necessarie, that not onely the thing be good and honest of it selfe, but that the resolution thereof be also constant, and not subiect vnto chaunge: to the end we may do all things considerately. Least wee be like vnto licke-mouthed men, who as they desire meates with a greedy appetite, and after are soone weary, disliking the same: euen so we do sodainely repent our actions grounded vpō a weake imagination, of the honestie that moued vs thereunto. For repentance maketh the acte which before was good, nought. But determination, grounded vpon certaine knowledge and truth of reason, doth neuer chaunge, although the matter enterprised, haue not alwayes happie successe. And therefore Phocion the ATHENIAN hauing resisted (as much as in him laye) certain things which the generall Leosthenes did, and which contrary to his mind tooke good effect; and perceiuing the ATHENIANS did open sacrifice vnto the goddes, to giue them thankes for the same, and much reioyce at the victorie they had obteined. I would haue reioiced (sayed he) if I had done this: but so would I not for any thing, but I had giuen the ouerthrow. And after that sort, but more sharply did Aristides LOCRIAN (a very friend and companion of Platoes) answer Dionysius the elder, tyrāt of SYRACVSA: who asked his good will to marrie one of his daughters. I had rather see my daughter dead (sayde hee) then maried vnto a tyrant. And within a certaine time after, the tyrant put all his sonnes to death: and then he asked him in derision, to greeue him the more, if he were still of his former opinion for the marying of his daughter. I am very sorie, (sayed he) with all my harte for that which thou hast done: but yet I do not repent me of that I haue sayed. That peradventure proceeded of a more perfect vertue. But to returne againe vnto Timoleon. While that inward sorrowe strooke him to the harte for the death of his brother Timophanes, that shame did so abashe him, as he durst not abide his mother, twentie yeeres after, he neuer did any notable or famous acte. And therefore, when he was named to be generall of the ayde that should be sent into SICILE, the people hauing willingly chosen and accepted him: Telecl ides, who was chiefe gouernour at that time in the cittie of CORINTH, fell downe vpon his feete before the people, spake vnto Timoleon, and did exhort him to behaue himselfe like an honest man, and valiant Captaine in his charge. For, sayed he, if that you handle your selfe well, we will thinke you haue killed a tyrant: but if you do order your selfe otherwise then well, we will iudge you haue killed your brother. Now Timoleon being busie in leauying of men, & preparing himselfe: letters came to the CORINTHIANS frō Icetes, who by plainely appeared, that Icetes had caried two faces in one hood, and that he was become traytor. For he had no sooner dispatched his ambassadours vnto them, but he straight took the CARTHAGINIANS part, and dealt openly for them, intending to driue out Dionysius, to make himselfe king of SYRACVSA. But fearing least the CORINTHIANS would send aide before he had wrought his feate: he wrote againe vnto the CORINTHIANS, sending them worde, that they should not neede nowe to put themselues to any charge or daunger for coming into SICILE, and specially, because the CARTHAGINIANS were very angrie, and did also lye in wayte in the waye as they should come, with a great fleete of shippes to meete with their armie: and that for himselfe, because he sawe they taried long, he had made league and amitie with them, against the tyrant Dionysius. When they had read his letters, if any of the CORINTHIANS were before but coldly affected to this iorney, choller did then so warme them against Icetes, that they franckly granted Timoleon what he would aske, and did help to furnish him to set him out. When the shippes were readie rigged, and that the souldiers were furnished of all thinges necessarie for their departure, the Nunnes of the goddesse Proserpina sayed they sawe a vision in their dreame, and that the goddesses Ceres and Proserpina did appeare vnto them, apparelled like trauellers to take a iorney: and tolde them, that they would goe with Timoleon into SICILE. Vpon this speech onely, the CORINTHIANS rigged a galley, they called, the galley of Ceres and Proserpina: and Timoleon himselfe before he would take the seaes, went into the cittie of DELPHES, where he made sacrifice vnto Apollo. And as he entred within the Sanctuarie where the aunsweres of the Oracle are made, there happened a wonderfull signe vnto him. For amongest the vowes and offeringes that were hanged vppe vppon the walles of the Sanctuarie, there fell a bande directly vppon Timoleons heade, imbrodered all about with crownes of victorie: so that it seemed Apollo sent him already crowned, before he had set out one foote towardes the iorney. He went to shippe, and sayled with seuen gallyes of CORINTHE, two of CORPHVE, and ten of LEVCADIANS did set out. When he was launched out in the mayne sea, hauing a fresh gale of winde and large, he thought in the night that the element did open, and that out of the same there came a maruellous great bright light ouer his shippe, and it was much like to a torche burning, when they shewe the ceremonies of the holy mysteries. This torche did accompanie and guide them all their voyage, and in the ende it vanished awaye, and seemed to fall downe vppon the coast of ITALIE, where the Shippemasters had determined to arriue. The wise mens opinions being asked what this might signifie: they answered. That this wonderfull sight did betoken the dreame, the Nunnes of the goddesse Ceres dreamed, and that the goddesses fauoring this iorney, had shewed them the way by sending of this light from heauen: because that the Ile of SICILE is consecrated to the goddesse Proserpina, and specially for that they reporte her rauishment was in that Ile, and that the whole realme was assigned vnto her for her ioynter, at the day of her mariage. Thus did this celestiall signe of the goddes both encourage those that went this iorney deliuer them also assured hope, who sayled with all possible speede they coulde: vntill such time as hauing crossed the seaes, they arriued vpon the coast of ITALIE. But when they came thither, the newes they vnderstood from SICILE put Timoleon in great perplexitie, and did maruellously discourage the souldiers he brought with him, for Icetes hauing ouerthrowen the battell of the tyrant Dionysius, and possessed the greatest part of the cittie of SYRACVSA, he did besiege him within the castell, and within that part of the cittie which is called the Ile, where he had pent him vp, and inclosed him in with walles round about. And in the meane time he had prayed the CARTHAGINIANS, that they would be carefull to keepe Timoleon from landing in SICILE, to the ende that by preuenting that ayde, they might easily deuide SICILE betweene them, and no man to let them. The CARTHAGINIANS following his request, sent twentie of their gallyes vnto RHEGIO, amongst which Icetes Ambassadours were sent vnto Timoleon, with testimonie of his doings: for they were fayre flattering wordes to cloake his wicked intent he purposed. For they willed Timoleon that he should goe himselfe alone (if he thought good) vnto Icetes, to counsell him, and to accompanie him in all his doinges, which were nowe so farre onwardes in good towardnesse, as he had almost ended them all. Furthermore, they did also persuade him, that he should send backe his shippes and souldiers to CORINTHE, againe, considering that the warre was nowe brought to good passe, and that the CARTHAGINIANS would in no case that his men shoulde passe into SICILE, and that they were determined to fight with them, if they made any force to enter. So the CORINTHIANS at their arriuall into the cittie of RHEGIO, finding there these Ambassadours, and seeing the fleete of the CARTHAGINIANS shippes, which did lyde at ancker not farre off from them: it spighted them on the one side to see they were thus mocked and abused by Icetes. For euery one of them were maruellous angry with him, and were greatly afeard also for the poore SICILIANS, whome too plainely they sawe left a preye vnto Icetes for reward of his treason, and to the CARTHAGINIANS for recompence of the tyrannie, which they suffered him to establish. So, on the other side they thought it impossible to conquer the shippes of the CARTHAGINIANS, which did laye in waite for them, and so neere vnto them: considering they were twise as many in number as they, and hard for them to subdue the armie also that was in the handes of Icetes in SICILE, considering that they were not come to him, but onely for the mayntenaunce of the warres. Notwithstanding, Timoleon spake very courteously vnto those Ambassadors, and captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS shippes, letting them vnderstande that he would doe as much as they would haue him: and to say truly, if he would haue done otherwise, he could haue wonne nothing by it. Neuertheless he desired for his discharge, they would say that openly, in the presence of the people of RHEGIO, (being a cittie of GREECE, friend and common to both parties) which they had spoken to him in secret: and that done he would departe incontinently alledging that it stood him very much vpon, for the safetie of his discharge, and that they themselues also should more faithfully keepe that they had promised vnto him touching the SYRACVSANS, whē they had agreed vpon it & promised it before all the people of RHEGIO, who should be witnes of it. Now all this was but a fetch and pollicy deliuered by him, to shadow his departure, which the captaines and gouernors of RHEGIO did fauor, & seeme to help him in because they wished SICILE should fall into the hands of the CORINTHIANS, and feared much to haue the barbarous people for their neighbours. For this cause they cōmanded a generall assembly of all the people, during which time, they caused the gates of the cittie to be shut, giuing it out, that it was because the citizens should not go about any other matters in the meane time. Then when all the people were assembled, they began to make long orations without concluding any matter: the one leauing alwayes to the other a like matter to talke of: to the end they might winne time, vntill the gallyes of the CORINTHIANS were departed. And saying the CARTHAGINIANS also in this assembly they mistrusted nothing, because they sawe Timoleon present: who made a countenance, as though he would rise to say something. But in the meane time, some one did secretly aduertise Timoleon, that the other gallyes were vnder sayle, and gone awaye, and that there was but one galley left, which tarryed for him in the hauen. Thereupon he sodainely stole away through the preasse, with the helpe of the RHEGIANS, being about the chayre where the orations were made, and trudgeing quickely to the hauen, he imbarked incontinently, and hoysed sayle. And when he had ouertaken his fleete, they went all safe together to lande at the cittie TAVROMENON, which is in SICILE: there they were very well receiued by Andromachus, who long time before had sent for them, for he gouerned this cittie as if he had been Lorde thereof. He was the father of Timæus the Historiographer, the honestest man of those that did beare rule at that time in all SICILE. For he did rule his cittizens, in all integritie and equitie, and did allwayes shewe him-selfe an open enemie of tyrantes. And following his affection therein, he lent his cittie at that time vnto Timoleon, to gather people together and persuaded his Cittizens to enter into league with the CORINTHIANS, and to ayde them to deliuer SICILE from bondage, and to restore it againe to libertie. But the captaines of the CARTHAGINIANS that were at RHEGIO, when they knewe that Timoleon was vnder sayle and gone, after that the assembly of the counsell was broken vppe: they were ready to eate their fingers for spight to see themselues thus finely mocked and deceiued. The RHEGIANS on the other side, were merry at the matter, to see howe the PHENICIANS had beene mocked at it, that they had such a fine parte played them. Howbeit in the end, they determined to send an Ambassadour vnto TAVROMENION, in one of their gallyes. This ambassadour spake very boldly and barbarously vnto Andromachus, and in a choller: and last of all, he shewed him first the palme of his hande, then the backe of his hande, and did threaten him that his cittie should be so turned ouer hand, if he did not quickely send awaye the CORINTHIANS. Andromachus fell a laughing at him, and did turne his hand vppe and downe as the Ambassadour had done, and commaunded him that he should gette him going, and that with all speede out of his cittie, if he would not see the keele of his gally turned vpwards. Icetes nowe vnderstanding of Timoleons comming, and being afrayed, sent for a great number of gallyes vnto the CARTHAGINIANS. Then the SYRACVSANS began to despaire vtterly when they sawe their hauen full of the CARTHAGINIANS gallyes, the best part of their cittie kept by Icetes, and the castell by the tyrante Dionysius. And on the other side, Timoleon was not yet come but to a litle corner of SICILE, hauing no more but the cittie of TAVROMENION, with a small power, and lesse hope: because there was not aboue a thousand footemen in all, to furnish these warres, neither prouision of victuall nor so much money as would serue to entertaine and paye them. Besides also, that the cities of SICILE did nothing trust him. But by reason of the violent extortions which they had of late suffered, they hated all captaines and leaders of men of war to the death, specially for the treacherie of Calippus and Pharax, whereof the one was an ATHENIAN and the other a LACEDÆMONIAN. Both of them sayed they came to set SICILIE at libertie, and to driue out the tyrantes: and yet neuertheless, they had done so much hurte to the poore SICILIANS, that the miserie and calamitie which they had suffered vnder the tyrantes, seemed all to be golde vnto them, in respect of that which the Captaines had layed them to abide. And they did not thinke them more happy, that had willingly submitted themselues vnto the yoke of seruitude: then those which they sawe restored, and set at libertie. Therfore persuading themselues, that this CORINTHIAN would be no better vnto them then the other had beene before, but supposing they were tho selfe same former traines, and alluring baytes of good hope and fayre wordes, which they had tasted of before, to deceiue them to accept new tyrants: they did sore suspect it, and reiected all the CORINTHIANS persuasions. Sauing the ADRANITANS onely, whose litle cittie being consecrated to the god Adranus (and greatly honored and reuerenced through all SICILE) was then in dissention one against another: insomuch as one part of them tooke part with Icetes, and the CARTHAGINIANS, and another side of them sent vnto Timoleon. So it fortuned, that both the one and the other, making all the possible speede they coulde, who should come first: arriued in maner at one selfe time. Icetes had about 5000 souldiers. Timoleon had not in all, about 1200 men, with which he departed to go towards the cittie of ADRANVS distant from TAVROMENION, about three hundred & 40 furlõgs. For the first dayes iorney he went not great, but lodged betimes: but the next morning he marched very hastely, & had maruelous ill

The god Adranus.

When night was come, and day light shut in, he had news that Icetes did but newly arriue before ADRANVS, where he encamped. When the priuate captaines vnderstood this, they caused the vward to stay, to eate and repose a litle, that they might be the lustier, & the stronger to fight. But Timoleon did set still forwards, and praied them not to stay, but to go on with all the speed they could possible, that they might take their enemies out of order (as it was likely they should) being but newly arriued, and troubled with making their cabbons, and preparing for supper. Therewithall as he spake these words, he toke his target on his arme, and marched himselfe the formost man, as brauely & couragiously as if he had gone to a most assured victorie. The souldiers seeing him marche with that life, they followed at his heeles with like courage. So they had not passing thirty furlongs to go, which when they had ouercome, they straight set vpon their enemies, whom they found all out of order, and began to flie, so soone as they saw they were vpon their backs before they were aware. By this meanes there were not aboue three hundred men slaine, and twise as many more taken prisoners, and so their whole campe was possessed. Then the ADRANITANS opening their gates, yeelded vnto Timoleon, declaring vnto him with great feare, and no lesse wonder, how at the very time when he gaue charge vpon the enemies, the dores of the temple of their god opened of themselues, and that the laueling which the image of their god did hold in his hād, did shake at the very end where the iron head was, and how all his face was seene to sweat. This (in my opinion) did not only signifie the victorie he had gotten at that time, but all the notable exploites he did afterwards, vnto the which, this first encounter gaue a happy beginning. For immediatly after, many cities sent vnto Timoleon, to ioyne in league with him. And Mamercus, the tyrant of CATANA, a souldier, and very full of money, did also seeke his friendship. Furthermore, Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, being weary to follow hope any longer, and finding himselfe in maner forced vnto it by long continuance of siege: made no more reckoning of Icetes, when he knew that he was so shamefully ouerthrowne. And contrariwise, much esteeming Timoleons valiantnesse, he sent to aduertise him, that he was contented to yeeld himselfe and the castell into the hands of the CORINTHIANS. Timoleon being glad of this good hap vnlooked for, sent Euclides and Telemachus, two captaines of the CORINTHIANS, to take possession of the castel, with foure hundred men, not all at a time, nor openly (for it was vnpossible, the enemies lying in waite in the hauen) but by small companies, and by stealth, he conueied them all into the castell. So the souldiers possessed the castell, and the tyrants pallace, with all the moueables and munition of wars within the same. There were a great number of horse of seruice, great store of staues and weapons offensiue of all sorts, and engines of batterie to shoot farre off, and sundry other weapons of defence, that had bene gathered together of long time, to arme threescore and ten thousand men. Moreouer, besides all this, there were two thousand souldiers, whom with all the other things rehearsed, Dionysius deliuered vp into the hands of Timoleon: and he himself, with his money and a few of his friends, went his way by sea, Icetes not knowing it, and so came to Timoleons campe. This was the first time that euer they saw Dionysius a priuate man, in base and meane estate. And yet within few dayes after, Timoleon sent him from thence vnto CORINTH in a ship, with little store of money. Who was borne and brought vp in the greatest and most famous tyrannie, and kingdome, conquered by force, that euer was in the world: and which himselfe had kept by the space of ten yeares after the death of his father. Since Dion draue him out, he had bene maruellously turmoiled in warres, by the space of twelue yeares: in which time, although he had done much mischiefe, yet he had suffered also a great deale more. For he saw the death of his sonnes when they were men growne, and also of seruice and carse armor. He saw his daughters rauished by force, and defloured of their virginitie. He saw his owne sister (who was also his wife) first of all shamed, and cruelly handled in her person, with the greatest villanies and most vile parts done vnto her, that his enemies could deuise: & afterwards horribly murthered with his children, & their bodies in the end throwne into the sea, as we haue more amply declared in the life of Dion. Now when Dionysius was arriued in the cite of CORINTH, euery GRECIAN was wonderfull desirous to go see him, and to talke with him. And some went thither very glad of his ouerthrow, as if they had troden him downe with their feete, whom fortune had ouerthrowne, so bitterly did

Other pittying him in their hearts, to see so great a change, did behold him as were with a certaine compassion, considering what great power, secret and diuine causes ha- ouer mens weakenesse and frailtie, and those things that daily passeth ouer our heads. F the world then, did neuer bring forth any worke of nature, or of mans hand so wonder- as was this of fortune. Who made the world see a man, that before was in maner Lord o King of all SICILE, sit then commonly in the citie of CORINTHE, talking with a victu- or sitting a whole day in a perfumers shop, or commonly drinking in some celler or tau- or to brawle and scolde in the middest of the streetes, with common whores in face of t world, or else to teach common minstrels in euery lane and alley, and to dispute with th with the best reason he had, about the harmony & musick of the songs they sang in the T ATERS. Now some say he did this, because he knew not else how he should driue the ti way, for that indeed he was of a base minde, and an effeminate person, giuen ouer to all d nest lusts and desires. Other are of opinion, he did it to be the lesse regarded, for feare le CORINTHIANS should haue him in iealousie and suspition, imagining that he did take change & state of his life in grieuous part, & that he should yet looke back, hoping for a to recouer his state againe: and that for this cause he did it, and of purpose fained many th against his nature, seeming to be a starke ideot, to see him do those things he did. Some withstanding haue gathered together certaine of his answers, which do testifie that he did all these things of a base brutish minde, but to fit himselfe onely to his present misery and fortune. For when he came to LEVCADES, an ancient citie built by the CORINTHIAN was also the citie of SYRACVSA: he told the inhabitants of the same, that he was like to boyes that had done a fault. For as they flie from their fathers being ashamed to come in sight, & are gladder to be with their brethren: euen so is it with me, said he: for it would me better to dwell here with you, then to go to CORINTHE our head citie. Another time ing at CORINTHE, a stranger was very busie with him, (knowing how familiar Dion was with learned men and philosophers, while he raigned in SYRACVSA) & asked him end in derision: what benefit he got by Platoes wisedome and knowledge? he answered again: how thinkest thou, hath it done me no good, when thou seest me beare so pa this change of fortune? Aristoxenus a musitian, and other, asking him what offence Pla done vnto him: he answered. That tyrants state is euer vnfortunate, & subiect to many but yet no euill in their state was comparable to this. That none of all those they take their most familiars, dare once tell them truely any thing: and that through their fault, Platoes company. Another time there commeth a pleasant fellow to him, and think mock him finely, as he entred into his chamber, he shooke his gowne, as the manner is they come to tyrants, to shew that they haue no weapons vnder their gownes. But Di encountred him as pleasantly, saying to him: do that when thou goest hence, to see if tho stolne nothing. And againe, Philip king of MACEDON, at his table one day descending talke of songs, verse, and tragedies, which Dionysius his father had made, making as tho wondred at them, how possibly he could haue leisure to do the: he answered him very and to good purpose. He did them euen at such times (quod he) as you and I, and other lords whom they reckon happy, are disposed to be drunke, and play the fooles. Now for he neuer saw Dionysius at CORINTHE. But Diogenes Sinopian, the first time that eue with Dionysius, said vnto him. O, how vnworthy art thou of this state. Dionysius staied ly, and replied: Truly I thanke thee (Diogenes) that thou hast compassion of my misery. said Diogenes againe: Doest thou thinke, I pitty thee? Nay it spighteth me rather to see slaue as thou worthy to die in the wicked state of a tyrant like thy father) so liue in such ritie, and idle life as thou leadest amongst vs. When I came to compare these words of genes, with Philistus words the Historiographer, bewailing the hard fortune of the ters of the LEPTINES, saying that they were brought from the top of all worldly felic nour, and goods (whereof tyrannicall state aboundeth) vnto a base, priuate, and humb me thinkes they are the proper lamentations of a woman, that sorroweth for the lose boxes of painting colours, or for her purple gownes, or for other such pretty fine trim gode, as women vse to weare. Diogenes saying to Dionysius the tyrant.

Dionysius, are not impertinent to the description of our liues, neither are they troublesome nor vnprofitable to the hearers, vnlesse they haue other hastie businesse to let or trouble them. But now if the tyrant Dionysius wretched estate seeme strange, Timoleons prosperitie then was no lesse wonderfull. For within fiftie dayes after he had set foote in SICILIA, he had the castell of SYRACVSA in his possession, & sent Dionysius as an exile to CORINTH. This did set the CORINTHIANS in such a iollitie, that they sent him a supply of two thousand footemen, and two hundred horsemen, which were appointed to land in ITALIE, in the countrie of the THVRIANS. And perceiuing that they could not possiblie go from thence into SICILIE, because the CARTHAGINIANS kept the seas with a great nauie of ships, and that thereby they were compelled to stay for better opportunitie, in the meane time they bestowed their leisure in doing a notable good act. For the THVRIANS, being in warres at that time with the BRVTIANS, they did put their citie into their hands, which they kept very faithfully and friendly, as if it had bene their owne native countrie. Item all this while did beleeue the castell of SYRACVSA, preuenting all he could possible, that there should come no corne by sea vnto the CORINTHIANS that kept within the castell: and he had hiered two strange souldiers, which he sent vnto the citie of ADRANVS, to kill Timoleon by treason, who kept no garde about his person, and continued amongst the ADRANITANS, mistrusting nothing in the world, for the trust and confidence he had in the safegard of the god of the ADRANITANS. These souldiers being sent to do this murther, were by chance enformed that Timoleon should one day do sacrifice vnto this god. So vppon this, they came into the temple, hauing daggers vnder their gownes, and by isle and isle thrust in through the preasse, that they got at the length hard to the aulter. But at the present time as one encouraged another to dispatche the matter, a third person they thought not of gaue one of the two a great cut in the head with his sworde, that fell to the grounde. The man that had hurt him, this, fled straight vpon it, with his sworde drawne in his hand, and recouered the top of a high rocke. The other souldier that came with him and that was not hurt, got holde of a corner of the aulter, and besought pardon of Timoleon, and told him he would discouer the treason practised against him. Timoleon thereupon pardoned him. Then he tolde him how his companion that was slaine, and himselfe, were both hired, and sent to kill him. In the meane time, they brought him also that had taken the rocke, who cryed out aloude, he had done no more then he should do: for he had killed him that had slaine his owne father before, in the citie of the LEONTINES. And to instifie him to be true, certaine that stood by did affirme, it was so in deed. Whereat they wondered greatly to consider the marueilous working of fortune, how she doth bring one thing to passe by meanes of another, and gathereth all things together, how far a sunder soeuer they be, and knitteth them together, though they seeme to be cleane contrary one to another, with no manner of likenesse or coniunction betweene them, making the end of the one, to be the beginning of another. The CORINTHIANS examining this matter throughly, gaue him that slue the souldier with his sworde, a crowne of the value of ten minas, because that by meanes of his owne anger, he had done good seruice to the God that had preserued Timoleon. And furthermore, this good hap did not onely serue the present turne, but was to good purpose euer after. For those that sawe it, were put in better hope, and had thenceforth more care and regard vnto Timoleons person, because he was a holy man, one that loued the gods, and that was purposely sent to deliuer SICILE from captiuitie. But Icetes hauing missed his first purpose, and seeing numbers daylie drawne to Timoleons deuotion: he was mad with himselfe, that hauing so great an armie of the CARTHAGINIANS at hand at his commandement, he tooke but a few of them to serue his turne, as if he had bene ashamed of his fact, and had vsed his friendship by stealth. So he sent hereupon for Mago their generall, with all his fleete. Mago at his request brought an huge armie to see too, of a hundred and fiftie saile, which occupied and couered all the hauen: and afterwards landed three score thousand men, whom he lodged euery man within the citie of SYRACVSA. Then euery man imagined the time was now come, which old men had threatned SICILE with many yeares before, and that continually; that one day it should be conquered, and inhabited by the barbarous people. For in all the warres the CARTHAGINIANS euer had before in the countrie of SICILE, they could partly for feare of the gallyes of the CARTHAGINIANS that laye in waite for them high many dayes together, and was alwaies in storme and tempest. In the ende, they red to go through the country of the BRVTIANS. And partly with their good will (but by force) they got through, and recouered the citie of RHEGIO, the sea being yet ma the enemies. Thereupon he willed all his men to put garlands of flowers of their heads, and therewithall also made them dresse vp, and set forth his gallyes, with corselets, and brigantines after the GRÆCIANS fashion. So in this brauery he returned againe, sailing towards SYRACVSA, & came in with force of owers, rowing vnder the side of SYRACVSA, with great laughing, and clapping of hands: crying out aloude that were in the castell, that he had ouerthrowne their aide which came from CORINTH they thought to passe by the coast of ITALIE into SICILE, flattering themselues, that much discourage those that were besieged. But whilest he sported thus with his fond gest their boates with them. When they were all passed ouer, Timoleon hauing them, went immediatly to take MESSINA, and marching thence in battell raie, tooke wards SYRACVSA, trusting better to his good fortune, the to his force he had: for his whole number in all, were not aboue foure thousand fighting men. Notwithstanding Mago hearing this comming, quaked for feare, & doubted the more vpon this occasion. About SYRACVSA are certaine marishes, that receiue great quantitie of sweete fresh water, aswell of fountaines and springes, as also of litle running brookes, lakes & riuers, which runne that waies towards the sea: and therefore there are great store of eeles in that place, and the fishing is great there at all times, but specially for such as delight to take eeles. Whereupon the GRECIANS that stoode pay on both sides, when they had leasure, and that all was quiet betweene them, they attended fishing. Now, they being all countrymen, and of one language, had no priuate quarrell one with another: but when time was to fight, they did their duties, and in time of peace also frequented familiarly together, and one spake with another, and specially when they were busie fishing for eeles: saying, that they maruelled at the situation of the goodly places thereabours, and that they stood so pleasantly and commodious vpon the sea side. So one of the souldiers that serued vnder the CORINTHIANS, chaunced to say vnto them. Is it possible that you that be GRECIANS borne, and haue so goodly a citie of your owne, & full of so many goodly commodities: that ye will giue it vppe vnto these barbarous people, the CARTHAGINIANS, and most cruell murderers of the world? where you should rather wish that there were many SICILIES betwixt them and GREECE. Haue ye so litle consideration or iudgement to thinke, that they haue assembled an armie out of all APHRICKE, vnto Hercules pillers, and to the sea ATLANTICKE, to come hither to fight to stablish Icetes tyrannie? who, if he had bene a wise and skilfull Captaine, would not haue cast out his auncestors & founders, to bring into his countrie the auncient enemies of the same: but might haue receiued such honor and authoritie of the CORINTHIANS and Timoleon, as he could reasonably haue desired, and that with all their fauour & good will. The souldiers that heard this tale, reported it again in their campe: Insomuch they made Mago suspect there was treason in hand, and so sought some colour to be gone. But hereupon, notwithstanding that Icetes praied him all he could to tarie, declaring vnto him how much they were stronger then their enemies, and that Timoleon did rather preuaile by his hardines and good fortune, then exceede him in number of men: yet he hoysed saile, and returned with shame enough into APHRIKE, letting slippe the conquest of all SICILE out of his hands, without any sight of reason or cause at all. The next day after he was gone, Timoleon presented battell before the citie, when the GRECIANS and he vnderstoode that the CARTHAGINIANS were fled, and that they saw the hauen rid of all the ships: and then beganne to ieast at Magoes cowardlinesse, and in derision proclaimed in the citie, that they would giue him a good reward that could bring them newes, whither the armie of the CARTHAGINIANS were fled. But for all this, Icetes was bent to fight, & would not leaue the spoile he had gotten, but defende the quarters of the citie he had possessed, at the wordes point, trusting to the strength and situation of the places, which were hardly to be approached. Timoleon perceiuing that, deuided his armie, and he with one part thereof did set vpon that side which was the hardest to approch, and did stande vpon the riuer of ANAPVS: then he appointed another part of his armie to assault all at one time, the side of ACRADINA, whereof Isias CORINTHIAN had the leading. The third part of his armie that came last from CORINTH, which Dinarchus and Demaratus led: he appointed to assault the quarter called EPIPOLES. Thus, assault being giuen on all sides at one time, Icetes bandes of men were broken, and ranne their way. Now that the citie was thus wonne by assault, and come so suddainely to the handes of Timoleon, and the enemies being fled: it is good reason we ascribe it to the valiantnesse of the souldiers, and the captaines great wisedome. But where there was not one CORINTHIAN slaine, nor hurt in this assault: sure me thinkes herein, it was only the worke and deede of fortune, that did fauour and protect Timoleon, to contend against his valiantnesse. To the end that those which should hereafter heare of his doings, should haue more occasion to wonder at his good happe: then to praise and commend his valiantnesse. For the fame of this great exploite, did in fewe daies not onely runne through all ITALIE, but also through all GRECE. Insomuch as the CORINTHIANS, (who could scant beleeue their men were passed with safetie into SICILE) vnderstood with all that they were safely arriued there,

The miserable state of Sicile.

Mago slew him selfe, being called to answere his departure out of Sicile.

The Corinthians replenished the citie of Syracusa, with three score thousand inhabitants.

and sold them houses of the citie, vnto the value of a thousand talents. And because he would leaue the old SYRACVSANS able to recouer their owne, and make the poore people by this meanes to haue money in common, to defray the common charge of the citie, as also their expences in time of warres: the statues or images were sold, and the people by most voices did condemne them. For they were solemnely indited, accused, and arraigned, as if they had bene men aliue to be condemned. And it is reported that the SYRACVSANS, did reserue the statue of Gelon, an auncient tyrant of their citie, honouring his memorie because of a great victorie he had wonne of the CARTHAGINIANS, neere the citie of HIMERA: and condemned all the rest to be taken away out of euery corner of the citie, and to be sold. Thus beganne the citie of SYRACVSA to replenish againe, and by litle and litle to recouer it selfe, many people comming thither from all parts to dwell there. Thereupon Timoleon thought to set all other cities at libertie also, and vtterly to roote out all the tyrants of SICILE and to obtaine his purpose, hee went to make warres with them at their owne dodres. The first he went against was Icetes, whom he compelled to forsake the league of the CARTHAGINIANS, and to promise also that he would raze al the fortresses he kept, & to liue like a priuate mã within the city of the LEONTINES. Leptines in like maner, that was tyrant of the citie of APPOLLONIA, and of many other litle villages thereabouts: when he saw himselfe in daunger to be taken by force, did yeeld himselfe. Whereupon Timoleon saued his life, & sent him vnto CORINTHE: thinking it honorable for his countrie, that the other GRECIANS should see the tyrants of SICILE in their chiefe citie of fame, liuing meanely and poorely like banished people. When he had brought this to passe, hee returned forthwith to SYRACVSA about the stablishment of the common weale, assisting Cephalus & Dionysius, two notable men sent from CORINTHE to reforme the lawes, and to helpe them to stablish the goodliest ordinances for their common weale. And now in the meane time, because the souldiers had a mind to get some thing of their enemies, & to auoid idlenesse: he sent them out abroad to a countrie subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS, vnder the charge of Dimarchus, & Demaretus. Where they made many litle townes rebell against the barbarous people, and did not only liue in all abundance of wealth, but they gathered money together also to maintaine the warres. The CARTHAGINIANS on the other side, while they were busie about the matters, came downe into LILYBEA, with an army of three score & ten thousand men, two hundred gallies, & a thousand other ships & vessels that caried engines of batterie, carts, victuals, munition, and other necessary prouision for a campe, intending to make sporting wars no more, but at once to driue all the GRECIANS againe quite out of SICILE. For indeede it was an able army to ouercome all the SICILIANS, if they had bene whole of themselues, & not deuided. Now they being aduertised that the SICILIANS had inuaded their countrie, they went towards them in great furie led by Asdrubal & Amilcar, generals of the armie. This newes was straight brought to SYRACVSA, & the inhabitants were so striken with feare of the report of their armie: that being a maruellous great number of them within the citie, scant three thousand of them had the harts to arme themselues, and to goe to the field with Timoleon. Now the strangers that tooke pay, were not aboue foure thousand in all: and of them, a thousand of their harts failed, & left him in mid way, and returned home againe. Saying, that Timoleon was out of his wits, and more rash then his yeres required, to vndertake with fiue thousand footmen, & a thousand horse, to go against three score & ten thousand men: and besides, to carie that small force he had to defend himselfe withall, eight great daies iorney from SYRACVSA. So that if it chaunced they were compelled to flie, they had no place whither they might retire themselues vnto with safetie, nor man that would take care to burie them, when they were slaine. Neuertheless, Timoleon was glad he had that proofe of them, before he came to battell. Moreouer, hauing incouraged those that remained with him, he made them march with speede towards the riuer of CRIMESVS, where he vnderstood he should meete with the CARTHAGINIANS. So getting vp vpon a litle hill, from whence hee might see the campe of the enemies on the other side: by chance certaine moyles fell vpon his army, loden with smallage. The souldiers tooke a conceit at the first vpõ sight of it, & thought it was a token of ill lucke: because it is a maner we vse, to hang garlands of this herbe, about the tombes of the dead. Hereof came the common prouerbe they vse to speake, when one lyeth a passing in his bed: he lacketh but smallage. Asmuch to say, he is but a dead man. But Timoleon to draw the from this foolish superstition, & discorage they tooke, staied the army. And when he had vsed certaine persvvasions vnto them, according to the time, his leasure, and occasion told them that the garland of it selfe came to offer them victorie before hand. For, said he, CORINTHIANS doe crowne them that winne the ISTMIAN games (which are celebrated their country) with garlands of smallage. And at that time also euen in the solemne ISTMIAN games, they vsed the garland of smallage for reward and token of victorie: and at this present it is also vsed in the games of NEMEA. And it is but lately taken vp, that they haue vsed branches of pine apple trees in the ISTMIAN games. Now Timoleon had thus incouraged his men as you haue heard before: he first of all tooke of this smallage, and made himselfe a garland & put it on his head. When they saw that, the Captaines and all the souldiers also tooke of the same, and made themselues the like. The soothsaiers in like maner at the very same time, perceiued two eagles flying towards them: the one of them holding a snake in her talents, which she pierced through and through, and the other as she flew, gaue a terrible cry. So they flew both vnto the souldiers, who did then all together with one voice call vpon the gods for helpe. Now this fortuned about the beginning of the sommer, and towards the later end of May, the sunne drawing towards the solstice of the sommer: when there rose a great mist out of the riuer, that couered all the fields ouer, so as they could not see the enemies camp, but onely heard a maruellous confused noise of mens voyces, as it had come from a great armie, and rising vp to the toppe of the hill, they laide their targets downe on the ground to take a litle breath: and the sunne hauing drawen and sucked vp all the moist vapours of the earth vnto the toppe of the hils, the aire beganne to be so thicke, that the toppes of the mountaines were all couered ouer with cloudes, and contrarily, the valley vnderneath was all cleare and faire, that they might easily see the riuer of CRIMESVS, and the enemies also, how they passed it ouer in this sort. First they had put their cartes of warres foremost, which were very well armed and well appointed. Next vnto them there followed tenne thousand footemen, armed with white targets vpon their armes: whom they seeing a far off so well appointed, they coniectured by their stately march and goodly order, that they were the CARTHAGINIANS themselues. After them, diuerse other nations followed confusedly one with another, and so were throng ed ouer with great disorder. There Timoleon cõsidering the riuer gaue him opportunitie to take them before they were halfe past ouer, and to set vpon what number he would: after he had shewed his men with his finger, how the battel of their enemies was deuided in two parts by meanes of the riuer, some of them being alreadie passed ouer, & the other to passe: he commaunded Demaratus with his horsemen to giue a charge on the voward, to keepe them from putting themselues in order of battell. And himselfe comming downe the hill also with all his footemen into the valley, he gaue to the SICILIANS the two winges of his battell, mingled with them some strangers that serued vnder him: & placed with himself in the midst, the MAMERTINES, with all the choice & best liked strangers. So he taried not long to ioine, when he saw the small good his horsemen did. For he perceiued they could not come to giue the charge vpon the battell of the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were paled in with the armed carts, that ranne here and there before them: whereupon they were compelled to wheele about continually, (vnlesse they would haue put themselues in danger to haue bene vtterly ouerthrowen) & in their returnes to giue venture of charge, by turnes on their enemies. Wherefore Timoleon taking his target on his arme, cried out aloud to his footemen, to follow him courageously, and to feare nothing. Those that heard his voice, thought it more then the voice of a man, whether the furie of his desire to fight did so straine it beyond ordinarie course, or that some god (as many thought it then) did stretch his voice to crie out so loud and send it. His souldiers answered him againe with the like voice: and praied him to lead them without longer delay. Then he made his horsemen vnderstand, that they should draw on the one side from the cartes, and that they should charge the CARTHAGINIANS on the flankes: and so soone as he did set the formost ranke of his battell, target to target against the enemies, commaunding the trumpets withall to sound. Thus with great furie he went to giue a charge vpon them, who valiantly receiued the first charge, their bodies being armed with good iron corslets and their heades with faire murrions of copper, besides their great targets they had also, which did easily receiue the force of their darts, and the thrust of the pike. But when they came to hand strokes, where agility was more requisite then force, a fearefull tempest of thunder and flashing lightning with all, came from the mountaines. After that came darke thicke clouds also, (gathered together from the toppe of the hils) and fell vpon the valley, where the battell was fought, with a marueilous extreame showre of raine, fierce violent windes, and haile withall. All this tempest was vpon the GREEKIANS backes, and full before the barbarous people, beating on their faces, and did blindfold their eies, and continually tormented them with the raine that came full vpon them with the winde, and the lightnings so often flashing amongst them, that one vnderstood not another of them. Which did marueilously trouble them, and specially those that were but fresh water souldiers, by reason of the terrible thunderclaps, and the noise, the hydeous winde and haile made vpon their harnes: for that made them they could not heare the order of their Captains. Moreouer, the dust did as much annoy the CARTHAGINIANS, because they were not nimble in their armour, but heauily armed as we haue told you: and besides that also, when the plaines of their coates were throughwet with water, they did lode and hinder them so much the more, that they could not fight with any ease. This stood the GREEKIANS to great purpose, to throw them downe the easier. This when they were stumbling in the dust with their heauy armour, vp they could rise no more. Furthermore, the riuer of GRIMASVS being risen high through the great rage of waters, and also for the multitude of people that passed ouer it, did ouerflow the valley all about: which being full of ditches, many caues, and hollow places, it was straight all drowned ouer, and filled with many running streames, that ran ouerthwart the fielde, without any certaine channell. The CARTHAGINIANS being compassed all about with these waters, they could hardly get the way out: for, as in the end they being ouercome with the storme that still did beate vpon them, and the GRECIANS hauing slaine of their men at the first onset, to the number of foure hundred of their choicest men, who made the first front of their battell: all the rest of their army turned their backes immediately, and fled for life. Insomuch, some of them being followed too neare, were put to the sword in the middest of the valley, other holding one another hard by the armes together, in the middest of the riuer as they passed ouer, were carried downe the streame and drowned, with the swiftnes and violence of the riuer. But the greatest number did thinke by footemanship to recouer the hils thereabouts, who were ouertaken by the that were light armed, and put to the sword euery man. They say, that of ten thousand which were slaine in this battell, 3. thousand of them were meere naturall citizens of CARTHAGE, which was a very sorrowfull and grieuous losse to the city. For they were of the noblest, the richest, the lustiest, and valiantest men, of all CARTHAGE. For there is no chronicle that mentioneth any former wars at any time before, where there died so many of CARTHAGE at one field and battell, as were slaine at that present time. For before that time, they did alwaies entertaine the GREEKIANS, the SPANIARDS, & the NOMADES, in all their wars: so as when they lost any battell, the lesse lighted not on them, but the strangers paid for it. The men of account also that were slaine, were easily knowen by their spoiles. For they that spoiled them, stood not trifling about getting of copper and iron together, because they found gold and siluer enough. For the battell being won, the GREEKIANS passed ouer the riuer, and tooke the campe of the barbarous people, with all their cariages and bagage. And as for the prisoners, the souldiers stole many of them away, and sent them going: but of them that came too short to make common diuision of the spoile among them, they were about fiue thousand men, and two hundred cartes of warre that were taken besides. Oh, it was a noble sight to behold the tent of Timoleon their generall, how they enuironed it all about with heaps of spoils of euery sort: among which there were 3. thousand braue corselets guilt and grauen, with marueilous curious works, and brought thither with them also ten thousand targets. So the conquerors being but a small number, to take the spoile of a multitude that were slaine they filled their purses euen to the top. Yet were they three daies about it, & in the end, the third day after the battell, they set vp a marke or token of their victory. The Timoleon sent vnto CORINTH, with the news of this ouerthrow, the fairest armors that were gotten in the spoile: because he would make his country & natiue city spoken of & commended through the world, aboue all the other cities of GREECE. For that at CORINTH only, their chiefe temples were set forth and adorned, not with spoiles of the GAULIANS, nor offrings gotten by spilling the bloud of their own nation and countrey; (which I say truly, are vnpleasant memories) but with the spoils taken from the barbarous people their enemies, with inscriptions witnessing the valiancy and iustice of those also, who by victory obtained them. That is to wit, that the CORINTHIANS and their captaine Timoleon (hauing deliuered the GAULIANS dwelling in SICILE, from the bondage of the CARTHAGINIANS) had giuen those offrings vnto the gods, to giue thanks for their victory. That done, Timoleon leauing the strangers he had in pay, in the country subiect to the CARTHAGINIANS (to ouerrun and destroy) he returned with the rest of his army vnto SYRACVSA. Where at his first coming home, he banished the thousand souldiers that had forsaken him in his iourney, with these charge that they should depart the city before sun set. So these thousand couragious mutinous souldiers passed ouer into ITALIE, where, vnder promise of the countrey, they were all vnfortunately slaine by the BRVTIANS: such was the iustice of the gods to pay their reward of their treason. Afterwards, Mamercus the tyrant of CATANA, Icetes (whether it were the enuy they did beare to Timoleons famous deeds, or for that they were afraid of him) pursuing tyrants could looke for no peace at his handes: they made league with the CARTHAGINIANS, and wrote vnto them that they should send another army and captaine to daunt, for they would not vtterly be driuen out of SICILE. The CARTHAGINIANS sent Gisco thither with threescore and tenne saile, who at his first comming tooke a certaine number of GREEKE souldiers into pay, which were the first the CARTHAGINIANS euer retained in their seruice: for they neuer gaue them pay vntill that present time, when they thought them to be inuincible, & the best souldiers of the world. Moreouer, the inhabitants of the territory of MESSENA, hauing made a secret conspiracy amongst themselues, did slay foure hundred men that Timoleon had sent vnto them and in the territories subiect vnto the CARTHAGINIANS vnto a place they call HIMERE, where was another ambush laid for Eutimus Leocadius as him selfe and all his souldiers were cut in peeces. Howbeit the losse of them made Timoleons doings notwithstanding more fortunate: for they were euen those that had forcibly entred the temple of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, with Philodemus the PHOCIAN, and with Onomarchus, who were partakers of their sacriledge. Moreouer, they were lose people & abiects, and were abhorred of euery body, who vacabondlike wãdred vp & down the country of PELOPONNESVS, when Timoleon for lack of other was glad to take them vp. And when they came into SICILE, they alwaies ouercame in all battels they fought, whilest they were in his company. But in the end, when the fury of wars was pacified, Timoleon sending them about foure ciall seruice to the aide of some of his, they were cast away euery man of them and not altogether, but at diuers times. So as it seemed that gods iustice, in fauor of Timoleon, did seperate them from the rest, when he was determined to plague them for their wicked deseртes, fearing that good men should suffer hurt by punishing of the euil. And so was the grace & good will of the gods wonderfull towards Timoleon, not onely in matters against him, but in those things that prospered well with him. Notwithstanding, the common people of SYRACVSA tooke delight in flying words and writings of the tyrants against them, in marueilous euill part. For Mamercus amongst other, thinking wel of him selfe, because he could make verses & tragedies, hauing by certain battels gotten the better hand of the straigers, which the SYRACVSANS gaue pay vnto, he gloried very much. And when he offered vp the targets he had gotten of them, in the temples of the gods: he set vp also these cutting verses, in derision of them that were vanquished:

With buckilers potlid like, which of no value were,
we haue these goodly targets wonne, so richly trimmed here, All gorgeously with golde, and eke with iuorie, with purple colours finely wrought, and decked with Ebonie.

These things done, Timoleon led his army before the city of CALAVRIA, and Icetes while entred the confines of the SYRACVSANS with a maine army, & caried away a marueilous great spoile. And after he had done great hurt, and spoiled the country, he returned backe againe, and came by CALAVRIA, to despite Timoleon, knowing well enough hee had at time but few men about him. Timoleon suffered him to passe by, but followed him afterwards with his horsemen and lightest armed footemen. Icetes vnderstanding that, passed ouer the riuer called DAMYRIAS, and so staied on the other side as though he would fight, trusting to the swift running of the riuer, and the height of the bankes on either side of the same. Now the captaines of Timoleons bands fell out maruellously amongest themselues, striuing for honour of their seruice, which was cause of delaying the battell. For none would willingly come behind, but euery man desired to lead the voward, for honor to begin the charge: so as they could not agree for their going ouer, one thrusting another to get before his companion. Wherefore Timoleon fell to drawing of lots, which of them should passe ouer first, & tooke a ring of euery one of them, & cast them all within the lap of his cloke: so rolling them together, by chance he pluckt one at the first, whereon was grauen the marks and tokens of a triumph. The yong captains seeing that, gaue a shout of ioy, & without tarying drawing of other lots, they began euery man to passe the riuer as quickly as they could, and to set vpon the enemies as sodainly. But they being not able to abide their force, ran their waies, and were faine to cast their armour away to make more hast: howbeit there were a thousand of the lay dead in the field. And within few daies after, Timoleon leading his army to the city of LEONTINES, tooke Icetes aliue there, with his son Eupolemus, and the generall of his horsemen, who were deliuered into his hands by his own souldiers. So Icetes & his son were put to death, like the traytors & tyrants: and so was Euthydemus also, who though he was a valiant souldier, had no better mercy shewed him, then the father and the son, because they did burden him with certaine iniurious words he spake against the CORINTHIANS. For they say, that when the CORINTHIANS came first out of their country into SICILE, to make warre against the tyrants: that he making an oration before the LEONTINES, said amongst other things, that they should not need to be afraid, if

The women of Corinth were come out of their country.

Thus we see, that men do rather suffer hurt, then put vp iniurious words: & do pardon their enemies, though they reuenge by deeds, because they can do no lesse. But as for iniurious words they seeme to proceed of a deadly hate, and of a canckred malice. Furthermore, when Timoleon was returned again to SYRACVSA, the SYRACVSANS arraigned the wiues of Icetes, and his son, and their daughters: who being arraigned, were also condemned to die by the iudgement of the people. Of all the actes Timoleon did, this of all other (in my opinion) was the foulest order: for if he had listed, he might haue saued the poore women from death. But he passed not for them, and so left them to the wrath of the citizens, who would be reuenged of them, for the iniuries that were done to Dion, after he had driuen out the tirant Dionysius. For it was Icetes that caused Arete, the wife of Dion, to be cast into the sea, his sister Aristomache, and his son that was yet a sucking child, as we haue written in another place in the life of Dion. That done, he went to CATANA against Mamercus, who taried him by the riuer of ABOLVS, where Mamercus was ouerthrowen in battell, & aboue two thousand men slaine, the greatest part whereof were the CARTHAGINIANS, who Gisco had sent for his relefe. Afterwards he granted peace to the CARTHAGINIANS, vpo earnest sute made to him, with codition, that they should keep on the other side of the riuer of LYCVS, and that it should be lawfull for any of the inhabitants there that would, to come & dwell in the territory of the SYRACVSANS, and to bring away with them their gods, their wiues & their children: and furthermore, that fro thenceforth the CARTHAGINIANS should renoue ceal league, confederacy, & alliance with the tyrants. Whereon Mamercus hauing no hope of good successe in his doings, hee would go into ITALY, to set vp the LVCANIANS against Timoleon, and the SYRACVSANS. But they that were in his company, returned backe again with their gallies in the mid way: and when they were returned into SICILE, they deliuered vp the city of CATANA into the hands of Timoleon, so as Mamercus was constrained to fauche him self, and to flie vnto MESSINA, to Hippon the tyrant there. But Timoleon followed him, & besieged the city both by sea and by land. Whereat Hippon quaked for feare, and thought to flie by taking shippe, but hee was taken starting. And the MESSINIANS hauing him in their hands, made al the children come from the schoole to the THEATER, to see one of the goodliest sights that they could deuise: to wit, to see the tyraunt punished, who was openly whipped, and afterwards put to death. Now for Mamercus, he did yeeld him selfe vnto Timoleon, to be iudged by the SYRACVSANS, so that Timoleon might be his accuser. So that he was brought vnto SYRACVSA, where he attempted to make an oration to the people, which he had premeditated long before. But seeing that the people cried out, and made a great noise, because they would not heare him, and that there was no likelihood they would pardon him: he ranne ouerthwart the THEATER, and knocked his head as hard as he could driue, vppon one of the degrees whereon they sate there to see their sports, thinking to haue dashed out his brains, and haue rid him selfe sodainely out of his paine. Mamercus the tyrant put to death. he was not happy to die so, for he was taken straight being yet aliue, & put to death as the tyrant and murtherers are. Thus did Timoleon roote all tyrants out of SICILE, and made an end of wars there. And whereas he found the whole Ile, wilde, sauage, and hated of the naturall countrey men and inhabitants of the same, for the extreame calamities and miseries they suffered: Timoleon quieteth all Sicile. brought it to be so ciuil, and so much desired of strangers, that they came far and neare to dwell there, where the naturall inhabitants of the countrey selfe before, were glad to flie and forsake it. For AGRIGENTVM, and GELA, two great cities, did witnes this, which after the wars of the ATHENIANS, had bene vtterly forsaken and destroied by the CARTHAGINIANS, and were then inhabited againe. The one, by Megellus and Pheristus, two Captaines that came from GELA: and the other by Gorgos, who came from the Ile of CEO. And as neare as they could they gathered again together the first ancient citizens and inhabitants of the same: whom Timoleon did not only assure of peace and safety to liue there, to settle them quietly together: but willingly did helpe them besides, with all other things necessary, to his vttermost meane and ability, for which they loued and honored him as their father & founder. And this his good loue and fauour was common also to all other people of SICILE whatsoeuer. So that in all Sicile there was no truce taken in wars, nor lawes established, nor lands deuided, nor institution any pollicy or gouernment thought good or auaileable, if Timoleons deuise had not been as chiefe director of such matters, which gaue him a singular grace to be acceptable to them, and generally to be beloued of all men. For in those daies, there were other famous men in GREECE, that did marueilous great things: amongst whom were these, Timotheus, Agesilaus, Pelopidas, and Epaminondas, which Epaminondas Timoleon compared with the famousest men in Greece. Timoleon sought to followe in all things neare as he could, aboue any of them all. But in all the actions of these other great Captaines their glory was alway mingled with violence, paine, and labor: so as some of them haue been touched with reproch, and other with repentance. Weheras contrariwise, in all Timoleons doings (that only excepted which he was forced to do to his brother) there was nothing but might with troth (as Timaeus said) proclaime the saying of Sophocles:

Oh mighty goddes of heauen, what Venus stately dame, or Cupid, (god) haue thus yput, their handes vnto this same?

And like as Antimachus verses, and Dionysius painting both COLOPHONIANS, are full of sinewes and strength, and yet at this present we see they are things greatly labored, and troubled with much paine: and that contrariwise in Nicomachus tables, and Homers verses, beside the passing workmanship and singular grace in them, a man findeth at the first sight, that they were easily made, and without great paine. Euen so in like manner, whosoeuer will consider the painefull bloudy warres and battells of Epaminondas, and Agesilaus, with the warres of Timoleon, in the which, besides equity and iustice, there is also great ease and quietnesse like to finde, waying things indifferently, that they haue not beene fortunes doings simply, but that they came of a most noble and fortunate courage. Timoleon attributeth his good successe vnto fortune. Yet he him selfe doth wisely impute it vnto his good happe, and fauorable fortune. For in his letters he wrote vnto his familiar friends in CORINTHE, and in some other orations he made to the people of SYRACVSA: he spake many times, that he thanked the almighty goddes, that it had pleased them to saue and deliuer SICILE from bondage, by his meanes and seruice, and to giue him the honour and dignity of the name. Timoleon dwelleth still with the Syracusans. And hauing builded a temple in his house, he did dedicate it vnto fortune, and furthermore did consecrat his whole house vnto her. For he dwelt in a house the SYRACVSANS kept for him, and gaue him in recompence of the good seruice he had done them in the warres, with a marueilous faire pleasaunt house in the country also, where he kept most when he was at leysure. For he neuer after returned vnto CORINTHE againe, but sent for his wife and dren to come thither, and neuer dealt afterwards with those troubles that fell out amongst the GRÆCIANS, neither did make himselfe to be enuied of the citizens: (a mischiefe that most gouernours and captaines do fall into, through their vnsatiable desire of honour and authoritie) but liued all the rest of his life after in SICILE, reioycing for the great good he had done, and specially to see so many cities and thousands of people happy by his meanes. But because it is an ordinarie matter, and of necessitie, (as Simonides saith) that not onely all larkes haue a tuft vpon their heads, but also that in all cities there be accusers, where the people rule: there were two of those at SYRACVSA, that continually made orations to the people, who did accuse Timoleon, the one called Laphystius, and the other Demænetus. So this Laphystius appointing Timoleon a certaine day to come and answer to his accusation before the people, thinking to conuince him: the citizens began to mutinie, and would not in any case suffer the day of adiornment to take place. But Timoleon did pacifie them, declaring vnto them, that he had taken all the extreame paines and labour he had done, and had passed so many dangers, because euery citizen and inhabitant of SYRACVSA, might frackly vse the liberty of their laws. And another time Demænetus, in open assembly of the people, reprouing many things Timoleon did when he was generall: Timoleon answered neuer a word, but only said vnto the people, that he thanked the gods they had granted him the thing he had so oft requested of them in his prayers, which was, that he might once see the SYRACVSANS haue full power and liberty to say what they would. Now Timoleon in all mens opinion, had done the noblest acts that euer GRÆCIAN captaine did in his time, and had aboue deserued the fame and glory of all the noble exploits, which the rhetoricians with all their eloquent orations perswaded the GRÆCIANS vnto, in the open assemblies, & common feasts and plaies of GREECE, out of the which fortune deliuered him safe and sound before the trouble of the ciuill warres that followed soone after: and moreouer he made a great proofe of his valiancie and knowledge in warres, against the barbarous people and tyrants, and had shewed himselfe also a iust and mercifull man vnto all his friends, & generally to all the GRÆCIANS. And furthermore, seeing he won the most part of all his victories and triumphes, with out the shedding of any one teare of his men, or that any of them mourned by his meanes, and also rid all SICILE of all the miseries and calamities raigning at that time, in lesse then eight yeares space: he being now growne blinde, his sight first beginning a litle to faile him, shortly after he lost it altogether. This happened, not through any cause or occasion of sickneesse that came vnto him, nor that fortune had finally done him that iniurie: but it was in my opinion, a disease inheritable to him by his parents, which by time came to lay hold on him also. For the voice went, that many of his kin in like case had also lost their sight, which by little and little with age, was cleane taken from them. Howbeit Athanis the Historiographer writeth, that during the warres he had against Mamercus & Hippon, as he was in his campe at MYLES, there came a white spot in his eyes, that dimmed his sight somwhat: so that euery man perceiued that he should lose his sight altogether. Notwithstanding that, he did not raise his siege, but continued his enterprise, vntill he tooke both the tyrants at last: and so sooneas he returned to SYRACVSA againe, he did put himselfe out of his office of generall, praying the citizens to accept that he had already done, or rather becaule things were brought to so good passe, as they themselues could desire. Now, that he paciently tooke this misfortune to be blinde altogether, peraduenture men may somwhat maruell at it: but this much more is to be wondred at, that the SYRACVSANS after he was blind, did so much honor him, & acknowledge the good he had done thē, that they went themselues to visit him oft, & brought strangers (that were trauellers) to his house in the city, and also in the coūtry, to make them see their benefactor, reioycing & thinking thēselues happie that he had chosen to end his life with them, & that for this cause he had despised the glorious returne that was prepared for him in GREECE, for the great & happy victories he had won in SICILE. But amongst many other things the SYRACVSANS did, and ordained to honor him with, this of all other me thinketh was the chiefest: that they made a perpetuall lawe, so that as they should haue warres against forrein people, and not against their owne countrimen that they should euer choose a CORINTHIAN for their generall. It was a goodly thing also to see how they did honor him in the assemblies of their counsell. For if any trifling matter fell

Paulus Æmylius with Timoleon.

SYth these two men were such as the Historiographers haue described them to be: it is certaine, that comparing the one with the other, we shall finde no great oddes nor difference betweene them. For first of all, the warres they made, haue beene against great and famous enemies: the one against the MACEDONIANS, and the other against the CARTHAGINIANS, and both their victories very notable. For the one of them conquered the realme of MACEDON, which he tooke from the seuenth king that raigned by succession from the father to the sonne, since the time of the great Antigonus: and the other draue all the tyrants out of SICILE, and restored the whole Ile and cities therein, vnto their former libertie. Vnlesse some will alledge perhaps that there was this difference betweene them, that AEmylius fought against king Perseus, when he had all his power whole and entire, and had fought with the ROMAINES many times before, and had the better of them in all conflicts: where Timoleon set vpon Dionysius, when he was in greatest despaire, and in manner vtterly cast away. On the contrarie side, it may be obiected for Timoleon, that he ouercame many tyrants, and a mightie great armie of the CARTHAGINIANS, with a very small number of men, and yet men of all sorts: not as AEmylius with a great armie of well trained and expert souldiers in warres, but with men gathered together at aduenture of all sorts, being mercenarie hirelings, and fighting men for pay, loose people, and men vnruly in wars, that would do but what they listed. For where the goodly deeds are like, and the meanes vnequall: there we must confesse that the praise is due vnto the generall. Both the one and the other kept their hands cleane from corruption, in the charge which they tooke vpon them. But it seemeth that AEmylius came so fashioned and prepared, by the good ciuill lawe, and morall discipline of his countrie: and that Timoleon came rawly thither, and afterwards fashioned himselfe to be that he was. And this is to be proued: for that all the ROMAINES in that time were so ciuilly brought vp, and exceeded all other in straight keeping the lawes of their countrie. Where to the contrarie, there was not one of the captaines of the GRÆCIANS that came then, or were sent into SICILE, but fell straight to corruption, when he had put his foote in SICILE, Dion onely excepted: and yet they had a certaine suspition of him, that he aspired to the kingdom, & imagined in his head to stablish a certaine Empire at SYRACVSA, like vnto that of LACEDÆMON. Timeus the Historiographer writeth, that the SYRACVSANS sent Gilippus with shame backe againe into his countrie, for his vnsatiable greedy couetousnesse, and for his great thefts, and bribes taken in his charge. Diuers other haue also written the great treasons and falshoods Pharax SPARTAN, & Calippus

ATHENIAN did commit, both of them seeking to make themselues lordes of SYRA and yet what men are they, and what meanes had they to haue such a foolish vaine hope fancie in their heads? Considering that the one did follow & serue Dionysius, after that he driuen out of SYRACVSA: and the other also was but a priuate captaine of a band of soco of those that came in with Dion. Timoleon in contrarie manner was sent, to be generall SYRACVSANS, vpon their great instance and sute. And he hauing no need to seeke or ha ter it, but onely to keepe the power and authoritie they did willingly put into his hand soone as he had destroyed and ouerthrowne all such as would vniustly vsurpe the gou ment, he did immediatly of his owne good wil, frankly resigne vp his office and charg sure, so is this a notable thing to be commended, and esteemed in Paulus Æmylius: wh uing conquered so great and riche a realme, he neuer increased his goods the value farthing, neither did see nor handle any money at all, although he was very liberall, largely vnto others. I meane not in speaking this to vpbraide or detect Timoleon, for accepted a faire house the SYRACVSANS gaue him in the citie, and a goodly manor the countrie: for in such cases there is no dishonestie in receiuing, but so is it greater h to refuse, then to take But that vertue is most rare and singular, where we see they will nor take nothing, though they haue iustly deserued it. And if it be so, that the body is and better compounded, which best abideth change of parching heate, and nipping c that the minde is much more stronger & stable, that swelleth not vp with pride of pro nor droopeth for sorow in aduersity. Thē it appeareth, that Æmylius vertue was so m perfect, in that he shewed himselfe of no lesse graue and constant a minde, in the p endured for his losse and sorrow happened vnto him: (loosing at one time in maner children) then he had done before, in all his triumphe & greatest felicitie. Where the contrary, hauing done a worthy act against his brother, could with no reason the griefe and sorowe he felt: but ouercome with bitter griefe and repentance, conti space of twentie yeares together, and neuer durst once onely shew his face againe in ker place, nor deale any more in matters of the commonweale. Truely, for a man beware to do euill, and to shun from euill, it is a very good and comely thing: so also to be sorie, and a feard of euery reproache, and ill opinion of the worlde, it sheweth a simplenesse of nature, and a good and well disposed minde, but no manly courage.

The end of Timoleons life.

THE LIFE OF Pelopidas.

CATO the elder, aunſwered certaine on a time, that maruellouſly commended a bolde, a venturous, and deſperate man for the warres: that there was great odds, to eſteeme manhood ſo much, and life ſo litle. And ſurely it was wiſely ſpoken of him. The report goeth, that king Antigonus gaue pay to a ſouldier among other, that was verie hardie and venturous, but he had a naughtie ſickely bodie. The king asked him one day, what he ayled to be ſo pale, and euill coloured? The ſouldier told him, he had a ſecret diſeaſe vpon him, that he might not tell him with reuerence. The king hearing him ſo, commaunded his Phiſitians and Surgeons to looke to him, and if he were curable, that they ſhould heale him with all poſſible ſpeede: and ſo they did. After the ſouldier had his health againe, he would venter no more ſo deſperately in the warres, as he did before. Inſomuch, king Antigonus ſelfe perceiuing his ſlackneſſe and drawing backe, rebuked him, and ſaide vnto him: that he wondred to ſee ſo great a chaunge and alteration in him. The ſouldier nothing ſtriking at the matter, told him the troth plainely. Your ſelfe, and it pleaſe your maieſtie, the cauſe of my cowardlineſſe now, by healing my diſeaſe; that made my life lothſome to me. Much like were a SYBARITANS words, touching the life and manner of the LACEDÆMONIANS. That it was no maruell they had ſuch a deſire to die in the warres, ſeeing they did it but tidde themſelues of their troubles, and moſt miſerable and ſtraight life. But we muſt not wonder though the SYBARITANS, being womaniſh men, and altogether giuen to pleaſure, did ſo thinke: that thoſe men hated their liues, who feared not death, for the deſire they had to be good, and goodwill they had to do their dutie. Which was contrarie in the LACEDÆMONIANS. For they were of opinion, that to liue and die willingly, was a vertue: as theſe ſubſtantiall verſes doe witneſſe.

To be too bold and venturous is not good.

The anſwere of a ſouldier to king Antigonus

Diuers opinions of life & death

The dead which here doe reſt, did not in life eſteeme, that life or death were (of themſelues) or good or bad to deeme.
But euen as life did end, or death was brought to paſſe, ſo life or death, was good or bad, this their opinion was.

And in deede to flie death is no shame, so it proceede not of a cowardly heart: neither desire death is commendable, if it be with contempt and hate of life. This is the reason why Homer saith, the valianteſt men are euer beſt armed, when they come to battell. The lawmakers among the GRÆCIANS, doe euer puniſh him that caſtes away his target, but neuer him that caſteth away his ſworde or launce. For euery man muſt firſt thinke to defende himſelfe before he ſeeke to hurt his enemie, and ſpecially ſuch as haue the whole ſtate of a realme in their hands, and be generals of the field. For if the compariſon be true, that Iphicrates the THENIAN captaine made, that in an armie of men, the light horſemen reſemble the hands, the men of armes the feete, the battell of footemen the ſtomacke and breaſt, the captaine the head of a mans bodie: it ſeemeth then that the venturous captaine putting himſelfe in danger without cauſe, is not onely careleſſe of his owne life, but alſo of all theirs whoſe liues depend vpon his ſafetie. As contrarily, he being carefull of his owne perſon, cannot but be carefull of his ſouldiers that ſerue vnder him. Therefore Callicratidas a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine, a worthie man otherwiſe, did vnwiſely anſwere a ſoothſaier that bad him take heede of himſelfe: for the ſignes and tokens of the ſacrifices did threaten his death. SPARTA, ſaid he, conſideth not vpon one manalone. It is true, that to fight by ſea or by land man for man, Callicratidas was but one man of himſelfe: but as captaine or lieuetenant generall, he had the whole power and force of the armie in his perſon. For he was not a man alone, when ſo many mens liues were loſt with his. Now old Antigonus was of a contrarie minde. For he being determined to giue battell by ſea, about the Ile of ANDROS, made a better anſwere to one that ſaid vnto him: his enemies had moe ſhips then himſelfe. For how many ſhips doeſt thou reckon me and my ſelfe, ſaid he? Therein he did wiſely to make great account of the worthines of a generall, ſpecially when it is ioyned with hardineſſe and experience. For the chiefeſt point of ſafetie is to ſaue him, that ſaueth all other. For when Chares on a time ſhewed the ATHENIANS openly, the ſundry woundes and cuts he had receiued vpon his bodie, and his target alſo thrilled through with many pikes: Timotheus ſtraight ſaid vnto him, Chares, I am not of the like minde. For when I did beſiege the citie of SAMOS, I was aſhamed to ſee a dart throwne ouer the wals, light hard by me, for that I ſhewed my ſelfe a raſh young man, and more venterous than became a generall of ſo great an armie. For when it ſtandeth much vpon the whole armie, that it is neceſſarie the generall thereof do put himſelfe in daunger: then he ſhould preſſe forward, and occupie both hands and bodie without reſpect, not regarding their weakneſſe. I ſay, a good wiſe captaine ſhould die for age, or at the leaſt old. But where there is ſmall hope to be wonne by very good ſucceſſe, and contrariwiſe much loſſe and deſtruction by ill fortune: no man of wiſedome or iudgement would wiſh a generall to fight as a priuate ſouldier, to hazard the loſſe of a generall. I thought good therefore to make this preface before the liues of Pelopidas and of Marcellus, both which were worthie men, and died otherwiſe than they ſhould. For they both were valiant ſouldiers in the field, and did both of them aduance their countrie with famous victories, and ſpecially againſt great and dreadfull enemies. For the one was the firſt (as they ſay) that ouerthrew Hannibal, who was neuer ouercome before. And the other alſo ouercame the LACEDÆMONIANS in battell, that ruled all Greece at that time both by ſea and by land. Yet they both careleſſely loſt their liues, by venturing boldly: when their countrie ſtoode in greateſt neede of ſuch men and captaines as they were. This is the cauſe why we following the reſemblance that was betweene them, haue coupled their liues together. Pelopidas, the ſonne of Hippoclus, came of one of the nobleſt houſes in the citie of THEBES, as Epaminondas did. He being brought vp in great wealth, his father left him heire of all his lands and goods, being but a young man. So he ſtraight ſhewed himſelfe willing to do good with his money, to thoſe that needed helpe, and were worthie: and the world ſee, that his money was not his maſter. For as Ariſtotle ſaith, of theſe rich men, the one part of them do not vſe their goods, for extreeme couetouſneſſe: other againe do abuſe them as being giuen to ouermuch pleaſures. So rich men became ſlaues all their life time, either to pleaſure, other to profit. Now, all Pelopidas other friendes would be beholding to him, and take very thankfully his curteſie & liberalitie towards them. But Epaminondas could not be brought to take any thing at his hands. Howbeit Pelopidas ſelfe folowed Epaminondas for he tooke a pride and pleasure to go simply apparelled, to fare meanely, to labour willingly, and to make warres openly as he did. He was euen such an other, as Euripides the Poet described Capaneus to be, when he said of him:

He rich and wealthy was, yet was he therewithall,

For he would haue beene ashamed, that the poorest man of the citie of THEBES, should haue worne meaner apparell vpon his backe, then himselfe. As for Epaminondas, his pouertie was not dainty to him, because his parents were euer poore and yet for all that he passed it ouer more easily by studie of Philosophie, which he gaue himselfe vnto, & for that from his youth he liked to leade a spare life without excesse. Where Pelopidas matched in a noble house, and maried highly, and had two children by his wife: neuertheless he had no minde to keepe or increase his goods the more for that, but gaue himselfe altogether to serue the common weale as long as he liued. By reason whereof his wealth decaied, and his best friendes grew angrie with him, telling him how he did not well to make no more reckoning of a thing that was so necessarie, as to haue goods. And he answered them: In deede they are necessarie I do confesse it, but yet for such a one as this poore, lame, and blind man that standeth by. They both were alike borne to all vertue, sauing that Pelopidas tooke most pleasure in exercise of his bodie and strength, and Epaminondas in the exercise of his wit & learning. So as the pastime eche of them tooke when they were at leasure was, that the one delighted to wrastle and to hunt, and liked any kind of exercise of his bodie: and the other to heare, to studie, and alwaies to learne some thing of Philosophie. But among all the excellent giftes and good parts in either of them, and that most wanne them honour and estimation in the world, they were only commended and singularly noted of wise men, for the perfect loue and friendship that was euer inviolably kept betweene them vntill their deathes: hauing beene ioyned together in so many battels, warres, charges of armies, and otherwise in matters of state and gouernment. For if a man will consider, and looke into the doings of Aristides, Themistocles, and Cimon, of Pericles, Nicias, and Alcibiades, how full of dissentions, enuies, and suspitions they were one against another in gouerning the common weale: and againe will consider the loue, honor, & kindnes, that continued alwaies betwixt Pelopidas & Epaminondas: no doubt they will say these two are more worthy to be called brethren in warre, (as they say) & companions in gouernment, then any of them we haue named before, whose care & studie was alwaies rather to ouercome one another, then to ouercome their enemies, & the only cause thereof was their vertue. For their actes shewed they did not seeke glorie, nor riches for themselues (the couetousnesse whereof doth alwaies breede quarrels and enuie) but both of them from the beginning fell one in loue with another, with a great kindnes & estimation of themselues, to see their countrie flourish, and grow to great honour through their seruice, and in their time: and so they reckoned all the good exploites both of the one and the other, that tended to that end, as their owne. The most part of writers thinke, this great and earnest loue the one did beare to another, did grow first betweene them in a iorney they made together vnto MANTINEA, to aide the LACEDÆMONIANS, that were at that time confederates of the THEBANS. For they being both set in battell ray, one hard by an other among the footemen, against the Arcadians that stood before them: it fortuned that the point of the battell of the LACEDÆMONIANS in the which they were, gaue backe, and many of them ranne away. But they determining to die rather then to flie, stoode close together, and fought with the enemies that came vpon them vntill such time as Pelopidas being hurt in seuen places before, fell downe at the last vpon a heape of dead bodies, aswell of their owne souldiers as of their enemies, euen one vpon another. Then Epaminondas thinking he had beene slaine, stept notwithstanding before him to defend his bodie and armour, and he alone fought against many, being willing to die rather then to forsake Pelopidas lying amongest the dead bodies: vntill himselfe being thrust into the breast with a pike, and sore cut on his arme with a sworde, was euen readie to giue ouer, when Agesipolis (the king of the LACEDÆMONIANS) came with the other point of the battell in happie houre, who saued both their liues past all hope. Now after this battell, the LACEDÆMONIANS both in words and deedes did courteously intreat the THEBANS as their friendes and confederates.

Wherupon Archias, Leontidas, & Philip, all three great wealthy men of the citie of Thebes, and misliking to be equall with other citizens, did perswade Phabidas, a captaine of the LACE-DÆMONIANS, that going and comming through the countrie of BOEOTIA with an armie he would one day assay to take the castle of THEBES called CADMEA, & driuing those out o the citie that would resist him, he would put the gouernement of the state into the hands of few of the noblest persons, who would be at the deuotion of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & do them in all things. Phabidas brought it to passe, and did worke his feate before the Thebian mustrusted any thing vpon a holy day called THESMOPHORIA. After he had wonne the stle, he apprehended Ismenias, & sent him to LACEDÆMON, where shortly after they put him to death. Pelopidas, Pherenicus, and Androclidas, with many other, saued themselues by flying and were banished THEBES by sound of Trumpet. Epaminondas taried still in THEBES, and no man touched him, for they made small account of him, because he was altogether giuen to booke: and though his goodwill had serued him to haue done some feate, his pouertie ma him vnable to doe any thing. The LACEDÆMONIANS vnderstanding of the taking of the ca stle, did straight put Phabidas out of his charge, and set a fine of a hundred thousand Drachm vpon his head: but yet they kept still the castle of CADMEA in their handes with a great gar rison. All the other cities and people of GREECE did wonder much at it, that they should s low the fact, and punish notwithstanding the doer. So the THEBANS hauing lost their anci

it was maintained and defended by the LACEDÆMONIANS, and that they could not possib who were banished from THEBES, were very well receiued and entertained of the people ATHENS, and much made of also of the nobility, they sought secretly by treason to haue the killed. To doe this feate, they sent certaine men vnknowen vnto ATHENS, who by treas slew Androclidas, howbeit they missed the killing of the other. Furthermore, the LACE-DÆMONIANS wrote to the ATHENIANS, that they should not receiue such as were banish from THEBES, nor that they should fauour them, but driue them out of their citie, as th which by their allies were iustly proclaimed common enemies. The ATHENIANS notwith their minde and determination: who all liked very well of of their purpose. Insomuch Charon that was the chiefest man among them, promised to lend them his house to assemble in. Philidas also found meanes to be secretary to Philip and Archias, who were gouernours and capitaines of the city at that time for the LACEDÆMONIANS. Epaminondas on the other side making no shew of any thing, had of long time practised to sturre vp the courage of the young men of THEBES. For when they were at any games or exercises of body, hee would euer prouoke them to wrastle with the LACEDÆMONIANS. And after he saw them reioyce when they had cast them, and that they were the stronger: he would chide them, and tell them they might be ashamed, for lacke of courage to suffer the LACEDÆMONIANS to hold their noses to the grindstone, that were nothing like to them in strength. Now, the confederats appointed a day certaine, to breake the ise of their pretended enterprise, and agreed that Pherenicus, with other that were banished, should tary at the village of THRIASIVM, and that they should send the valiantest and lustiest young men before, to giue the venter to enter the city: adding thisther withall, that if the enemies fortuned to surprise them, all the other of the conspiracy ioyntly together, should be ready to giue order, that their fathers, mothers, & children, should lacke nothing necessary for them. Pelopidas was the first man offered him selfe to vndertake the enterprise: and after him Melon, Damoclidas, and Theopompus, all three, men of the greatest houses of THEBES, who loued maruellously together, and for no respect would euer offend one another, although from the beginning there was euer emulation among them for honour and glory, by striuing who should exceede other in vertue and valiantnes. Now they were twelue of them, who taking leaue of the rest, sent a foote post before to Charon, to aduertise him of their comming: and they thē selues went on their iourney casting litle short clokes vpon them, and taking houndes with them, and hunters staues in their handes, because their enterprise should not be mistrusted by those that met thē on the way, & that they should think them hunters vp and downe the fieldes for their pleasure. So, when their messenger they sent came to the city, and had told Charon that they were comming: hee neuer shrunke from his word, though the danger toward was great, but like a stoute and honest man did abide by his promise he made, and told him they should be most heartely welcome to his house. But an other man called Hippostbenidas, very honest otherwise, and one that loued his country and the preseruation thereof, and a good friend of those also that were banished, fainting straight vpon the sodaine report of these newes, and his mind was troubled, and his heart failed him so, as his nose fell a bleeding, to thinke vpon the greatnes of the instant danger hee was like to fall into, hauing neuer cast before with him selfe, how by this enterprise they should put all the empire of the LACEDÆMONIANS in hazard of vtter destruction, and lay a plotte besides to ouerthrow all their owne common weale and state, by laying all their hope vppon a few banished mē, hardly to wade through with their enterprise. Wherupon so soon as he was come home, he secretly dispatched a messenger one of his familiar friends, vnto Melon and Pelopidas, to will them they should defer their enterprise for better oportunity, & so to returne backe againe to ATHENS. Chlidon was the mā he sent of this message, who presently went home to his house: and taking his horse out of the stable, bad his wife fetch him the bridle quickly. The bridle not being readily to be found, she told him she had lent it out to one of their neighbors. Then they fell a chiding together about it, and at length brake out to fowle words, and lastly his wife fell a cursing of him, and praied the gods he might haue ill lucke in his iourney, and those that sent him. Chlidon hauing spent the most part of the day chiding and brawling with his wife about the bridle, and furthermore misliking the tokens of his wiues cursing and banning of him: hee determined not to go a foot out of the dores of that arrant, and so went about some other business. Thus had this noble enterprise in manner bene altogether dashed, before it was fully begun. Now those that were in Pelopidas company, changed apparell with the country men, because they would not be knowen, and did deuide thē selues, for that they would not come into the city all together, but at diuers gates, being day light. At that time it was a maruellous wind and great snow, & the weather was so boistrous, that euery man got him within dores: which fell out happily for the cōspirators, that they were not knowen when they came into the city. So their friends and confederats within the city receiued them as they came, & brought them to Charons house: where were assembled together, with those that were banished, eight and forty persons only. Now for the tyrants, thus stood the matter with them. Philidas their secretary was of the conspiracy, as wee haue told you before, and he knew all the practise. Wherefore he had long before solemnly bidden Archias and his company, to supper in his house that very night, to be merry together, and had promised to entertaine them with women to welcome them withal: of purpose, that when they had in their full cups, & were in the middest of all their pleasure, the conspirators might then vse them as they would. So they being set at table, before they were sped of their cups, one came to them, and told them truly of the matter (not the particularities, neither as a thing certaine, but of a rumor onely that ran about the towne) how the banished men were hidden in Charons house. Philidas would haue pried the matter ouer. Howbeit Archias would needes send one of his gard straight for Charon, to command him to come to him presently. It was within night, and Pelopidas and his company prepared themselues to worke their feat, being armed euery man, and their swords in their hands, when vpon a sodaine they heard one knocke at the gate. And one of the house running straight to the gate, came backe againe afeard to tell them that it was one of Archias gard that came for Charon, to come immediatly to the gouernors. Then were they in doubt that their practise was discouered, and that they were all cast away, before they could make any proofe of their valiantnes: notwithstãding, they were all of opinion, that Charon should obey the message, and that he should present him selfe before the gouernors, to take away all suspition from them. Charon of himself was a stout man, very constant, and resolute in danger for his own person: yet it grieued him much at that time, for feare the confederates should suspect him he had bewraied them, if so many honest citizens whom he had lent his house vnto, should vnfortunatly miscary. Therfore before he went out of his house, he wẽt into his wiues chãber to see his son, that was a goodly boy, but strong as any boy of his age could be: so he brought him to Pelopidas, and praied him, if he vnderstood he had betrayed them any way, or otherwise sought their hurt, they should then vse his son as an enemy, without any compassion towards him. When the confederats saw the good zeale and true noble minde of Charon, they fell a weeping, and were angry with him, that he should thinke any of them so faint hearted or timerous, for any danger could come to them, that they should suspect or accuse him for any thing: and therewith all they praied him, not to leaue the boy with them, but rather to conuey him into some place out of the tyrants danger, where he might be brought vp, that one day he might be reuenged of the wrong and iniury they had done to them, and to their country. Charon answered thẽ, he would not take him away, and that he saw no life nor health more sweet for him, then to die with his father without infamy, and with so many honest men his friends. So after he had besought the gods to prosper them, and had encouraged and embraced euery one of the confederators one after another: he went to the gouernors, and studied by the way so to frame his words and countenance, as though he should seeme to thinke of any thing rather then of that he purposed to do. When he came to Philidas dore that made the feast, Archias and Philidas him selfe came vnto him, & asked him Charon, what are they (said they) that are come into the city, and hidden in some house, with certain citizens, that do accompany them? Charon was somewhat abashed at the first, and asked them againe: what men be they? who are they that hides them in the city? But when he perceiued that Archias could tell nothing of certainty, then he thought straight that some man hadde informed them that was not priuy to the practise, but had heard some thing of it. Thereupon hee willed them to take heede that it were no false alarome, to make them afrayed: neuertheless (said he) I will enquire further of it. For at all aduenture it is good to be circumspect in such a case to be sure. Philidas answered that he said truly: and so he brought Archias backe againe into the hall, where he made him drink deeper then before, still entertaining the company with hope of the womens comming. Charon returning home againe, found all the confederats ready to attempt their enterprise, and mẽ that reckoned of their liues, not that had any hope to preuaile: but as those that were determined to die valiantly, & to sell their liues dearly. Now he truly told vnto Pelopidas only, what was said vnto him: and the rest, he told that Archias had sent for him to speake with him, and other matters. The storme of the former danger was scant blowen ouer, but fortune sent another nother. For immediatly vpon talke had with Charon at the first, came a messenger from A-THENS, that brought a letter to the same Archias, written by the Bishop of ATHENS at that time, called Archias also as himself, & was his old host and friend: wherin he wrote not of sim-ple coniecture, not surmised suspition, but the plaine conspiracy in euery degree, as afterwards fell out. So the messenger was brought to Archias that was drunke, and deliuering him the letter, he said vnto him. Sir, he that sēdeth you this letter, straightly charged me to tell you, that you should presently read the contents thereof, because it is a matter of great importance. Archias laughing said vnto him: waighty matters to morrow. So he took the letter and put it vp, & then fell againe to his tale he had begun with Philidas. But euer after, the GRECIANS made this a common prouerb among them, waighty matters to morrow. Now when the conspira-tors spied their time to go about their busines, they deuided them selues in two companies. Pe-lopidas and Damoclidas went with one company, to set vpon Leontidas & Hypates, because they dwelt neare together: Charon and Melon with the rest, went against Archias and Philip, being disguised in womens apparel they had put vpon their priuy coats, & wearing garlands of pine apple and firre trees on their heads, they couered al their faces. So when they came to shew thē selues at the hall dore where the banket was made, they that were in the hall at the first sight, thinking they had bene the women they looked for, began to shout, and made great noise for ioy. But when the conspirators cast their eies round about the hall to know those which were at the table, they drew out their swords, and set vpon Archias and Philip ouerthwart the table: then they shewed themselues what they were. Then Philidas bad his guests he had bidden to the banket with them, that they should not stir, for they should haue no hurt: so some of them were still. But the greatest number of them would needes from the bord, to defend their gouer-nors. Howbeit because they were drunke that they knew not what they did, they were soone slaine with them. Now Pelopidas enterprise was not so easie. For they went against Leonti-das, that was a sober discrete man, and withal, hardy of his hands: and they found he was gone to bed, his dores were shut vp, and they knocked long before any man came to the dore. At the length, one of his men that heard them rappe so hard, with much a do came to open the dore: but he had no sooner thrust backe the bolt of the dore, and beganne to open it, but they pushed in from them with such a force vpon him altogether, that they laied him on the grounde, and went straight to his maisters chamber. Leontidas hearing the noise of them that ranne vppe to him in such hast, presently mistrusted the matter: and leaping out of his bed, tooke his sword in his hand, but did forget to put out the lampes that burned in his chāber all night, for if they had beene out, they might easily haue hurt one another in the darke. But the lampes giuing cleare light in the chamber, he went to the chamber dore, and gaue Cephisodorus the first man that presséd to enter vpon him, such a blow with is sword, that he dropped downe dead at his feete. Hauing slaine the first man, he dealt with the second that came after him, and that was Pelopidas. The fight went hard betweene them two, both for that the chamber dore was very straight, as also for that Cephisodorus body lying on the ground, did choke the comming in at the chamber. Notwithstanding, Pelopidas ouercame him in the end, and slue him: and went fro thence with his company, straight to Hypates house, where they got in, as they did vnto Leon-tidas house before. But Hypates knew presently what it was, and thought to saue him selfe in his neighbours houses. Howbeit the conspirators followed him so hard, that they cut him off before he could recouer their houses. Then they gathered togither, and ioyned with Melons company, and sent immediatly with all possible speed to ATHENS, to the banished THEBANS, to arme, & cried through the city, liberty, liberty, arming those citizens that came to thē, with the armor and spoils of their enemies, that were hanged vp in commmon vauts, & armorers shops about Charons house, which they brake open, or caused to be opened by force. On the other side, Epaminondas, and Gorgidas, came to ioine with them, with a company of yong men & ho-stold mē well appointed, whom they had gathered together. Hereupon, the whole city was straight in an vprore and tumult, and euery house was full of lights, one running to an other to know what the matter was. Neuertheles the people did not yet assēble together, but euery one being amazed, musing at this stur, not vnderstāding the troth, staied till day came on, that they might call a counsell. But truly herein, me thinkes the Captaines of the garrison of the LACE-

Prou. Pelopidas killeth the tyrants.

The liberty of the Thebans restored.

DÆMONIANS were greatly in fault, that they did not sturre betimes, and set vppon them continently: considering there were fifteene hundred souldiers, besides a great number of citizens that would haue come, one after another to take their parts. But the great noise heard, made them afeard, and to see lights in euery mans house, and the people running vp downe the streetes in great multitudes to and fro: whereupon they sturred not, but onely them within the castell of CADMEA The next morning by breake of day, came the other rinished THEBANS from ATHENS very well armed, and all the people of THEBES drew ther in counsaile. Thither did Epaminondas and Gorgidas bring Pelopidas, and his confo presented them before the people, compassed about with priests and the professed of the offering them crownes to put vpon their heads, and they praied the assembly of the cit that they would helpe their gods, and their countrey. All the people that were present, they saw them, rose vp, and stoode on their feete, and with great shouts and clapping of receiued them, as their sauiours, that had deliuered their countrey from bondage, and re them againe to liberty: and thereupon, before them all, euen in the market place, by the voice and consent of the people, they chose Pelopidas, Melon, and Charon, gouernors and taines of all BOEOTIA. Pelopidas then immediatly made them besiege the castell of CADM about, with trenches, and force of wodde, doing all he could possible to winne it, and to pulse the LACEDÆMONIANS, before any supply and aide came to them from SPARTA he did, and preuented it so sodainely, that the garrison being departed out of the castell by position, as they returned towards LACEDÆMONIA, they found Cleombrotus king of SPARTA in the countrey of MEGARA, comming towards them with a great army to helpe the Afterward, of the three captaines which had charge of their garrison that lay at THEBES SPARTANS condemned two of them to death: Hermippidas and Arcissus were present ecuted: and the third captaine, Dysacoridas, they set so grieuous a fine on his head, that he out of PELOPONNESVS. This enterprise being attempted, and executed with the like ant nesse, and the same daunger and trouble, that Thrasybulus practise was, when he deliu ATHENS from the slauery of the thirty gouernours and tyrants, and hauing the like for and happy end: the GRECIANS termed it cosin german to Thrasybulus act. And in de were a hard matter to find two other such, besides them two, that with so few men ouer their enemies, being many moe in number then them selues, or that with so small helpe uercome those that were of so great force, or that performed their enterprise with their valiantes and wisdome, & were cause besides of so great blessing and benefit to their coun as Pelopidas and Thrasybulus attempt was But the great change and alteration of the state wardes, did make their actes farre more noble and famous. For the warre that ouer the maiesty of SPARTA, and that tooke away all the seignory and rule of the LACEDÆ NIANS both by sea and by land, beganne the very same night, when Pelopidas him sel king the twelfth person, and entring into a priuate house, (taking neither city, nor castell strong hold) to tell truely by figuratiue speach, did breake and cut in sunder the links chaines that linked straight together, and strengthened the LACEDÆMONIANS whole pire and monarchy ouer all GREECE: who vntil that present time were thought so strong no possibility could breake or sunder them. Now the LACEDÆMONIANS fortuning wards to inuade the countrey of BOEOTIA with a mighty army: the ATHENIANS trem for feare of their great power, did vtterly leaue to protect them, and renounced the leagu alliance they had made before with them. And moreouer, they did straightly prosecute against those, that were accused to take part with the BOEOTIANS: whereof some of were put to death, other were banished from ATHENS, and the rest condemned in great of money. To be short, euery man saide the THEBANS were but vndone, considering had no helpe, and were beloued besides of none. At that present time it fell out Pelopidas Gorgidas were generals ouer all BOEOTIA for that yeare, who deuising to throw a bone twixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, to make them square, they this policy. There was a captaine of the LACEDÆMONIANS called Sphodrias, a valiant but else of small capacity, and vainely giuen, hauing a certaine fond ambition and humor, swading him selfe he had done some notable good seruice in his time. This Sphodrias was in the citie of THESPIES, with a great band of souldiers, to receiue & fauor al the BOEOTIANS that had a mind to reuolt from the THEBANS. Pelopidas of himselfe sent a marchant, (a verie friend of his) vnto Sphodrias, with a great some of money from him, and certaine perswasions withall, which preuailed more then the money, wishing him to attempt some greater matter, & to seeke to win the hauen of PIRÆA: a thing soone wonne, if he came to assault it on the sodaine, & the rather, for that the ATHENIANS mistrust nothing, neither keepe watch nor ward there. Moreouer, that he might assure himselfe, nothing could be better welcome to the lords of LACEDÆMONIA, then to make thē lords of the citie of ATHENS also. And againe, that the THEBANS, being at deadly food with the ATHENIANS, for that they had betraied & forsaken them in their need, would not aide nor succour thē in any respect. Sphodrias giuing too light eare to this vaine perswasion, tooke the souldiers he had with him, & marching away by night entred the realme of ATTICA, & went on to the citie of ELEVSIN: but when he came thither, his souldiers were afeard, & would go no further. So his purpose being discouered, he was forced to returne backe to THESPIES, hauing raised such a warre to the LACEDÆMONIANS, as fell out to be of no smal importance to them, nor easie to be pacified. For after that time, the ATHENIANS sought league & amity again with the THEBANS, & did aide them very louingly: and moreouer, putting thēselues to sea, they sailed vp & downe, procuring & drawing to their league all such as were willing to rebell against the LACEDÆMONIANS: and the THEBANS besides, had many prety skirmishes with the LACEDÆMONIANS in the meane time, in their owne country of BOEOTIA. It is true they came to no great battels, but yet it was such a great learning and continuall training of them in marshall discipline, as the THEBANS stil increased in courage and valiantnes, & waxed stronger and better souldiers: for by those skirmishes they grew not onely expert souldiers, but waxed more skilfull in vsing their weapons, then before. As we read, that Antalcidas a SPARTAN said one day to king Agesilaus, comming home sore hurt frō BOEOTIA: surely the THEBANS haue giuen you a worthy reward, for teaching thē to be soldiers against their wils. But to say truly, Agesilaus was not their maister to teach thē to make wars, but they were the good & wise leaders of the THEBANS, who like good woodmē in chosing their game, could skilfully chuse both time & place to giue their enemies battell, & make thē retire againe with safty, after they had bin fleshed, giuing thē a litle taste of the fruites & cōmodity of victory: but amōg them, Pelopidas was he that deserued most honor. For, since the first time they gaue him charge of men of war, they neuer failed, but chose him continually euery yeare, either captaine of the holy band, or gouernor of BOEOTIA so long as he liued: so that Pelopidas only did the most things in this war. The LACEDÆMONIANS were ouerthrowne in sundry iorneis, that they were distressed by the cities of PLATEES, & of THESPIES, where Phœbidas himselfe (that had before taken the castell of CADMEA) was slaine amōgst other. Another great power of theirs also was ouerthrowne nere to the city of TANAGRA, where Pathoclidas gouernor of the same, was also slaine. Now all these victories, though they much encouraged the hearts of the conquerors, and made them hardy: yet did they not therby altogether cōquer the minds of the vanquished. For the LACEDÆMONIANS were not ouercom in any pitched field, nor set battel, where they had their whole army together: but they were light rodes, and skirmishes properly laid of purpose, where sometime flying, somtime driuing them again, they bickered very oft, and put them to the worst. But the battell of TEGYRA, which was but a florish & proofe to the iourney of LEVCTRES, wan Pelopidas great honor. For he had no cōpanio to challenge any part of his glory and victory, neither did he leaue his enemies any lawful excuse, to shadow or couer their ouerthrow. For he spied al occasion he might possible, how to take the city of ORCHOMENE, that tooke part with the LACEDÆMONIANS, & had receiued two ensignes of footemen of theirs to keepe it. Pelopidas being aduertised one day, that the garrison of ORCHOMENE was gone abroad to make a rode into the country of the LOCRIANS hoping he should find ORCHOMENE without garrisō: he marched thither with his holy band, and certaine number of horsemen. But when he drew nere the city, he had intelligence there was another garrison comming from SPARTA, to supply the place of the garrison that was abroad: whereupon he returned backe againe by the city of TEGYRA, for hee could haue passed no other way, but to haue turned downe by the foote of the mountaine. The victory of the Thebans against the Lacedæmonians.

Melas fl. that lay betweene both, was drowned with the ouerflowing of the riuer of MELAS, which from his very head carieth euer such breadth with it, as it maketh the marishes nauigable, it is vnpassable for any shallow it hath. Not farre from these marishes, standeth the temple Apollo TEGYRIAN, where was an oracle in old time, but left off at this day; and had no long continuance, but onely vntill the time of the warres of the MEDES, when Esbrus was maister, and chiefe priest there. And some hold opinion, that Apollo was borne there, for they call the next mountaine to it, DELOS, at the foote whereof the marishes of the riuer MELAS do end, and behind the temple are two goodly springs, from whence commeth abundance of good sweete water: whereof the one of them is called to this day the Palme, and the other the Oliue. And some say also, that the goddesse Latona was not brought to bed betweene two trees, but betweene these two springes. For mount PTOVM is hard by it, from whence the wild bore came of a sodaine that flighted her. And the tale that is told of the serpent Python, and of the giant Tityus, doe both confirme it, that Apollo was borne in the same place. I passe ouer many other coniectures confirming the same, for that we doe not beleeue in our countrie that Apollo is among the number of those, who from mortall men haue bene translated to immortall goddes, as are Hercules and Bacchus, that through the excellencie of their vertue, did put off mortalitie, and tooke immortalitie vpon them: but wee may take him for one of those that neuer had beginning nor generation, at the least if those things be to be credited, which so many graue and auntient writers haue left in writing touching so great and holy things. The THEBANS returning back from ORCHOMENE, and the LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side returning also frō LOCRIDE, both at one time, fortuned both armies to meete about the city of TEGYRA. Now, so soone as the THEBANS had discouered the LACEDÆMONIANS passing the straite, one of them ran sodainly to Pelopidas, and tolde him: Sir, we are fallen into the hands of the LACEDÆMONIANS. Nay, are not they rather fallen into ours, aunswered Pelopidas againe? with these words, he commanded his horsemen that were in the rereward, to come before, and set vpon them: and himselfe in the meane time put his footemen immediatly into a prety squadron close together, being in all, not aboue three hundred men, hoping when he should come to giue charge with his battell, he should make a lane through the enemies, though they were the greater number. For the LACEDÆMONIANS deuided themselues in two companies, and euery company, as Ephorus writeth, had fiue hundred men: and as Callistenes said, seauen hundred. Polybius, diuers other authors say, they were nine hundred men. So Theopompus and Gorgoleon, Captaines of the LACEDÆMONIANS, lustily matched against the THEBANS: and it fell so, that the first charge was giuen, where the chiefetaines or generalles were of either side with great furie on either part, so as both the generals of the LACEDÆMONIANS which set vpon Pelopidas together, were slaine. They being slaine, and all that were about them being either hurt or killed in the field: the rest of the army were so amased, that they deuided two, and made a lane on either side, for the THEBANS to passe through them if they would. But whē they saw Pelopidas ment not to take the passage they offered him, & that he came still with his men to set vpon those that were yet in battell ray, and slue all them that stood before him: then they turned taile, and tooke them to their legges. Howbeit the THEBANS not chase them farre, fearing the ORCHOMENIANS who were not farre from them, and a new garrison besides, that were come from LACEDÆMON not long before. And this was because they were contente that they had ouercommed them by force, and had passed through their army in despite of them, and broken and ouerthrowen thē. So when he had set vp many of triumphe, and spoiled their slaine enemies, they returned home againe, glad men for they obtained victory. For in all the warres the LACEDÆMONIANS euer made, aswell with the GRECIANS as with the barbarous people also, there was neuer chronicle mentioned at any time, that their enemies being so fewe, did ouercome them that were so many, nor that were ouercome also by any number equall in battell. Whereupon they grew so corageous and terrible, that no man durst once abide them: for their onely fame did so terrifie their enemies that came to fight against them, that they thought with no equall force to be able to performe as much as they had done. But this battell of TEGYRA was the first that made ore diſhonorable reproch, then honorable daunger. Theſe are the people moſt to be feared, The firſt inſtitution of the holy band. nd are moſt terrible alſo to their enemies. And for the holy band we mentioned before, it is id, Gorgidas was the firſt erector of the ſame. They were three hundred choſen men enter-ined by the ſtate, and they alwaies kept within the caſtle of CADMEA, and the band was cald the townes band: for at that time, and ſpecially in that part of GREECE, they called the ca-les and great holdes in cities, the townes. Other ſay it was a band of footemen that were in ue one with an other. And therefore Pammenes pleaſant wordes are noted, ſaying, that eſtor could no skill to ſet an armie in battell raye, ſeeing he gaue the GRÆCIANS counſell, the Iliades of Homer, that they ſhould ſet them in battell ray, euerie countrie and tribe by emſelues:

That by affections force, and linkes of kindly loue:

anger, men commonly doe litle regard their countrie men, or ſuch as are of their tribe. But en that do loue one another, can neuer be broken nor ouercome: for the paſsion of loue at entertaineth each others affection, for affection ſake, doth keepe them from forſaking ne another. And thoſe that are beloued, being aſhamed to doo any vile or diſhoneſt thing efore thoſe that loue them, for very loue will ſticke one by another to the death. And ſure e reaſon is good, if it bee true that louers do in deed more regarde them they loue, ough they be abſent: then other that be preſent. As appeareth by the example of him, Hercules & Iolaus loue.
at being ſtriken downe to the ground, his enemie lifting vp his ſworde to kill him, he pray-him he would giue him his deaths wound before, leaſt his friend that loued him, ſeeing wound on his back, ſhould be aſhamed of him. It is reported alſo, that Iolaus being beloed of Hercules, did helpe and accompanie him in all his labours and quarrels. Wherupon riſtotle writeth, that vnto his time, ſuch as loued hartily together, became ſworne brethren ne to another, vpon Iolaus tombe. And therefore me thinkes it is likely, that this bande was Platoes ſaying of a louer.
ſt called the holy bande, by the ſelfe ſame reaſon that Plato calleth a louer, a diuine friend y gods appointment. It is written alſo, that this bande was neuer broken, nor ouerthrowne fore the battel of CHÆRONEA: After that battell, Philip taking view of the ſlaine bodies, eſtayed in that place where the foure hundred men of that band lay all dead on the ground, e hatde by another, and all of them ſlaine and thruſt through with pikes on their breſts, hereat he wondered much: and being tolde him that it was the louers band, he fell a wee-ng for pitie, ſaying. Wo bee to them that thinke theſe men did, or ſuffered any euill or ſhoneſt thing. And to be ſhort, the misfortune of Laius, that was ſlaine by his owne bro-er Oedipus, was not the firſt originall cauſe of this cuſtome, that the THEBANS begannе to in loue one with an other as the Poets write: but they were their firſt lawmakers, who peruing them to be a ſtoute and fierce nation of nature, they ſought euen from their youth to ake them gentle and ciuill, and therefore in all their actions both of ſport and earneſt, they ntinually acquainted them with playing of the flute, being highly eſteemed of them in thoſe yes. They brought in the vſe alſo to make loue, in the middeſt of all their youthfull ſports The Goddeſſe Harmonia.
d exerciſes of their bodies, to frame the young mens manners, and to bring them to a cil life. And therefore they had reaſon that gaue the goddeſſe HARMONIA to the THEBANS, r defender and patroneſſe of their city, who was begotten (as they ſay) betweene Mars and nus. For that giueth vs to vnderſtand, that where force and warlike corage is royned with ace, to winne and perſwade: all thinges by this vnion and accord are brought to a good , profitable, and moſt perfect gouernment. Now, to returne againe to the matter of this ly bande of the THEBANS. Gorgidas deuiding it in the former rankes, and placing it an ngeſt the front of the battell of the footemen, it did not appeare what they were able to e of them ſelues, for that he brought them not all into one body: ſo as thereby they might see what seruice the whole companie could doe being together, considering that it was diuided and mingled amongest many other, that were a great deale of lesse value then themselues. But Pelopidas that had made good proofe of their valiantnesse before, when they fought about him of themselues, without others by them, at TEGYRA: would neuer after deuide nor separate them one from the other, but keeping them together as one entire bodie that had all his members, he would alwaies beginne with them to giue a charge in his most daungerous battels. For, as we see in running of couches at games, that horses being tyed all together in front, do runne faster and stronger then they doe when they are lose, and put to it alone: so not for that they being many together doe breake through the aire better, but for that the contention and enuie betweene them to outrunne one another doth indeede set their hearts and stomackes on fire. Euen so he thought, that valiant men giuing one another a desire and enuie to doe well, should haue the more courage, and would be of greater force, when they fought one in anothers sight. But the LACEDÆMONIANS afterwardes being at peace and league with all the other GRECIANS, proclaimed open warres against the THEBANS only: and king Cleombrotus went to inuade them with an armie of tenne thousand footemen and a thousand horsemen. Whereupon the THEBANS were not only in the like danger that stood in before to loose their libertie, but the LACEDÆMONIANS did openly threaten that they would vtterly destroy thē for euer: so that all the country of BOEOTIA stood in greater fear then euer they did before. And one day as Pelopidas went out of his house to go to the warres his wife bringing him out of the doores to take her leaue of him, weeping, she prayed him hartely to looke well to himselfe. But he aunswered her againe: my good wife, it is for pri-uate souldiers to be carefull of themselues, but not for captaines; for they must haue an eye saue others liues. And when he came to the campe, he found the captaines and the Lieunants of the armie, in sundrie opinions: and he was the first that agreed with Epaminon- opinion, who thought it best they should giue battell to the enemies. Pelopidas at that was neither gouernor of BOEOTIA, nor generall of the armie, but onely captaine of the band: notwithstanding they had great affiance in him, and gaue him great authority in sell concerning their affaires: such as became a man that had made so good testimonie naturall loue and affection to his countrie, as he had done. Now, being determined in sell that they should giue the enemie battell, they all mustred together in the valley of Leu-TRES, where he had a vision in his dreame, that troubled him very much. In that valley are the tombes of the daughters of one Scedasus, which by reason of the place, they call LEVCTRIDES, for that they were buried there, after they had bene defiled and rauished certaine guestes of the SPARTANS that laye in their house, trauailing that way. This being so horrible and wicked, the poore father of these defiled virgines, could neither iustice, nor reuenge of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and therefore after he had bande and sed the LACEDÆMONIANS with most horrible and execrable railings and curses as might possible, he killed himselfe vpon the graues of his daughters. The LACEDÆMONIANS many sundry oracles, prophesies and signes of the goddes to warne them, to take heede wrath of the LEVCTRIDES: howbeit euery man vnderstoode not the signification of prophecy, but were deceiued by the equiuocation of the name. For there was a little in the countrey of LACONIA, standing vpon the sea, called LEVCTRVM: and in ARCA also by the city of MEGALIPOLIS, there was another towne called by the same name. misfortune chaunced long before the battell of LEVCTRES: but then Pelopidas dreaming his tent, thought he saw in a vision the daughters of Scedasus weeping about their graues cursing the LACEDÆMONIANS: and that hee saw their father also, commaunding him sacrifice a red mayden to his daughters, if they would obtaine the victory. This com-dement at the first, seemed very cruell and wicked: whereupon when he rose, hee wen the Prognosticators and generalles of the army, and tolde them his dreame. So, some them sayed, this was no matter to be lightly passed ouer, but to be considered of; alle many examples in the like cases. As of Menecius the sonne of Creon in olde time, and of Caria the daughter of Hercules. And yet of later memory, the wife Pheraecydes, whom maundement of an oracle. And Leonidas, who following a prophecie of the goddes, did as it were sacrifice himselfe, for the safetie of GREECE. And furthermore, the young boyes which Themistocles did sacrifice to Bacchus Omestes (to say, eating raw flesh) before the battell of Salamina. And all these sacrifices were acceptable to the goddes, as the victories following did plainely shew it. In contrarie manner also king Agesilaus, comming from those very places, from whence king Agamemnon came in the time of the wars of TROIA, and going also against the same enemies: dreamed one night in the citie of AVLIDE, he saw the goddesse Diana, asking him his daughter for sacrifice. But he tenderly louing her, would by no meanes performe it: and thereupon was compelled to breake off his iourney before he had executed his enterprise, and departed with small honour. Other to the contrarie stoode to it stoutly, and saide it was not to be done. For, so cruell, abominable, and brutish a sacrifice, could not be acceptable to any of the goddes, nor to any god, better or mightier then ours: considering that they be no impressions in the aire, nor giants that rule the world, but the one onely mightie and eternall God, father of gods and men. And to beleeue that either goddes or demy gods doe delight in murder, or sheadding of mans bloud, it is a meere mockerie and folly. But admit it were so, they were no more to be regarded therein, then those that haue no power at all: for it is a manifest token of a wicked spirite, when they haue such damnable and horrible desires in them, and specially if they abide still with them. Now the generals and heades of the army of the THEBANS being of sundry opinions, and Pelopidas being more afraide then before, by reason of their disagreement: a young mare colte, or fillie, breaking by chance from other mares running and flinging through the campe, came to stay right against them. Then euery man began to looke vpon her, and to marke what a faire fillie it was, and red coloured euery where, and what a pride she tooke with her selfe to heare her owne neyghing. Theocritus then the soothsaier being amongst them, did behold her, and knew straight what the fillie ment, and so cryed out forthwith: O happie Pelopidas, loe here is the sacrifice thou lookest for, seeke no other virgine for thy sacrifice, but take this that God himselfe doth send thee. When Theocritus had said so, they tooke the fillie, and laide her vpon the tombe of Scedasus daughters, and put garlands of flowers about her, as they handled other sacrifices: and then after their prayers made to the gods, they did sacrifice her with great ioy, and tolde Pelopidas vision in his dreame the night before through all the campe, and the sacrifice they had made also according to the signification thereof. Moreouer, when they came to ioyne battell, Epaminondas being generall, drew all his armie on the left hand, because he would bring the right wing of the enemies armie (where they had placed the naturall SPARTANS) further from the other GRÆCIANS their friends and allyes, that were set in the other wing of their battell: that he comming with his whole power together to giue a charge vppon Cleombrotus their king (being in a corner by himselfe) might be distressed or ouerthrowne. The enemies finding Pelopidas intent, beganne to chaunge their order, and hauing men enowe, ment to thruste out their right wing at length to compasse in Epaminondas. But Pelopidas in the meane time sodainely preuented them, and running with great fury with his squadron of three hundred men, hee set vppon Cleombrotus before he could disorder his men to put forth the right wing, and ioyne them together againe. And so hee found the LACEDÆMONIANS not yet setled in their rankes, and brake them in this disorder, thrusting one in others place to put them selues againe in order: notwithstanding the LACEDÆMONIANS of all other men were the onely captaines and most expert souldiers in marshall discipline, men so trained and practised, that no sodaine altering, of forme or order in their rankes, could either trouble or disorder them. For they were men so trained, that they could turne and or side vpon any sodaine occasion offered, and could fight and order them selues in battell euery way alike. So Epaminondas going to giue the onset vpon them alone, with the whole force of his battell together, not tarrying for others: and Pelopidas also with an incredible courage and readinesse, presenting himselfe in battell before them, did put them in such a terrible feare, that they cleane forgot their skill in fighting, and their wonted courage failed them. For they cowardly turned their backes, and there were moe LACEDÆMONIANS slaine that daie, then euer were before in any former battell. Pelopidas therefore, being neither gouernour of BOEOTIA, nor generall of all the armie, but onely captaine of the band: did notwithstanding win as much honor & glorie of this victorie, as Epaminondas was gouernor of BOEOTIA, and generall of all the armie. Indeede afterwards they were gouernors of BOEOTIA together, when they inuaded the cõtry of PELOPONNESVS: they made most part of the cities & people rebell against the LACEDÆMONIANS, and their part. As the ELIANS, the ARGIVES, and all ARCADIA, and the best part of LACONIA selfe, notwithstanding it was in the heart of winter, and in the shortest daies of the yeare, towardes the latter end also of the last moneth of their yeares authoritie and rule, hauing many daies to continue in office, being forced to leaue their authoritie, vpon paine of death they did refuse, vnto other officers new chosen, the beginning of the next moneth following. Whereupon their other companions, and gouernors also of the country of BOEOTIA, for feare to incurre the daunger of the law, as also to auoide the trouble to lie in campe in that pest of winter: they did vrge & perswade them to bring the armie backe againe into their countiy. But Pelopidas was the first that yeelded to Epaminondas opinion, & wanne the THEBANS also to consent vnto it, to be contented to be led by them, to giue assault to the selfe of SPARTA. So, through their perswasion they passed ouer the riuer of EVROTAS, tooke many litle townes of the LACEDÆMONIANS, & wasted and destroied all the cou to the sea side, leading vnder their ensignes an armie of threescore and ten thousand fig men, and all GRÆCIANS, the THEBANS not making vp the twelfth part of them. Now honour and great reputation of these two persons, Epaminondas and Pelopidas, brought friends and confederates, that they followed them, without any resolution of counsell blike order, and neuer opened their mouthes against them, but willingly marched vnder conduction. And in my opinion, truely me thinkes it is the first and chiefest point in the of nature, that he that is weake, not able to defend himselfe, should leane to one that is and able to defend both. Euen much like to fresh water souldiers, and rawe sea men, that at sea in calme weather, and in safe harbor, are as lustie and brag with the maisters and swaines as may be: and let a little storme of weather come vpon them sodainely, and that be in any danger, then they looke on the maisters, hoping for no life but at their hands. euen in like maner the ELIANS and ARGIVES, who though in all assemblies of counsell would euer iarre and striue with the THEBANS, for honor and superioritie in the armie when any battell came to be fought, wherein they saw there was danger, then their pe braueric was gone, and they were glad to obey their generals commaundement. I iourney they brought all the cities of the prouince of ARCADIA to bee in league them, and tooke all the countrie of MESSENIA from the LACEDÆMONIANS, which peaceably enioyed: and called home againe all the auncient inhabitants of the same, restored them to their countrie, and replenished the citie of ITHOME: Then returning wards into their country by the city of CENCHREES, they ouerthrew the ATHENIA come to trouble them, in entring into the straight of PELOPONNESVS, supposing to stopped their passage. Thus was the valiantnes of these two worthy men greatly comm and honored of euery body, for so many notable exploites and victories as they had wo their maruellous good successe, greatly wondred at. But as their glory and renowne inc abroad, so did their countrey mens malice and enuy encrease against them at home: w prepared such a welcome home for them, as was too bad and vile for so honorable se they had done. For Epaminondas and Pelopidas both at their returne, were accused of m For there was a speciall law at THEBES, that commanded all such as should happen to uernors of BOEOTIA, to resigne their office immediatly to the new officers elect, at the ning of the first moneth of the yeare, which in BOEOTIA they call BOVCATION: & th kept it foure whole moneths aboue their tearme appointed, in which time they had d that we haue spoke of before, as wel in the prouince of MESSENIA & of ARCADIA, a the country of LACONIA. Pelopidas was the first of the two that was called in by proc fore he stood in the greater danger: howbeit in the end, they were both discharged again for Epaminondas, he tooke his accusatiõ & the attempt of his enemies (whereby they sou haue cast them both away) quietly enough: Iudging, that patience to those that deale in and gouernment, is a great shewe of force & magnanimitie, But Pelopidas being of a hotter nature, and more chollericke, and set on beside by some of his friends, did take this occasion to be reuenged. Meneclidas the orator was one of those that came into Charons house with Pelopida, and Melon, but notwithstanding the THEBANS did nothing honour him, as they did the rest. He taking this ill at their hands, being maruellous eloquent of speach, but vitiously giuen otherwayes, and a man of a vile and mischieuous nature: did fondly abuse his eloquence, falsely accusing those that were his betters, in honesty and credit. And not being contented with this first accusation, he practised so commonly, that he put Epaminondas one yeare from being gouernor of BOEOTIA, which he sued for: and moreouer he was euer against him in all matters of state he tooke in hand. But he could neuer bring Pelopidas out of fauour with the people: and therefore he sought to make bate betwixt him and Charon. For it is the common tricke of all spightfull persons, when they cannot be thought so honest men as those whom they enuie: to go about to proue that they are not so honest and meete men, as those whom they preferre and commend. So, in all his orations he made to the people, he continually extolled and commended Charons noble actes and victories, and specially that victory aboue other, which the THEBANS won before the iorney of LEVCTRES, in a skirmish of horsmen, that was before the city of PLATEES, he hauing charge of the same: of the which he would leaue this memory. Androcides a CYZICENIAN & painter, was at a price with the THEBANS to paynte them some other battell in a table, and he did drawe this worke in the cittie selfe of THEBES but as he was in hand withall, the rebellion of the THEBANS fell out against the LACEDÆMONIANS, and waire followed on the necke of that, whereupon the painter forsooke THEBES, leauing his worke in a manner done and perfect. The THEBANS kept this table by them, and this Meneclidas moued the people they would hang it vp in some temple or publicke place with an inscription vpon it, saying thus: This was Charons victorie of purpose to deface and obscure the glorie of Pelopidas & of Epaminondas. Too vaine & fond was his ambition, to set before so many noble battells and victories, one simple ouerthowe of Charon, in the which Gerandas, one of the meanest gentlemen of all SPARTA was slaine, and forty other with him: & this was all he did. Pelopidas misliked Meneclidas motiõ, maintaining that it was directly against the lawes of THEBES, which did expresly forbid that no priuate person should be honored with the title of common victorie, but willed the glory thereof should be attributed to al the the people generally. Indeed Pelopidas in al his orations did greatly praise & commend Charon, notwithstanding he made open proofe, how Meneclidas was an enuious and spitefull detractor, & a naughty wicked man, often times asking the THEBANS, if they themselues were worthy of no honor? so as in the end he caused Meneclidas to be condemned in a great summe of money. But he finding himselfe vnable to pay it, being so great a summe practised afterwardes to alter the whole state and gouernment. I thought good to dilate this at large because me thinkes it doth somewhat declare Pelopidas nature, and mãners, what they were. Now about that time Alexander, the tyrant of PHERES, was at open warres with many people of THESSALIE, and did vse all policie he could, to bring them all to his obedience. Whereupõ the free cities sent their Ambassadours vnto THEBES, to pray them to send them a captaine with an army to aide them. Then Pelopidas seeing Epaminondas occupied about the warres of PELOPONNESVS, did offer himselfe to the THESSALIAN Ambassadors, being loth to drowne his experience and sufficiencie in warres, with vnprofitable and tedious idlenes, knowing that in those parts where Epaminondas lay, there needed no other captaine. Now when he came with his army into THESSALIE, the cittie of LARISSA yeelded presently vnto him: where the tirant Alexander came to meet with him, and to pray him to treate a peace betwixt him and the THESSALIANS. Pelopidas attẽpted to bring it to passe, seeking in stead of tyrant to make him a gentle, iust, & lawfull gouernor of THESSALIE. But when he sawe no perswasions could take place with the tyrant, and that he grew more stubborne & vntractable, and woulde not heare reason: and moreouer that he heard many grieuous complaints of his great cruelties, and how they accused him to be a maruellous dissolute and vnruly person in all his doinges, and extreamely couetous besides: then he beganne to speake roundly to him, and to handle him roughly. But the tyrant thereupon stole away secretly from him, and fled with his gard and ſouldiers about him. So Pelopidas leauing the THESSALIANS out of all feare and daunger of the tyrant, and furthermore in good peace and amitie one with the other, he went into MACEDON: where Ptolomy made war at that time with Alexander king of MACEDON, they both hauing ſent for him to heare and determine the quarrell twixt them, and alſo to helpe him that had the right, againſt him that did the wrong. So when he came thither, he pacified them both, and reſtored the bamſhed men of either ſide to their landes and goods againe. For aſſurance of the peace, he tooke the kings brother in hoſtage, whoſe name was Philip, and thirty other children of the nobleſt mens ſonnes of MACEDON, whom he brought away with him to THEBES, to let the GRECIANS ſee, that the reputation of the THEBANS power ſtretched far, and the renowne alſo of their manner of gouernment and iuſtice. It is the ſame Philip, that made warre afterwardes with the GRECIANS, to take their libertie frō them: howbeit being but a boy at that time, he was brought vp at THEBES in Pammenes houſe. And this is the cauſe, why ſome thought Philip did follow Epaminondas manner: and it might be peraduenture, he did learne of him to be quicke and ready in the warres, which indeede was but a peece of Epaminondas vertue. But as to the continencie, iuſtice, magnanimitie, and clemencie, which were the ſpeciall points, that made Epaminondas of great fame: Philip could neither by nature, education, nor ſtudie euer attaine vnto. The THESSALIANS hauing ſent afterwards to THEBES, to complaine of Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, that did againe moleſt and trouble the free citties of THESSALIE: Pelopidas was ſent thither Ambaſſador with Iſmenias, carying no power with him frō THEBES, litle thinking he ſhould haue needed to haue made warres: wherupon he was compelled to take men of the countrie ſelfe, vpon the inſtant neceſſitie offered. At the very ſame time alſo, all MACEDON was vp in armes. For Ptolomy had ſlaine the king, and vſurped the kingdom, and the ſeruants and frends of the dead king called vpon Pelopidas for ayde: who deſiring to come euen vpon the fact, and hauing brought no men of war out of his own countrie with him, did preſently leauie certaine men where he was, and ſo marched forward with them againſt Ptolomy. But Ptolomy when both their powers met, did corrupt the ſouldiers Pelopidas had brought with money, to take his part. But notwithſtanding this pollicie he had practiſed, yet he was afraid of the name only, and greatnes of Pelopidas reputation: wherefore he went vnto Pelopidas as to a better man then himſelfe, and making maruellous much of him, and intreating of him, made promiſe, and bound it by oth, that he would keepe the realme for the brethren of the dead king, and that he would take all thoſe for his friends or enemies, whom the THEBANS did either loue or hate. And for aſſurance of his promiſe, he gaue him his ſonne Philoxenus hoſtage, and fifty other of his friends, all the which Pelopidas ſent vnto THEBES. But in the meane time, being maruellouſly offended with the treaſon of the ſouldiers againſt him, and vnderſtanding that the moſt part of their goodes, their wiues and children, were in the citie of PHARSALE, he thought if he could winne that, it were a maruellous good way for him to be reuenged of the treachery of the ſouldiers againſt him: wherupon he leauied certaine THESSALIANS, & went to that cittie. Pilopidas was no ſooner come thither, but Alexander the tyrant arriued alſo with his armie. Pelopidas ſuppoſing he had come to iuſtifie himſelfe, clearing the complaints of the THESSALIANS made againſt him: wēt to him, though he knew him to be a very wicked man, and one that delited in murder and ſheading of blood. Neuertheles, he hoped he durſt not haue attempted any thing againſt him, for the authority and ſeignories of THEBES, by whom be was ſent thither, as alſo for his own reputation. But the tyrant kept him ſlenderly accompanied, and without traine of ſouldiers: tooke him priſoner, and was maſter of the cittie of PHARSALE at that preſent time. But this act of his put his ſubiects in a great feare, who ſeeing him commit ſo ſhamefull a deed againſt all equity, did thinke ſtraight he meant to ſpare no man, but would vſe men, and all thinges elſe that came in his handes, like a deſperate man, & one that reckoned himſelfe caſt away. But whē the THEBANS vnderſtood this newes, they were maruellous ſorie, and ſtraight ſent an army thither, appointing other Captaines then Epaminondas, becauſe then they had ſome miſliking of him. Alexander the tyrant hauing brought Pelopidas in the meane time to PHERES, did ſuffer any man that would at the firſt to come and ſee him, and ſpeake with him: ſuppoſing his impriſonment had killed his hart, had made him very humble. But when he was tolde the contrary, how Pelopidas did comfort the cittizens of PHERAS, and willed them to be of good cheere, telling them the hower was now come that the tyrant should smart for all the mischiefes he had done: and that he sent him word to his face, he had no reason to hang and put his poore cittizens daily to death as he did, with sundry kindes of cruell torments, who had in nothing offended him, & did let him alone, knowing that if euer he got out of his hands, he would be reuenged of him. The tyrant wondering at this great stomacke of his, and at his marueilous constancie fearing nothing: asked what he ment, to long for hasty death? Pelopidas bein, tolde what he sayed, answered him againe: Marry, sayed he, because thou shouldest dye the sooner, being more odious to the gods and men, then yet thou art. After this answer, the tyrant would neuer suffer any man to come and speake with him againe. But Thebe, that was the daughter of the tyrant Iason deceased, and wife at that time of Alexander the tyrant, hearing report of Pelopidas noble minde and courage by his keepers: she had a marueilous desire to see him, and to speake with him. But when shee came to see him, like a woman she could not at the first discerne the greatnesse of his noble hart, and excellent hidden vertue, finding him in such miserie: yet coniecturing by exterior shewe, noting his simple apparell, his haires and beard growen very long, and how poorely he was serued, and worse enterteined: she thought with her selfe his case was to be pitied, and that he was in no state meete for the glory of his name, wherewith she fell a weeping for compassion. Pelopidas that knew not what shee was, beganne to muse at the first: but when it was tolde him she was Iasons daughter, then he courteously saluted her for her father Iasons sake, who while he liued was his very good friend. So Thebe sayed vnto him: my Lord Pelopidas, I pitty thy poore Lady and wife. Truly so do I pitty thee, quoth Pelopidas againe to her: that thou being no prisoner, canst abide such a wicked Alexander. This answer tickled Thebe at the hart, who with great impatience did beare the cruelty, violēce, and villany of the tyrant her husband: that besides all other infamous actes of his detestable life, committed Sodomy with her yongest brother. So she oft visiting Pelopidas, and boldly making her mone to him, telling him closely all the iniuries her husband offred her: through Pelopidas talke with her, by litle and litle she grewe to abhorre him, and to conceiue a hate in hart against him, desiring reuenge on him. But now the captaines of the THEBANS that were sent to deliuer Pelopidas, being entred into THESSALIE with their armie: (whether it was through defaulte of ignorance, or their mishap) they returned home with shame, and did nothing. Whereupon the THEBANS at their returne home condemned them euery man in the summe of ten thousand Drachmes, and sent Epaminondas thither againe with another armie: at whose comming, all THESSALIE rose incontinently, for the reputation of so great a captaine. And his fortune was so good, that he had in a manner vtterly ouerthrowen all the whole state of the tyrant: his friends and captaines were so much afrayde, and his subiectes on the other side so well disposed to rebell, and marueilous glad for the hope they had, quickely to see the tyrant haue his deserued hyer, for all his former wicked deedes he had committed. Notwithstanding, Epaminondas preferring the deliuery and safety of Pelopidas, before the consideratiō of his own honour and glory, and fearing least Alexander seeing himselfe in danger to be turned out of al he had, falling into despayre like a bedlem beast, would bend all his desperation and furie against Pelopidas: he drewe these wartes out in length, compassing him round about, but not directely letting vpon him with colour to prepare his way the better by delaying stil, thereby to soften the cruell mind of this tyrant, going on in this gentle sort, and partly to cut his comb and extreame pride, but specially to preserue Pelopidas, from the daunger and crueltie of his beastly rage. For he knew right well he was a cruell man, and one that neither regarded reason, nor iustice in any sorte, considering howe he made some man to be buried aliue, and others to be put in the skins of beares and wilde bores, and then to set hounds vpō them to teare them in peeces, or els himselfe for his pastime would kill them, with shooting or throwing of dartes at them. And in the cities of MELIBEA and of SCOTVSA, both of them being in league and friendshippe with him, he spying a time one day whē the cittizens were assembled to counsell together, sodainly compassed them in with his garde and souldiers, and put them euery one to the sword, euen to the litle children. And he consecrated the dart also wherewith

he had slaine his owne vncle Polyphron, and hauing put garlands vpon it, he did sacrifice to it as to a god, and called it TYCHON, as one would say, happy killer. And another time being in a Theater, where the tragedy of Troades of Euripides was played, he went out of the Theater, and sent word to the players notwithstanding, that they should goe on with their play as if he had bene still among them: saying that he came not away for any misliking he had of them or of the play, but because he was ashamed his people should see him weepe, to see the miseries of Hecuba and Andromacha played, and that they neuer saw him pitty the death of one man, of so many of his cittizens as he had caused to be slaine. The gilty conscience therefore of this cruel and heathen tyrant, did make him tremble at the only name and reputation of Epaminondas: and as the common prouerbe sayeth:

He let his wings downe fall, not much vnlike the cocke, which doth refuse the pit preparde, and list not bide the shocke.

So he sent straight vnto Epaminondas to excuse himselfe. But Epaminondas would in no wise suffer the THEBANS, through his meanes, to make league with such an hellhound: and so he yeelded to abstinence of armes for thirty daies, vpon delinery of Pelopidas & Ismenias into his hands, with whō he straight returned vnto THEBES. Now the THEBANS being aduertised that the LACEDÆMONIANS & the ATHENIANS, did send Ambassadors to Artaxerxes mighty king of PERSIA, to make league with him: they sent to him Pelopidas for them also, being wisely considered of them to send a man of such fame and reputation. For Pelopidas passing first through countries subiect to the king of PERSIA, his fame was such where he came that the peoples talke was onely of him. For the report of the famous battells he had won of the LACEDÆMONIANS, was not only caried into the next regions and countries of Asia, but since the first newes of the iorney of LEVCTRES was brought thither, Pelopidas had after that wonne victorie vpon victorie, his estimation grewe so great, as it was blowen broad through the worlde, euen to the highest and furthest partes of the East countries. And when he came to the king of PERSIA'S court, the princes, great Lordes, and captaines of PERSIA that saw him, had him in great admiration, saying: loe this is he that conquered the LACEDÆMONIANS, and tooke all their seignorie and authority from them, both by sea and by land, and draue the SPARTANS beyond the riuer of EVROTAS, and from mount TAYGETVM, who not long before made warres with the great King of PERSIA, being ledde by their king Agesilaus, euen in the middest of ASIA, for the realmes of SVSE, and of ECBATANE. So king Artaxerxes selfe was very glad of his comming, and praised him aboue them all, and made his estimation greater then it was before, by his great and honorable entertainment of him, meaning thereby to returne the honour to himselfe againe: because menne should thinke that the most famous men of the worlde came to honour him, and to see his court, esteeming both him, and his greatnesse, the onely happinesse of the world. But when they had seene his face, and heard him speake, and perceiued that his wordes were much grauer than the ATHENIANS, and plainer then the LACEDÆMONIANS: he then was further in loue with him thē before, and without disguising, he did honor and fauor him aboue all the other ambassadors, who found that he made more estimation of him, then of the all. Notwithstanding he seemed to beare greater good will vnto Antalcidas LACEDÆMONIAN, thē to any other of the GRECIANS: for that one day being at the table, he tooke a garland of flowers from his owne head, and washed it in perfuming water, and sent it vnto him. Indeed he did honor Pelopidas with that open familiaritie, yet did he send him the goodliest and richest presents he could deuise, & granted him besides all his requestes he made vnto him: which were, that the people of GRECE should be free: that the city & countrie of MESSINA, should be restituted againe: & that the citizens of THEBES by their successors should be take, as ancient friends & allyes of the kings of PERSIA. So when he had receiued these answers, he returned home again, & would by no meanes accept any of the great presents the king had offred him: but caused the other ambassadours of the GRECIANS to be so ill welcome home to their cities. For among other, Timagoras was accused to the ATHENIANS, & condemned to die, and executed: which if they did in respect of the great presents he had taken of the king, I think they had reason, & it was worthily done of thē. For he tooke not only gold & siluer enough as much as they would giue him: but receiued a very rich bed alſo, & PERSIAN chamberlains to make and dreſſe it vp, as if no GRECIAN ſeruantes of his could haue ſerued that turne. Moreouer he receiued foureſcore milch kine to the paile, and neate heardes to keepe them, hauing neede of cowes milke belike, to heale a diſeaſe that fell vpon him: and would needes be caried in a litter vpon mens armes from the kings court, vnto the MEDITERRANIAN ſea, the king rewarding them for their paines that caried him, with foure talents. Yet it ſeemeth the gifts he tooke did not offend the ATHENIANS ſo much, conſidering that Epieraties (a drudge or tanckerd bearer) did not onely confeſſe before the people, howe he had taken gifres of the king of PERSIA: but ſaied furthermore, that he would haue a law made, that as they did yerely choole nine officers to rule the whole city: ſo that they would choose nine of the pooreſt and meaneſt cittizens, and ſend them Ambaſſadors vnto the king of PERSIA, that they might returne home rich men with gifres. The people laughed to heare him, but yet were they very angry the THEBANS had obtained all that they had demaunded: not conſidering that Pelopidas eſtimation and worthineſſe did more preuaile, and take better effect, then all the orations the other could make, and ſpecially to a Prince that ſought alwaies to entertaine thoſe GRECIANS, which were of greateſt force & power in the warres. This Ambaſſade did greatly increaſe euery mans loue and good will vnto Pelopidas, becauſe of the repleniſhing againe of MESSINA with inhabitants, and infranchesing and ſetting at liberty of all the other GRECIANS. But the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, returning again to his old accuſtomed cruelty, and hauing deſtroied many cities of THESSALIE, & placed his garriſons through all the country of the PHTHIOTES, ACHAIANS, & MAGNESIANS: the cities being aduertiſed of Pelopidas returne againe to THEBES, they ſent Ambaſſadors immediatly to THEBES, to pray the to ſend the an army, & namely Pelopidas for captaine, to deliuer the from the miſerable bondage of the tyrant. The THEBANS willingly granted them, & put all things in readines very ſodainly. But Pelopidas being ready to ſet forward in his iorney, there fell a ſadain eclipſe of the ſun, ſo as at noone day it was very dark in THEBES. Pelopidas ſeing euery man afraid of this eclipſe aboue, he would not compell the people to depart with this feare, nor with ſo ill hope to hazard the life of ſeuen thouſand THEBANS, being all billed to go this iorney: but notwithſtanding, he put himſelfe alone into the THESSALIANS handes, with three hundreth horſemen of ſtraungers, that were glad to ſerue with him, with whom he toke his iorney againſt the ſoothſayers minds, and againſt the good will of all his cittizens, who thought this eclipſe did threate the death of ſome great perſon like himſelfe. But Pelopidas though he needed no ſpurre to be reuenged vpon the tyrant Alexander, being by nature hotte, and deſirous of himſelfe to reuenge the ſpite and villany he had offred him: yet he had a further hope to finde the tyrants houſe deuided againſt himſelfe, by the former talke he had with his wife Thebe, in time of his impriſonment there. Neuertheles, the fame and reputation of the iorney vndertaken, did wonderfully increaſe his noble corage, and the rather, becauſe he was deſirous (all he could) the GRECIANS ſhould ſee, that at the very ſame time when the LACEDÆMONIANS did ſend gouernors & captains to Dionyſius the tyrant of SICILE, to ſerue & aide him, & that the ATHENIANS as ſterlings took pay of the tyrant Alexander of PHERES, in whoſe honor they had ſet vp a ſtatue of braſſe in their city, as vnto their ſauior: the THEBANS only at the ſelfe ſame time tooke armes againſt the, to deliuer thoſe whom the tyrants oppreſſed, & ſought to roote out al tirannical gouernment ouer the GRECIANS. So when he came to the city of PHARSALE, and had aſſembered his army together, he wēt preſently into the field to meet with the tyrant Alexāder, perceiuing Pelopidas had very few THEBANS about him, and that he had twiſe as many moe THESSALIANS with him, then the other had: he went into the temple of THETIS, to ſacrifice with Pelopidas. There one telling Pelopidas, that Alexander was comming againſt him with a great power, Pelopidas anſwered him ſtraight, all the better, we ſhall kill the more. Now, in the middeſt of the valley, there are certaine round hils of a good prety height, which they commonly call the dogs heads: they both ſtriued which of their footemen ſhould firſt get thoſe hils. Pelopidas hauing a great number of horſemen, and good men at armes in the field, ſent them before to giue charge vpon the enemies, that preated to winne the vantage of the place: and hauing ouerthrowne them, they followed the chaſe all the valley ouer.

Pelopidas ſecond iorney againſt the tyrāt Alexander of Pheres.

The eclypſe of the ſun made the Thebans afraide.

Battell giuen by the temple of Thetis, vnto the tyrant Alexander.

But in the meane time, Alexander hauing his footemen by, marched forwardes and got hilles, because the THESSALIANS that were further off came too late: notwithstanding when they came to the hilles, they sought forcibly to clime them vp, being very high steepe. But Alexander comming down the hill, gaue charge vpon them to their disaduan and slewe the first that gaue the attempt to get vp against the hill: and the residue being hurt, retyred againe without their purpose. Pelopidas seeing that, sounded the retrea the horsemen that followed the chase, to repayre to the standards, and commanded them should set vpon the footemen of the enemies that were in battell raye: and he himselfe to helpe those that fought to winne the hilles. So he tooke his target on his arme, and sing through the rereward, he got to the formost rankes: to whom, the sight of his pe did so redouble their force and courage, that the enemies themselues thought it had be fresh supply of newe mens hartes and other bodies, then theirs with whom they had fo before, that came thus lustely to set againe vpon them. And yet they did abide two or onsettes. Howbeit in the end, perceiuing those men did still more fiercely force to vp the hill, and moreouer how their horsemen were come in from the chase: they gaue and left them the place, retyring backe by litle and litle. Then Pelopidas hauing wonne hilles, stayed on the toppe of them, viewing the armie of his enemies, which were no returned from their flying, but waued vp and down in great disorder. And there he look about, to see if he could spye out Alexander: and at the length he found him out amo others, in the right wing of his battell, setting his men againe in order and incourag them. After he had set eye on him, it was no holding of him backe, his hart forose against vpon sight of him, that giuing place to wrath, he neither regarded his person, nor the im his iorney, but running farre before his men, he cried with a loud voice to the tyrant, and lenged the combat of him. The tyrant would not abide him, nor come out to fight wit but fled, and hid himselfe amongst his souldiers. But for his souldiers, the first that thou set vpon Pelopidas, were slaine by him, and many lefte dead in the field. The residue sto stoutly to it, and close together, did passe his curaces through with their long pykes, and him into the brest. The THESSALIANS seeing him thus sore handled and distressed, fo ties sake came running from the top of those hilles, to the place where Pelopidas was, to him. But euen as they came, he fell down dead before the. Then did they together with horsmen so fiercely set vpon them, that they made the whole battell of the enemies to and following them in chase a great way from that place, they couered the vallye with bodies, for they slue aboue three thousand men. It is no maruell, if the THEBANS that wer Pelopidas death, tooke it very heauily, and lamented bitterly: calling him their father, saiuiour, and maister, as one that had taught them the worthiest things that might be le of any. But the THESSALIANS, and other friendes and confederates also of the cittie of T BES, besides their exceeding in setting out their common proclamations and edicts in pr of his memorie, & doing him all the honour that could be due to the most rare and excel person that euer was: they did yet more shew their loue and affection towards him by passing great sorrow and mourning they made for him. For it is sayed, that they that wer the battell, did not put off their armour, nor vnbridle their horses, nor woulde dresse wounds, hearing tell of his death: before they went first and saw his body not yet colde fighting, laying great heapes of the enemies spoyles about it, as if he could haue told they had done, nor before they had clipped off their own haires, and the haire of their bo in token of sorrowe. And many of them also, when they were come into their tentes pauilions, would neither haue fire, eate, nor drinke: and all in the campe were full of rowe and mourning, as if they had not wonne a notable victorie, but had beene ouer wen and made subiect by the tyraunt. Afterwardes when the newes of his death was sp through all the countrie, the Magistrates of euery cittie through which Pelopidas bodie conueyed, went to receiue it very honorablie, accompanied with all the young menne, Priestes and children, carying tokenes, and crownes of triumphe, and other ornament gold, and when his funerall day was come, and that his bodie should be caried to be bu the oldest and the noblest personnes of the THESSALIANS went vnto the THEBANS, pra prayed them that they might haue the burying of him: and one among them being the eth of the rest, spake in this manner to the THEBANS. My Lords of THEBES, our good ed friendes and confederates, we onely craue this good turne at your handes, wherein shall much honour vs, and in our great calamitie somewhat also comfort vs. For we shall more accompanie Pelopidas aliue, nor requite his honorable deserts to vs; that he shall know them. But if it please you to let vs handle his bodie with our handes, and that we burie him, and set foorth his obsequies: we will imagine then at the least that you doe like that, which we our selues doe certainely beleeue: that we THESSALIANS, not you BANS, haue receiued the greatest losse of both. For you haue lost in deede a worthie ie, and we haue not onely receiued that like losse with you, but the hope also of reco-ing of our libertie. For how dare we againe send to you for an other Captaine, when we not redeliuer you Pelopidas? The THEBANS hearing their petition, granted their desire:

In mine opinion, no funerals could be done with greater pompe and honour, then the SALIANS performed his: being men that reckon not dignitie, magnificence & pompe, consist in ornaments of luorie, nor of purple. As Philistus doth set it out, who praiseth the inone the burying of Dionysius the tyrant of SYRACVSA, which was the end of his e, as a sumptuous conclusion of a stately tragedie. And Alexander the great, at the h of Ephestion, did not onely clippe his horse haires and mules, but pluckt downe also battelments of the walles of the citie: because it should appeare, that the verie walles them did mourne for his death, shewing that deformitie in steede of their former beautie. such things are done onely by force and compulsion, vpon the Lordes commaundi-which doe but raise vp enuie against their memorie for whom they are done, and ha-of them that are against their willes constrained to doe the thing they misliked: and are proofes of honour not good will, but rather vaine shewes of barbarous pompe, and him that disposeth his authoritie and plentie of goods, in trifling toyes not to be de-

SALIANS townes hee kept by force against them, and to set the MAGNESIANS, the RIOTES, and the ACHAIANS at libertie, withdrawing his garrisons hee had placed in strong holdes: and therewithall to sweare, that from thence forth he would march vnthe THEBANS, against any enemie they should leade him, or commaund him to goe a-

THE LIFE OF Marcellus.

Marcellus lineal.

Marcellus conditions.

Marcus Claudius that was fiue times Consul at ROME, was the sonne (as they say) of another Marcus: and as Posidonius writeth, he was the first of his house surnamed Marcellus, as who would say, a marshall and warlike man by nature. For he was cunning at weapons, skilful in wars, strong & lustie of bodie, hardy, and naturally giuen to fight. Yet was he no quarreller, nor shewed his great corage, but in warres against the enemie: otherwise he was euer gentle, and faire conditioned. He loued learning, and delighted in the Greeke tongue, and much esteemed them that could speake it. For, he himselfe was so troubled in matters of state, that he could not studie and follow it, as he desired to haue done. For if God (as Homer saith) did euer make men

To vse their youth in warres, and battels fierce and fell, till crooked age came creeping on, such feates for to expell:

The Romaines troubled with warres.

They were the noblest and chiefest men of ROME at that time. For in their youth, they fought with the CARTHAGINIANS in SICILE: in their middle age, against the GAVLES, to keepe thē from the winning of all ITALIE: & againe in their old age, against Hannibal & the CARTHAGINIANS. For their age was no priuiledge for them to be dispenced with, in the seruice of their warres, as it was els for common citizens: but they were both for their nobilitie, as also for their valiantnes and experience in warres, driuen to take charge of the armies deliuered them by the Senate & people. Now for Marcellus, there was no battell could make him giue grounde, being practised in all fightes: but yet he was more valiant in priuate combate man for man, then in any other fight. Therefore he neuer refused enemie that did chalenge him, but slew all those in the field that called him to the combat. In SICILE he saued his brother Octacilius life, being ouerthrowen in a skirmish: for with his shield he couered his brothers bodie, & slew them that came to kill him. These valiant parts of him, being but a young man, were rewarded by the generals vnder whom he serued, with many crownes, and warlike honors, vsually bestowed vpon valiant souldiers. Marcellus increasing still his valiantnes and good seruice, was by the people chosen Ædilis, as of the number of those that were the worthiest men, and most honorable: and the Priests did create him Augure, which is a kinde of Priesthood at ROME, hauing authoritie by law, to consider and obserue the flying of birdes, to diuine and prognosticate things thereupon. But in the yeare of his office of Ædile, he was forced against his will to accuse Capitolinus, his brother in office with him. For he being a rash and dissolute man of life, fell in dishoneste loue with his colleagues sonne Marcellus, that bare his owne name: who being a goodly young gentleman, and newly come to mans state, was as well thought of, and taken of euery man for his manhoode and good qualities, as any way for his beautie and personage. The first time Capitolinus moued this dishonestie to him, he did of himselfe repulse his shameleste offer, without any other's priuitie: but when he saw he came againe to tempt him the seconde time, he straight reuealed it to his father. Marcellus his father being maruellously offended withall, (as he had good cause) went and accused Capitolinus before the Senate. Capitolinus at the first, laide in many exceptions and fained excuses to keepe him from appearing, and in the end he appealed to the Tribunes of the people: but they declared plainely they would not receiue his appeale, nor take any knowledge of the matter. At the length he was forced to aunswere the matter before the Senate, and denied flatly that he attempted euer any such thing, because there were no witnesses to proue it against him. Whereupon the Senate thought good to send for young Marcellus, who comming before them, both blushed, and wept together. The Senate seeing shamefastnesse in him, mixed with teares, and a malice that could not be pacified: without seeking other proofe, they tooke it a cleare case, & so condemned Capitolinus presently in a great summe of money, which Marcellus conuerted into siluer vessell, to serue at sacrifices, and so did consecrate them to the seruice of the goddes. Now when the ROMAINES had ended their first warre against the CARTHAGINIANS, which held them fully the space of two and twentie yeares: Immediatly after that, they beganne a new warre against the GAVLES. For the INSVBRIANS, being a people deriued from the GAVLES, & dwelling at the foot of the mountaines of the ALPES on Italy side, being able to make a good power of themselues, did notwithstanding pray aide of their other GAVLES inhabiting on the other side of the mountaines: & they caused the GESSATES, a mercenarie people and hirelings to them that would giue pay, to bring great numbers to them. Truely me thinkes it was a maruellous matter, and wonderfull good happe for the ROMAINES, that this war of the GAVLES came not vpon them, while they were at wars with CARTHAGINIANS: & that the GAVLES also had then quiet all that while (as if they had purposely sworne to set vpon the conquerors) expecting still an end betweene the, & then to set on the conquerors, when they had nothing to say to any other. Yet the situation of their country did trouble the ROMAINES much, because they were so neere neighbours vnto them, as had warres as it were at their owne dores. And so did the auncient reputation of the GAVLES somewhat appaule the ROMAINES, who as it should seeme they did feare more then any other nation whatsoeuer: because ROME had bene taken before by the GAVLES. Since which time a law was made, that Priestes and ecclesiasticall persons should be dispenced with for going to the warres, vnlesse the GAVLES did rise against them. The preparation they made in this warre at that time, did plainly shew the feare they had the of the GAVLES. For there thinkes, that neuer before nor since, there were so many naturall ROMAINES assembled together in field, as were then at that present. Moreouer, the new come cruelties they vsed in their sacrifices, doth record this to be true. For before they neuer vsed any straunge maner in their sacrifice, or barbarous fashion, but were fauourable in their opinions about the ceremonies of religion, and agreeable to the GRECIANS touching the seruice of the goddes. But then, as they were compelled to obey certaine oracles, and auncient prophecies they found written in the Sybyles bookes: and they buried two GRECIANS aliue in the oxe market, a man and a woman, and likewise two GAVLES, a man and a woman. Vnto them they do yet continue certaine secret anniuersaries in Noueber, that are not to be seene of euery body. The ROMAINES in the first battels of this warre, were often ouercome, and did ouercome: but these battels were to little purpose, for ending of the warres. In the yeare that C. Quintius Flaminius, and P. Furius Philo were Consuls, and sent with great armies to make warres vpon the INSVBRIANS, people subiect to the state of MILANE: newes were brought to ROME, that there was a riuer in the countrie of ROMANIA, red as bloud, & 3. moones also at the very same time in the citie of RIMINI. Furthermore, the Priests and soothsaiers that had obserued and considered the tokens, and significations of birdes on that day, when these two were chosen Consuls: they told plainly there was error in their election, & that they were directly chosen against all signes & tokens of the birdes. Thereupon the Senate wrote immediatly to the campe to them, and willed them to come home to depose themselues of their Consulship, before they did attempt any thing as Consuls against the enemies. The Consull Flaminius receiued the letters in time: but because he was readie to giue battell, he would not open thē, before he had first ouerthrowen his enemies, & spoiled their countrie, as in dede he did. But when he was come back to ROME againe, and had brought maruellous great spoiles with him, the people for all that would not goe out to meete him, because he did not presently obey the letters they wrote vnto him, nor returned vpon it as they commaunded him, but contemptuously, without any regard of their displeasure, followed his owne phantasie: whereupon they had almost flatly denied him the honour of triumph. For his triumph was no sooner ended, but they compelled him to giue ouer his Consulship, and made him a priuate man with his cōpanion. The ROMAINES ther- in were so religiously bent, as they would all thinges should be referred vnto the gods good grace & pleasure, and would suffer none to contemne the obseruations & prognosticating of the soothsaiers, nor their auncient vses and customes, for any prosperity and felicity that could happen. For they thought it more necessarie and profitable for benefit of the common weale, that the Senate and magistrates should reuerence the ceremonies and seruice of the gods: then that they should ouercome their enemies in battell. As for example Tiberius Sempronius, a man as much honoured and esteemed of the ROMAINES for his iustice and valiantnesse, as any other of his time: being one yeare Consull, did nominate and elect two other for Consuls the yeare following, Scipio Nasica, and Caius Martius. These two being entred into their Consulship, and sent from ROME also to their seuerall prouinces appointed them by lot: Sempronius by chance tooke certaine litle bookes in his hand, where were briefly written the rules apperteining to the ceremonies of publique sacrifice, and reading in them, he found a certaine ordinance he neuer heard before. And this it was. That if a magistrate were set in any tent or hired house without the citie, to behold and obserue the prognostications of birdes, and that vpon any sodaine occasion he were driuen to come againe into the citie, before the birds had giuen any certaine signes: the second time when he returned againe to ende his obseruations, there was no remedie, but he must leaue his tent or first hired house, and take another, and beginne new obseruations againe. Tiberius vtterly ignorant of this ordinance before, had kept his obseruations twise in one selfe house, and had chosen there, Nasica and Martius, Consuls to succeede him. But when he knew he had offended, he tolde the Senate of it: who would not let slip so litle a fault, but wrote to the new Consuls, and they straight left their prouinces, and returned againe to ROME, willingly resigning vp their offices. That was a prety while after. Againe also, about the very present time we write of now, there were two Priestes of noble houses (and noble persons also) the one called Cornelius, and the other Cethegus, both which were disgraded of their Priesthood, because they had not giuen the intrailes of the sacrificed beast in order as they should haue done. Quintus Sulpitius in like maner, was disgraded of his Bishopricke, because his miter which the FLAMINES do weare, fell off his head in his sacrificing. Minutius being Dictator also, and hauing chosen Caius Flaminius generall of the horsemen because they heard the noyse of a ratte at the electiō of Flaminius, they were both put out of their authority, & other chosen in their place. Now, though they were thus precise euen in trifles, it was not by reason of any superstition mingled with their religion: but because they would not breake any iotte of the auncient institutions and ceremonies of their countrie. But to our storie againe. Flaminius being depriued of his Consulshippe, Marcellus was created Consull in his place, by the regents at that time called Interreges. Marcellus being inuested in his office, chose Cneus Cornelius for his companion: and they say, that the GAVLES being inclined to peace, and the Senate of ROME also willing to harken to peace, Marcellus did stirre vp the people, and made them rather desire warre. Notwithstanding, they concluded peace at that time: but the GAVLES GESSATES immediatly after renued the warres againe. For there came ouer the mountains of the ALPES, a thirty thouſand of them, & they ioyned with the INSVBRIANS, which were many moe in number then themſelues. Now, they being in marueilous iolity, went incontinently to lay ſiege to the citie of ACERRES, that ſtandeth vpon the riuer of PO: and during the ſiege, king Britomarus taking ten thouſand GESSATES with him, went & deſtroied al the country about the PO. Marcellus hearing that, left with his companion Cneus Cornelius, all the armed footmen, & the third part of the horſemen, in his campe by ACERRES: & he himſelfe with the reſidue of the horſemen, & ſix hundred footmen light armed, marched towards the enemie, trauelling night & day, vntill he met with the ten thouſand GESSATES, neere vnto a village of GAVLE on this ſide the mountaines, called CLASTIDIVM, which was ſubiect not long before to the ROMAINES. So he had no leiſure to take reſt nor to refreſh his men a litle: for the barbarous people knew ſtraight he was come, and tooke him for no better then by & by ouercome, becauſe he had ſo few footmen. And for his horſemen, the GAVLES made no reckoning of them: for beſides themſelues are very good men of armes, & excell all other in that fight, yet were their number of horſemen farre aboue Marcellus. Therfore they ſtraight marched towards him in a maruellous furie, & with thundring ſhoutes, as if they would haue deuoured them at their comming. Britomarus their king, aduanced himſelfe before all his companie. Marcellus fearing to be compaſſed in behind, being ſo ſmal a number: he put out the wings of his horſemen as much as he could, to haue the country at large, ſo that his two wings were very ſlender, vntill he came neere his enemies. And being readie to gallop towards the enemie, it fortuned his horſe being affraid with the noiſe of his enemies, turned about, & caried Marcellus back againe in ſpight of his teeth. But he fearing the ROMAINES ſuperſtition, in taking this for an euill token, and that they would take a conceit vpon the ſame: plucking the bridle with his left hand, turned his horſe head againe vpon the enemie, and then he worſhipped the ſunne, as though he had not turned his horſe by chance but purpoſely for that cauſe. For it is the ROMAINES maner to turne about ſo, when they honour their gods. So when they began to ioyne battell, he made a vow to Iupiter Feretrius to offer him vppe the goodlieſt ſpoiles of his enemies, if he did ouercome. The King of the GAVLES ſeeing him at that inſtant, imagined by the markes and tokens he ſaw, that he was the generall of his enemies: So he ſet ſpurs to his horſe, and gallopped towardes him from all his companie giuing him defiance, and chalenged him, ſhaking his ſtaffe in his hande. He was the goodlieſt perſon and ſtrongeſt man of all the GAVLES, and his armour was all gilded and ſiluered, and ſo ſet forth with ſundry workes and colours, that it ſhined as the ſunne. Marcellus on the other ſide hauing viewed all the armie of his enemies through out, and perceiuing none ſo richly armed as the king: thought ſtraight it was againſt him, that he had made his prayer and vow to Iupiter. Then hee put his horſe in full cariere againſt him and met him with ſuch a force & furie to him, that he pierced his armour with his ſtaffe, and ouerthrew him: but yet he killed him not dead: whereupon he ſodainely redoubled two or three ſtrokes on his ſides vpon him, and ſo ſlew him right out. Then he lighted from his horſe, & taking the ſpoiles of the kings armour in his hand, he lift vp his eyes to heauen, and ſaid. O Iupiter Feretrius, thou that doeſt from heauen behold and direct, all marſhall feates and Captaines deedes: thy ſelfe I take to witneſſe, that I am the third ROMAINE Captaine, that being generall of the armie, haue ſlaine with my owne hands, the king and generall of the enemies: and I promiſe here vnto thee to offer thee vp the richeſt ſpoiles of mine enemies, ſo thy godhead will vouchſafe to grant vs the like good fortune in all this warre beſides. His praier ended, the men of armes of the ROMAINES ranne in among the horſemen and footmen of the GAVLES, one being vpon another from another: and fortune did ſo fauour them, that they wanne a paſſing victorie, in ſo ſtrange and wonderfull maner, as was incredible. For it was neuer ſeene before nor ſince, that ſo few horſemen did ouerthrow ſo great a number of men of armes and footemen rangled together. Now when Marcellus had ſlaine the greater number of them, and had gotten the ſpoiles and all their baggage: he returned againe to his companion Cneus Cornelius, whom he founde making warres vnfortunately with the GAVLES, before the greateſt and moſt populous citie they had, called MILLAINE, which the GAVLES on this ſide the mountaines haue for their chiefe citie, and from whence all other had their firſt originall. all their posible endeuour to defend it, and did as straightly besiege the Consull Cornelius, as he did them. Now, when Marcellus was come to the camp againe, the GESSATES vnderstanding that their king Bartomarus was slaine in battell, returned backe againe into their countrey, & the citie of MILLAINE was take. After that, all the other cities there about yelded of themselues, without force of siege, and the GAVLES wholly submitted themselues and all that they had, to the mercy of the ROMAINES, who graunted them peace vpon easie conditions. For these famous victories, the Senate of ROME gaue all the honour of triumph vnto Marcellus onely, and that was as wonderfull & worthy a sight, as any that euer past before him: what for the infinite spoyles, and the numbers of great men taken prisoners, and also for the exceeding sumptuousnesse & stately shew therof. But the goodliest sight of all for the rarenes, was to behold Marcellus selfe, carying on his shoulders the whole spoyle of the barbarous king, to offer vp to Iupiter Feretrian. For he had cut downe a goodly young oke of the mountaine, straight, and shut vp verie long, which he had trimmed vp in forme of triumph, hanging all the armed peeces he had wonne of the king, verie orderly round about it. Then, when all the shew of his triumphe was past, he himselfe tooke the oke vpon his shoulders, and got vp vpon his triumphing charet, and so marched through the city, carying these signes thereupon: which was the noblest sight, and honorablest shew, of the whole triumphe. His army followed after the charet, singing verses and songes of victorie, in prayse of the gods and their Captaine: and when he had passed through the whole city, and was come to the temple of Iupiter called Feretrian, there he set vp this young oke, and token of triumphe. This Marcellus is the third and last ROMAINE Captaine, to who happened this honour in our age. For the first man that euer offred vp to Iupiter the spoiles of the general of their enemies, was king Romulus, who wanne the like spoyles of Acran, king of the CÆNINIANS. The second was Cornelius Cossus, who slue Tolumnius, generall of the THVSCANS. And the third was Marcellus, who slue with his own hands Britomarus, king of the GAVLES: and after him, no man euer since could obtaine the like good fortune. The god to whom these manner of spoyles are consecrated thus, is called Iupiter Feretrian, so termed as some write, because they do cary this token of triumphe to him, following the derivation of this Greeke word, Ferin, which signifieth to cary: for in those former times, many Greeke wordes were mingled with the Latin. Other affirme it is one of the surnames of Iupiter, signifying as much as lightening: for Ferire in the Latin toung, signifieth to strike. And some say also, in warres it is properly to hurt or kill with his owne handes: for the ROMAINES vse at this day when they giue a charge vpon their enemies in battell, or that they haue them in chase flying, to crie, incouraging one an other, Feri, Feri: which is as much as kill, kill. And the spoyles taken frō the enemies also, are generally called Spolia: but those which Lieutenants generall, or generals, do take from the generals of their enemies, when they haue slaine them, they are called particularly Spolia opima. Yet some hold opinion, that king Numa Pompilius mentioning the rich spoiles, or Spolia opima in his cōmentaries, speaketh of the first, the second, and the third: and commaundeth that the first spoyles which are wonne, should be consecrated to Iupiter Feretrian: the second vnto Mars: and the third vnto Quirinus. And that they should giue to him that had wonne the first spoyles, three hundred Asses, the second, two hundred: & the third a hundred. But notwithstanding, the best opinion & vsuall taking of Spolia opima, referreth them to be the first spoiles wonne in a foughten field, & those which the Lieutenant of an armie, or a generall, doth take frō the generall of the enemies, after he hath slaine him with his own hands. And thus much for declaration of this matter. Furthermore, the ROMAINES were so ioyfull of this victorie, and of their good successe in this warre, that they caused a massie cup of gold to be made of the spoyle they had gotten, weighing a hundred pound weight, which they sent to offer vp in the temple of Apollo Pythias in the city of DELPHES, in token of thankes: and they made liberall diuision besides of the spoyles vnto their friendes and confederates, and sent a great part of it vnto Hieron king of SYRACVSA, who was their confederate. Not long after, Hannibal being entred ITALIE, Marcellus was sent with an army by sea, into SICILE. And after the great ouerthrow was giue at the battel of CANNES, wherin there died so many thousand ROMAINES, and that verie few of them saued themselues by flying, into the citty of CANNVTIVM: they looked that Hannibal hauing ouercome the flower of all gates after them, & take the spoile of all their cariages. Marcellus being informed of this treason, did set his men in battell ray within the city, hard by the gates, and behind them he placed all the sumpters & cariage in good order: besides that, he made proclamation by trumpet, that no citizen vpon paine of death should approch the walles. This occasion drew Hannibal to come hard to the citie seeing no watch vpon the walles, and made him the bolder to come in disorder, imagining there had bene some mutinie or sedition within, betweene the noble men and the people. But in the meane time, Marcellus set open the gates being hard by, and issuing out vpon the sodaine with the best men of armes he had, he gaue a charge vpon Hannibal in the vaward. Immediatly after came out his footemen at an other gate, running straight vpon Hannibal, with a wonderfull crie and shout: so as Hannibal to withstand them, was driuen to deuide his men in two companies. But as he was deuiding them, sodainely a third gate opened vpon them, from whence all the residue of the ROMAINES issued out, & fell vpon the CARTHAGINIANS on euery side, they being maruellously amazed to be so sodainely set on, which they looked not for: so hauing their hands full with those that came first vpon them, being scant able to defend themselues against them, and seeing this new and last charge also, they were forced to yeeld. This was the first time, that euer Hannibals souldiers began to giue place to the ROMAINES, who draue them backe vnto their campe, and slue a great number of them, and did hurt diuerse of them besides. For some write there were slaine of the CARTHAGINIANS at that conflict, aboue fiue thousand: and of the ROMAINES there died not past fiue hundred men. But Titus Liuius doth not set out the matter so great, and yet confesseth that Marcellus wanne great honour by it, and that it made the ROMAINES maruellous valiant againe, after so many and sundry battels as they had lost one after an other: for then they were perswaded that they fought not with an enemy altogether vnuincible, but that he might sometime also, as well as themselues, receiue both losse and hurt. Therefore, one of the Consuls dying about that time, the people caused Marcellus to be sent for, and placed him in his roome: and in spite of the Senate they deferred all deputation till his returne from the camp. Marcellus came no sooner to ROME, but he was chosen Consull in the dead mans roome, by all the voyces of the people. Notwithstanding, when they went to choose him, it thundred maruellously: which the Priests and Augures tooke for an ill token, but yet they durst not openly speake against his election, because they feared the people. Howbeit Marcellus of himselfe did willingly giue vp his Consullship, and yet was there no exception to him for his seruice in the warres: for they created him Proconsull, and sent him againe to the camp at NOLA, where he did seuerely punish such as tooke Hannibals part. Who being aduertised thereof, came thither with all possible speed to helpe them: and when at his first comming, he offered Marcellus battell, which refused it at that time. Neuertheless he tooke his time, when Hannibal had sent the best part of his armie to forage, as meaning to fight no more battels: and then he set vpon him, hauing giuen his footemen long pikes, such as they vse in fight vpon the sea, and taught them also, how to hurt the enemy a farre off, keeping them still in their hands. But the CARTHAGINIANS hauing no skill of their pikes, and fighting with short iauelings in their hands, did strike downe right blowes: which was the cause, that they being set vpon by the ROMAINES, were driuen to turne their backes, and flee before them. So there were slaine fiue thousand of the CARTHAGINIANS left dead in the field, foure elephants slaine, and two taken aliue: and furthermore, three dayes after the battell, there came a three hundred horsemen, some of them SPANIARDS, and other NVMIDIANS, that submitted themselues to the ROMAINES. Neuer came there such a misfortune before to Hannibal: who had of long time kept together in great loue & amity, an army assembled of sundry barbarous nations and people. Howbeit these three hundred continued euer after faithfull to the end, both to Marcellus, and to all other Lieutenants & generals of the ROMAINES. Shortly after, Marcellus being againe chosen Consull the third time, went into SICILE. For Hannibals prosperous successe & victories had so incouraged the CARTHAGINIANS, as they sought againe to conquer this Iland: and specially because that after the death of Hieronimus the tyrant, there rose some tumult at SYRACVSA. Vpon which occasion, the ROMAINES had sent an armie thither before, & a Prætor called Appius: at whose hands Marcellus hauing receiued the army, a great number of the ROMAINES became humble suters to him to pray him to aide them in their calamity, which was this. Of those that scaped from the ... tell of CANNES, some saued themselues by flying, other were taken prisoners, of which ... were such a number, as it appeared that ROME had not people enough left onely to keepe ... walles. And moreouer, those that saued themselues by flying, they sent straight into SICILE: commaunding they should not once set foote ... in ITALIE, whilest they had warres with Hannibal. These were the mē that came altogether and fell downe at Marcellus feete, so soone as he arriued in SICILE, & humbly besought him to appoint them to serue vnder some ensigne, that they might fight to do their coūtry honour and seruice: promising him with teares running downe their cheekes, that their faithfull service then should witnesse for them, that the ouerthrow they had at CANNES, fell vpon them rather by misfortune, then through lacke of courage. Whereupon Marcellus hauing compassion on them, wrote to the Senate in their fauour, & prayed them that they would graunt him licence to supply the bands of his army, as they diminished, with those poore ROMAINES countreymen. Many reasons passed to, & fro, against this sute: neuertheless, it was concluded in the end by the Senate, that the common wealth made no reckening of the seruice of ... harted men like women: wherefore if Marcellus thought good of their seruice, yet it should not be lawfull for him to giue thē any crownes or rewards of honour, for any notable seruice soeuer they did, as all generals are wont to giue to honest men that serue valiantly. The order of the Senate misliked Marcellus verie much, who at his returne home out of SICILE made his complaint in open Senate, and told them they did him manifest wrong, to deny him that fauour, that hauing done his cōmon wealth such faithfull seruice diuerse times, as he had done, he might not restore so many poore ROMAINES to their honour againe. Now, when Marcellus was in SICILE, he receiued great hurts and iniuries by Hippocrates, generall of the SYRACVSANS: who, to pleasure the CARTHAGINIANS, and by their meanes to make himselfe chiefe Lord of SYRACVSA, did put many ROMAINE citizēs to death. ments, and to the benefit and commoditie of vse. For this inuentiue art to frame instruments and engines, (which are called mechanicall, or organicall, so highly commended and esteemed of all sortes of people) were first set forth by Architas, and by Eudoxus: partly to bewtifie a litle the science of Geometry by this fineneſſe, and partly to proue and confirme by materiall examples and sencible instruments, certaine Geometricall conclusions, wherof a man can not finde out the conceiuable demonstrations, by enforced reasons and prooſes. As that conclusion which instructeth one to search out two lynes meane proportionall, which can not be proued by reason demonstratiue; and yet notwithstanding is a principall and an accepted ground, for many things which are conteined in the art of portraiture. Both of them haue fashioned it to the workemanship of certaine instruments, called Mesolabes or Mesographes, which serue to finde these meane lines proportionall, by drawing certaine curue lines, and ouerthwart and oblike sextions. But after that, Plato was offended with them, and mainteined against them, that they did vtterly corrupt and disgrace the worthinesse & excellency of Geometrie, making it to descend from things not comprehensible, and without body, vnto things sensible and materiall, and to bring it to a palpable substance, where the vile and base handie works of man is to be employed: since that time I say, handie craft, or the art of engines, came to be separated from Geometry, and being long time despised by the Philosophers, it came to be one of the warlike artes. But Archimedes hauing told king Hieron, his kinseman and verie friend, that it was possible to remoue as great a weight as he would, with as litle strength as he listed to put to it: and boasting himselfe thus (as they report of him) and trusting to the force of his reasons, wherewith he proued this conclusion, that if there were an other globe of earth, he was able to remoue this of ours, and passe it ouer to the other: king Hieron wondering to heare him, required him to put this deuise in execution, and to make him see by experience, some great or heauy weight remoued by litle force. So Archimedes caught hold with a hooke of one of the greatest carects, or hulkes of the king (that to draw it to the shore out of the water, required a maruellous number of people to go about it, and was hardly to be done so) and put a great number of men more into her, than her ordinarie burden: and he himselfe sitting alone at his ease farre off, without any straining at all, drawing the end of an engine with many wheeles and pullyes, fayre and softly with his hand, made it come as gently and smoothly to him as it had floted in the sea. The king wondring to see the sight, and knowing by proofe the greatnesse of his art: he prayed him to make him some engines, both to assault and defend, in all manner of sieges and assaults. So Archimedes made him many engines, but king Hieron neuer occupied any of them, because he raigned the most part of his time in peace, without any warre. But this prouision and munition of engines, serued the SYRACVSANS turne marueilously at that time: & not onely the prouision of the engines ready made, but also the engineer & worke maister himselfe, that had inuented them. Now, the SYRACVSANS seeing themselues assaulted by the ROMAINES, both by sea and by land, were maruellously perplexed, and could not tell what to say they were so afrayed: imagining it was impossible for them to withstand so great an army. But when Archimedes fell to handle his engines, and to set them at worke: there flue in the ayre infinite kindes of shot, and maruellous great stones, with an vncredible noyse and force on the sodaine, vpon the footemen that came to assault the citie by land, comming downe, and tearing in peeces all those, which came against them, or in what place soeuer they lighted, no earthly bodie being able to resist the violence of so heauie a weight: so that all their rankes were maruellously disordered. And as for the gallies that gaue assault by sea, some were striken with long peeces of timber like vnto the yards of ships, whereto they vse to hang their sayles, which were sodainly blowen ouer the walles with force of their engines into their gallies, and so striken them by their ouer great weight. Other being hoysed vp by the prowes with hands of Iron, and hookes made like cranes billes, plunged their poupes into the sea. Other being taken vp with certaine engines fastened within one contrary to an other, made them turne in the ayre like a whirlegigge, & so cast them vpon the rockes by the towne walles, and splitted them all to sitters, to the great spoyle and murther of the persons that were within them. And sometimes the ships and gallies were lift cleane out of the water, that it was a fearefull thing to see them hang and turne in the ayre as they did: vntill that casting their men within them ouer the hatches, some here, some there, by this terrible turning, they came in the end to be emptie, and to breake against the walls, or else to fall into the sea againe, where their engines left their hold. Now for Marcellus engine, which he brought against the wall vpon a bridge made of gallies ioyned together: that was called Sambuca, by reason of the fashion it had like to an instrument of musicke of the same name, which is a harpe. The same being yet a good pretie way off from the walls, there fell a great stone vpon it sent frō the wall weighing ten talents. Then, a second after that, and a third one after that, the which falling into this engine with such a thunder and terrible tempest, brake the foundation of the engine and tare all the bridge of the gallies ioyned together in peeces, that sustained it. So that Marcellus being amazed with all, not knowing well what it meant: was glad to retire quickly, and sent to make his trompet sound the retreat to those that gaue assault by land. Hereupon they sate in counsell to determine what was to be done, and they resolued, that the next morning before day they should approch the walles if it were possible: because that Archimedes engines, which were verie strong and hard wound vp, should by this meanes send all their force and furie of their stones and shot ouer their heades, and that neare hand also he could do no good with them, for that they had not the scope of their leauell and cariage they should haue. But Archimedes had preuented this deuise by long preparation before, hauing made prouision of engines for farre and neare, the leauell and cariage whereof was proportioned for all distances: their shot short, the arrowes not verie long, many holes & arches in the walles hard by an other, where there were store of crosbowes to kill neare hand, set in such places, as the enemies could not see them without. Wherefore, when the Romanes thought to approch, thinking they had bene safe and close, that no man saw them: it amazed them when they were receiued againe with infinite shot, and striken to the ground with stones that fell vpon their heades like lead: (for there was no part of all the walles, from whence they had not the like shot.) Whereupon they were forced againe to retire from the walles: yet when they were further of from them, the arrowes, stones, and other kinde of shot flue in euery place among them, killed a great nombor of them, scattered farre from them, so that many of them were slaine and sore wounded, and diuerse of their ships soiled: they not once able to be reuenged, nor to hurt their enemies, because Archimedes had placed his engines verie closely behind the walles, and not vpon the walles in sight of the enemie, that it appeared the gods fought against the Romanes, they were so slaine and wounded, and yet they could not tell how, nor by whom. Notwithstading, Marcellus escaped with safe from hurt, and mocking his workemaisters and engineers he had in his camp, he spake to them. What, shall we not leaue to make warres with this Briarian engineer and Geometrician here? who sitting still vpon the wharfe, in sporting manner hath with shame ouerwen our nauie, and exceeded all the fabulous hundred handes of the Gyants, discharging one instant so many shot among vs? For indeede, all the residue of the Syracusans are as the body and members of Archimedes preparation: and he himselfe was the onely mouer that moued and did all, all weapons else being quiet, and his engines onely occupied, to offend and defend. At the length, Marcellus seeing his men thus afeard, as if they did but see the shadow of a rope, or any peece of timber vpon the wall, they ranne away, crying out, that Archimedes was letting loose some of his engines vpon them: he would no more approch the walles, nor giue assault, determining to see if he could winne it by long siege. Notwithstanding Archimedes had such a great minde, and was so profoundly learned, hauing hidden in his breast the onely treasure and secrets of Geometricall inuentions: as he would neuer set forth any booke how to make all these warlicke engines, which wanne him at that time the fame & glorie not of mans knowledge, but rather of diuine wisedom. But he esteeming all kind of handy craft and inuention to make engines, & generally all maner of sciences bringing common commodity by the vse of them, to be but vile, beggerly, and mercenarie drosse, employed his wit & studie onely to write things, the beawtie and subtilitie whereof, were not mingled any thing at all with necessitie. For all that he hath written, are geometricall propositions, which are in comparison of any other writings whatsoeuer: because the subiect whereof they treat, doth appeare by demonstration, the matter giuing them the grace & the greatnesse, and the ſtration prouing it ſo exquiſitely, with wonderfull reaſon and facilitie, as it is not repugnable. For in all Geometry are not to be found more profound and difficult matters written, in more plaine and ſimple tearmes, and by more eaſie principles, then thoſe which he hath inuented. Now ſome do impute this, to the ſharpeneſſe of his wit and vnderſtanding, which was a naturall gift in him: other do referre it to the extreame paines he tooke, which made theſe things come ſo eaſily from him, that they ſeemed as if they had bene no trouble to him at all. For no mans liuing of himſelfe can deuiſe the demonſtration of his propoſitions, what paine ſoeuer he take to ſeeke it: & yet ſtraight ſo ſoone as he commeth to declare & open it, euery man then imagineth with himſelf he could haue found it out well enough, he can then ſo plainly make demonſtration of the thing he meaneth to ſhew. And therfore that me thinks is like enough to be true, which they write of him: that he was ſo rauiſhed and drunke with the ſweet intiſements of this Syren, which as it were lay continually with him, as he forgat his meat & drink, & was careleſſe otherwiſe of himſelfe, that oftentimes his ſeruants got him againſt his will to the bathes, to waſh and annoint him: & yet being there, he would euer be drawing out of the Geometricall figures, euen in the very imbers of the chimney. And while they were annoinring of him with oiles and ſweet ſauors, with his finger he did draw lines vpon his naked body: ſo far was he taken from himſelfe, & brought into an extaſie or traunce, with the delight he had in the ſtudy of Geometry, & truly rauiſhed with the loue of the Muſes. But amongſt many notable things he deuiſed, it appeareth, that he moſt eſteemed the demonſtration of the proportion betweene the Cylinder (to wit, the round colomne) & the ſphære or globe contained in the ſame: for he praied his kinſmen and friends, that after his death they would put a Cylinder vpon his tombe, containing a maſſie ſphære, with an inſcription of the proportion, wherof the continent exceedeth the thing conteined. So Archimedes being as you haue heard, did ſo much as lay in him, both ſaue himſelfe and SYRACVSA, from taking. But now againe to Marcellus. Marcellus during the ſiege at SYRACVSA, wanne the citie of MEGARES in Sicilia, one of the ancienteſt cities in all the Iland: & he tooke beſides, the campe of Hippocrates, lying by ACILES, where he ſlue aboue 8000 men, ſurpriſing them vpon the ſodaine, euen as they were preparing to lodge, & to fortifie their campe. Then he ouercame a great part of the champion countrie of SICILE, & made the cities to rebell that tooke the CARTHAGINIANS part: & in all the battels he fought, he euer ouercame them that durſt bid him battell. It chanced afterwards, that he tooke a LACEDÆMONIAN captaine priſoner, called Danippus: euen as he came out of SYRACVSA by ſea. The SYRACVSANS deſirous to redeeme him, ſent to him to pray he might be ranſomed. They made many parlees about his ranſome, and drew out this practiſe to diuerſe meetings: vntill Marcellus had taken good markes of a certaine tower, that had no great watch kept vpon it, & into the which he might ſecretly conney a certaine number of men, the wall of the city in that place being no very hard thing to skale. Therfore when he had giuen a good geſſe by eſtimation at the height of that tower, by often approching to it, hauing parled many a time hard by it: he prouided skaling ladders, & toke the oportunitie of the feaſt which the SYRACVSANS ſolemnized in the honor of Diana, on which day they gaue themſelues to all feaſting, ſporting and plaies. So he tooke not only the tower, but filled all the walls round about with armed men before day, & brake open the maine gate and entrie of the citie called Hexapile. And as the SYRACVSANS began to ſtir, perceiuing the ROMAINES on the wals: Marcellus made his men ſound their trumpets on euery ſide. Wherupon the SYRACVSANS were ſo afraid & amazed, that they began to flie, thinking all the city beſides had bin taken, where in deed the greateſt and ſtrongeſt quarter of the city called ACRADINA, was not touched: becauſe it is walled in round about, and ſeparated from the reſt of the city, which is deuided into two other parts, the one called the new citie, and the other fortune. The two parts whereof being wonne, Marcellus by the breake of the day forced in by the gate or entrie of the Hexapile. And when his captaines told him he was happy, to winne ſo goodly a citie, ſo eaſily: they ſay, that he looking about him, and conſidering the greatneſſe & ſtatelineſſe of the citie, he wept for very pitie, foreſeeing whereto it ſhould come, thinking with himſelfe what a change it ſhould haue, when his armie came to ſpoile and ſack the ſame. For there was not a captaine that durſt denie the ſouldiers when they demanded the ſpoile, & yet were there many that would needs haue it burnt and rased to the ground. But Marcellus would not agree to that in any case, and besides, it was sore against his minde to graunt them the spoile of goods and slaues: straightly commanding them notwithstanding, not to lay hands of any man, and not to kill, hurt, nor to make any SYRACVSAN slaue. Wherein, though he shewed great fauor & mercy, yet it greeued him to see so famous a city, brought to that miserable state: and in the midst of all the ioy he had for his victorie, he could not refraine from weeping for pitty to see so riche and wealthy a city, in the turning of a hand, spoiled, & brought to nought. For it is said, that the riches & goods taken away at the sack of SYRACVSA, were nothing inferior to the spoiles of CARTHAGE, which was also sacked not long after that: for the other part of the city of SYRACVSA called ACRADINA, was soone after also taken by treason, and spoiled against the captaines wils, sauing the kings treasure, which was reserued to be carried to the common treasure of ROME. SYRACVSA being taken, nothing greeued Marcellus more then the losse of Archimedes. Who being in his studie when the city was taken, busily searching out by himselfe the demonstration of some Geometricall proposition which he had drawen in figure, and so earnestly occupied therein, as he neither saw nor heard any noise of enemies that ran vp and downe the city, and much lesse knew it was taken: he wondered when he saw a souldier by him, that bad him go with him to Marcellus. Notwithstanding, he spake to the souldier, and bad him tary vntill he had done his conclusion, & brought it to demonstration: but the souldier being angry with his answer, drew out his sword, and killed him. Other say that the ROMAINE souldier when he came, offered the sword point to him, to kil him: & that Archimedes when he saw him, praied him to hold his hand a litle, that he might not leaue his matter he looked for vnperfect, without demonstration. But the soldier making no reckoning of his speculation, killed him presently. It is reported a third way also, saying, that certaine soldiers met him in the streets going to Marcellus, carying certaine Mathematicall instruments in a litle prety coffer, as dials for the sunne, sphæres and angles, wherewith they measured the greatnesse of the body of the sunne by view: and they supposing he had caried some golde or siluer, or other pretious iewels in that litle coffer, slue him for it. But it is most true, that Marcellus was maruellous sory for his death, and euer after hated the villaine that slue him, as a wicked and execrable person: and how he made also maruellous much afterwards of Archimedes kinsemen for his sake. The ROMAINES were esteemed of at that time by all nations, for maruellous expert souldiers, and taken for very valiant and dangerous men to be dealt with: but they neuer shewed any example of their clemencie and curtesie, and least of all of any curtesie ner to any strangers, vntill Marcellus taught the way, whose actes did shew the Greeks then, that the ROMAINES were more gratious and mercifull, then they. For he did so courteously intreate those that had to do with him, and shewed such fauour to priuate persons, as also to whole cities: that if there were any crueltie shewed in the cities of ENNA, or at MESSERES, or against the SYRACVSANS, it was rather through their owne fault and folly that were hurt, then theirs that did them the hurt. And for proofe hereof, I will recite you one example onely amongst many. There is a citie in SICILE called ENGYIVM, it is no great thing but a very ancient citie of name, by reason of the trafficke thither, for that there are certaine goddesses to be seene, whom they worship, called the mothers. Some say the CRETANS were the first builders and founders of the temple there, where you shall see speares and helmets of copper, and vpon them are grauen the name of Meriones: and vpon others, Vlysses name, which are consecrated to these goddesses. This citie stood altogether at the deuotion of the CARTHAGINIANS: and Nicias being the chiefest man of the same, was all he might against it, and perswaded them openly in all their counsels to take part with the ROMAINES, prouing it by many reasons, that his enemies counselling the contrarie, were vnprofitable members of the common wealth. Whereuppon Nicias enemies fearing his great power and authoritie, they did conspire among themselues to apprehend him, and to deliuer him to the CARTHAGINIANS. But Nicias hearing of such a matter, and finding that they lay in waite to take him: vsed this pollicie to preuent their treason. He gaue out openly very ill speeches against the goddesses, and did many things in derogation of their honour: and said the sight of them (which was a matter of great credit) was but a deuise, and that there no credit to be giuen to them. These words tickled his enemies, imagining that the common people would lay the mischeife they pretended against him, to himselfe, as the onely causer of his owne hurt. So they hauing appointed a day to apprehend him, by chaunce a common counsell was kept that day they had determined of: where Nicias speaking to the people about matter of counsell, in the middest of his oration fell to the ground, to the great wonder of the whole assembly, as euery man may coniecture. Howbeit neuer a man sturred, & a prety while after he began to lift vp his head a litle, and to looke gastly about him, with a faint trembling voice, which he still gathered higher and lowder by litle and litle, vntil he saw all the people wonderously afraid & amazed, that not one of them durst speake. Then throwing his gowne from him, and renting his coate, he got vpon his feete halfe naked, and ran towards the gate of the Theater, crying out that the goddesses mothers did torment him: and not a man durst once come neere him, nor offer to stop him, they were so superstitious and foolishly afraide of the goddesses, imagining it was some diuine punishment. But by this meanes he easily got to the gates of the city, and fled from them all: and he was neuer seene after that time, to do, or speake, like a mad man in any thing. His wife that was made priuie to his deuise, and furthered his intent, went first and fell downe on her knees before the goddesses mothers in their temple, as she had hartily praied vnto them: and faining afterwards she would go seeke her husband, that ran vp and downe the fields like a mad man, she went out of the city with her litle children, and no body troubled her. Thus did they escape without danger, & went vnto Marcellus to SYRACVSA. The ENGIENIANS afterwards plaied such insolent parts, that Marcellus in the end went thither, and caused them all to be taken and bound, as though he would haue put them to execution. But Nicias came to him with the teares in his eyes, & embracing his knees, and kissing his hands, besought him to take pitty of his poore citizens, beginning first with those that were his greatest enemies. This good nature of Nicias so pacified Marcellus wrath, that he pardoned them all, & did no hurt to the city, and gaue Nicias certaine land besides many other rich gifts he bestowed vpon him. Thus it is reported in the historie of Posidonius the Philosopher. Now Marcellus being sent for home by the ROMAINES, because they had wars in their owne countrie, and euen at ROME gates: he departed out of SICILE returning towards ROME, and caried the goodliest tables, pictures, and statues, and other such ornaments as were in SYRACVSA, meaning first to beautifie his triumph with them, and to cause them afterwards for an ornament to ROME, which before that time neuer knew what such curious works ment. For, this finenesse, and curious tables and imagery, neuer came into ROME before, but was throughly set out with armour and weapons of barbarous people, & with bloudy spoiles, and was also crowned with monuments of victories and triumphes of diuerse enemies, which were no pleasant, but rather fearefull sights to looke vpon, farre vnfit for feminine eyes. But euen as Epaminondas did call the plaine of BOEOTIA, Mars scoffold, where he kept his games: & Xenophon also called the city of EPHESVS, the armorers shop: euen so me thinkes (as Pindarus said) they might rightly haue tearmed ROME, the temple of Mars fighting. And this wan the peoples good wils much more to Marcellus, because he did so pasingly set forth ROME with such excellent fine toyes of GREECE. But Fabius Maximus on the other side, was better beloued of the old men: because he brought no such toies with him fro the city of TARENTVM, when he wan it. Indeed he brought away gold and ready coine, and much other goods that were profitable: but for images & tables, he left them standing in their places, speaking a thing of great note. Let vs leaue the TARENTINES their gods offended with them. And furthermore the noble men were angry with Marcellus, saying that by this acte he had purchased ROME great malice & hate. First, because he did not onely lead men prisoners in his triumphe, but the gods also: & secondly, because he had filled the people full of pride prase, & idle curiosity, spending all the whole day in gasing, & wondering at the excellency of the workmē, & of their works, where before they would fall to their labor, or else they wer to the wars, not being acquainted with curiosity, nor idle life as Euripides said, speaking of Hercules:

In wicked practises, he simple was to see, but he exceld in vertuous deeds, and feates that worthy be.

Notwithstanding, Marcellus did glory amongst the GRECIANS themselues, saying: that he had taught the ROMAINES to esteeme the wonderfull workes of GREECE, which knew not before. But at his returne out of SICILE, his enemies procured, that his honor triumphe was denied him. So Marcellus knowing that he had yet left somewhat to do in CILE, and that the warre was not altogether ended, and fearing besides least a third triu would make him too much enuied: he was contented with good will to haue the honor the great triumphe, in the mountaine of ALBA onely: and of the litle triumphe, in the ci ROME. This maner of litle triumphe is called in Greeke Euan, and the ROMAINES call it tio. And this difference there is between them: that in the Ouation triumph, the party to w it is granted, doth not enter into the city vpon triumphing chariot drawne with foure h nor doth cary any lawrell vpon his head in token of triumphe, nor hath any trumpe hornes blowne before him, but doth marche on foote with a paire of slippers on his fee uing flutes and howboyes playing before him, and wearing a garland of firre tree vpo head: so as this maner of entry is nothing warlike, and is rather a pleasant then feareful And that reason doth flatly drawe me to beleeue, that these two kinds of entries they gr to the Captaines, returning from the warres with victorie: were deuided in the olde rather for the maner, then for the greatnesse of the doings. For such as had ouercome enemies by great slaughter and bloudy battels, they did make their entry with pompe umphe, that was altogether marshall and terrible, followed with their souldiers armed, crowned with lawrell garlands, as their custome was in mustering their campe in the wa But they on the contrary side, that without any exploit of armes returned home with vi either by peaceable meanes, or by force of their eloquence: the law granted them the ho of Ouation triumphe, which was quiet, and full of all ioy and mirth. For the flute is an in ment of pleasure belonging to peace; and the firre tree is a tree consecrated to Venus, w goddesse, aboue all gods and goddesses doth most detest warres. This second kinde of was called Ouatio, not as many GRÆCIANS haue taken it, comming of this word Euan, w is a voice and song of ioy, although they did vse also to accompanie the Captaines m their entry in this sort, crying and singing Euan: but there were certaine GRÆCIAN would haue fetched the deriuation of this word, from an old common custome they ha were of opinion besides, that part of this honor did appertaine to god Bacchus, whose sur we call Euius, and somtimes Thriambus. Howbeit this is not the true deriuation of the but after this sort. At the great triumphe and entry made, the captaine or generall that m pheth as a conqueror, did offer and sacrifice (by the old orders & ancient customes of R one, or diuerse oxen: where at the second triumphe called the Ouation, he onely sacrifi mutton, which the ROMAINES call in their tongue Ouem, and thereof was it called Ou And here by the way is to be noted, the difference betwixt the law maker of the Roma lawes & customes, and the law maker of the LACEDÆMONIANS: how both of them w contrary to the other, in appointing their sacrifices for victorie. For at SPARTA, the cap or generall that had done his feate by policie or friendship, the sacrifice he did offer vp gods, was an oxe: and he that by force, and bloudy battell had obtained victory, only o vp a cocke for sacrifice. For though they were very good soldiers, yet they thought bet his seruice, that by his wisedom and wise perswasions obteined victorie: then of his, tha it by valiantnesse, and force of armes. Thus may you see which of these two lawemake best reason in his ordinances. But now to Marcellus againe. He being chosen Consu fourth time, his enemies and euill willers did stirre vp the SYRACVSANS against him, perswaded them to complaine to the Senate of him, that he had cruelly, and vncourte vsed them, contrarie to the ancient league and alliances made long time before with the MALNES. Marcellus being sacrificing one day in the Capitoll, while the Senate were counsell, the SYRACVSANS deputies came before them, and kneeling downe, besought to giue them audience, and that they would do them iustice. The other Consull that was sent rebuked them, being angry they had so maliciously spyed the occasion of Marcel sence. But when Marcellus heard of it, he straight left of all, and came to the Senate, and sate him downe in his Consuls chaire, where he gaue audience as Consull and dispatch uerse causes: when he had done so, he rose out of his chaire, and came downe among ſtanding as a priuate perſon to aunſwer at the barre, as other offenders and men accuſed, ſuffering the SYRACVSANS to alleadge and ſay againſt him what they would. Then were the SYRACVSANS blanck, when they ſaw the maieſty of Marcellus, and his ſtaied countenance in all things: ſo that hauing found him before a very valiant man in warres, and vnconquerable, they found him then a man no leſſe dreadfull in his Conſuls robe: that they hung downe their eyes, and durſt not looke him in the face. Notwithſtanding, they being ſuborned by his enemies, began at the length boldly to accuſe him, and yet with ſorow and lamentation, the effect whereof was this. That they being the ROMAINES friends & confederates, had abidden ſuch iniuries at Marcellus hands, as all other generals neuer offered their very enemies. Whereto Marcellus ſtraight anſwered againe to the contrary. That for many iniuries the ROMAINES had receiued of them, they ſuffred nothing but that, which was vnpoſſible they ſhould not ſuffer, that reſiſted vntill they were taken by force: and yet they might thanke themſelues for any thing they ſuffered, becauſe they would not obey nor conſent, to reaſonable capitulations and articles of peace, which he had oftentimes offered them. And againe, they could not alledge for their excuſe, that the tyrants had compelled them to make warres: when they to the contrary, becauſe they would enter into warres, were contented to bee ſubiect to a tyrant. So, when both parties had ſpokē their minds, the SYRACVSANS (as the maner is) went out of the Senate houſe, and Marcellus alſo, leauing his fellow Conſul in his place in the Senate, & taried without the doore, attending the ſentence of the Senate, neuer altering his countenance nor wonted looke, neither for feare of ſentēce, nor for malice or anger againſt the SYRACVSANS, quietly looking for his iudgement. Afterwards when the Senators voices were gathered together, & that Marcellus was cleared by the moſt voices: then the SYRACVSANS fell downe at his feet weeping, and beſought him not to wreake his anger vpon them that were preſent, and moreouer that he would haue compaſſion of the reſidue of the citizens, who did acknowledge his great grace and fauor extended to them, and confeſſed themſelues bound to him for euer. Marcellus moued with pitty by their intreaty, he pardoned them, & euer after did all the SYRACVSANS what pleaſure he could poſsible. For through his entreaty and requeſt, the Senate did confirme and ratifie his grant vnto them, which was: that they might vſe the liberty and benefit of their owne lawes, and quietly enioy their goods alſo which were left them. To requite this ſpecial grace procured them by Marcellus, the SYRACVSANS gaue him many honors, & among others they made a law, that euer after, as oft as any of Marcellus name or houſe came into SICILE, the SYRACVSANS ſhould keepe a ſolemne feaſt, with garlands on their heads, & ſhould alſo ſacrifice vnto the gods. After this, Marcellus went againſt Hannibal: and whereall the other Conſuls almoſt, & generals, after the ouerthrow at CANNES, had vſed this only policy with him, not to come to battell: he tooke a contrary courſe to them all, thinking that tract of time, (whereby they thought to eate out Hannibals force (was rather a direct conſuming and deſtroying of all ITALIE: & that Fabius Maximus ſtanding too much vpon ſafetie, tooke not the way to cure the diſeaſe & weakneſſe of the commōweale of ROME, looking to end this war, conſuming by litle and litle the ſtrength and power of ROME, committing a fearefull phiſitions fault and errour, being afraide to heale their pacient ſodainly, imagining that to bring them low, doth leſſen the diſeaſe. So, firſt of all he went to beſiege certaine great cities of the SAMNITES, which were reuolted from obedience of the ROMAINES: & thoſe he wan againe with a great prouiſion of corne and money he found in them, beſides 3000 ſouldiers Hannibal left in garriſon there, whom he tooke priſoners. Hannibal after that, hauing ſlain the viceconſull Cneus Fuluius in APVLIA, with eleuen Tribuni militum (to wit, colonels, euery one hauing charge of 1000 footemen) and ouerthrowne the greateſt part of his armie: Marcellus wrote letters to ROME, hoping to comfort the Senate and people, telling he would go thither, and did warrant them he would driue Hannibal out of APVLIA. When the ROMAINS had red his letters, they were nothing the more cōforted, but rather (as Liuie writeth) more afraide and diſcouraged: becauſe they doubted the danger to come would be greater, then the loſſe paſt, taking Marcellus to be a farre greater and better generall, then euer was Fuluius. Neuertheleſſe, Marcellus performing the contents of his letters written to ROME, draue Hannibal out of APVLIA, and made him retire into LVCANIA. And Marcellus finding him in that country, by a city called NVMISTRON, lodged vpon hils, and in places of strength and aduantage: he camped hard by him in the valley, and the next morning he was the first that presented his enemy battell. Hanniball on the other side, came downe into the valley, and they ioyned battell: which was so cruelly fought, and so long time, as it could not be discerned who had the better. For the battell being begun at nine of the clocke in the morning, it was darke night ere they gaue ouer. The next morning by peepe of day, Marcellus set his men againe in battell raye, in the middest of all the dead bodies that lay slaine in the field, and challenged Hanniball, to proue who should haue the field. But Hanniball refused, and marched his way thence: so as Marcellus thereby had good leasure left him to strip his slaine enemies, and also to burie his owne souldiers. When he had finished that, he presently followed his enemie by the foote, who laied many ambushes for him, but he could neuer trap him in any: and in euery encounter or skirmish they had together, Marcellus had euer the better, which wan him great fame and credit. Now time being come about to choose new Consuls, the Senate thought good to send rather for the other Consul that was in SICILE, then to remoue Marcellus thence, who had fought with Hanniball. So when the other Consull was come to ROME, the Senate commaunded him to name Quintus Fuluius Dictator, because the Dictator was neither chosen by the people, nor by the Senate: but one of the Consuls or Praetors in open assembly of the people, nameth such a one Dictator, as he liketh of. Wherefore it is meth, that this word Dictator, came vpon that worde naming: for, Dicere in the ROMAINE tongue, signifieth to name. Howbeit other hold opinion, that he was called Dictator, because he commandeth of himselfe what he will, without the counsell of the Senate, & the voices of the people: and this seemeth to be true, because the commandements of the Senate of Rome are called Edicta, which we GRECIANS call Diatagmata. Now the other Consull and companion of Marcellus being come out of SICILE, he would needs name another Dictator, but him whom the Senate offred him: and because he would not be compelled to do that he was vnwilling to do, he stale away one night, & returned againe into SICILE. Hereupon the people did name and appoint Quintus Fuluius Dictator, and the Senate wrote their letters to Marcellus, to confirme him: which Marcellus did, and authorized the peoples election. So he himselfe was chosen againe Proconsull, for the next yeare following: in the which he hauing conferred with Fabius Maximus about the warres, they were agreed, that Fabius should procure he could win the city of TARENTVM againe: and that Marcellus in the meane time should keepe Hanniball occupied, that he might not come to aide it. This resolution being taken twixt them, Marcellus went to meet Hanniball by the city of CANNVSIVM: who as he changed and shifted lodging, because he would not come to the battell against his will, had Marcellus euer in his eye before him. Insomuch as Hanniball remouing thus his campe, Marcellus plied him so one day with continuall alarums and skirmishes, that he brought him to battell that held all day long till night, and compelled them both to leaue off till the next morning: where Marcellus shewed againe in field by breake of the day, in battell raye. When at Hanniball being in a maruellous rage, he called his souldiers together, and made an oration to them, earnestly mouing them once againe to fight with Marcellus, if euer they had before fought for his sake. You see, said he, that hauing fought so many battels, & gotten such victories as we haue done, we cannot yet take breath as we would, nor be in quiet, how much euer we win, if we driue not away yonder fellow Marcellus. When Hanniball had ended his oration to the CARTHAGINIANS, he led them on to the battell: where Marcellus, to no purpose, & out of time, would needs shew Hanniball a stratagem of war, that turned himself to worst. For Marcellus perceiuing the right wing of his armie distressed, made one of his legions that was set in ray in the rereward of his hoast, to marche to the front of his battell, to succour those that needed aide. But this remouing of the legion, troubled them that fought, and gaue the enemies the victorie: who slue that day two thousand seuen hundred of the ROMAINES. So, when Marcellus was come againe into his campe, he straight called his souldiers before him, to whome he spake in this maner: that he saw a great deale of armor, and bodies of men, but he could see no ROMAINES. The ROMAINES hearing him say so, besought him to pardon the faulte they had committed. Marcellus aunswered, he would neuer pardon them so long as they were ouercome: but when they ouercame againe, he was content to remit all. So the next morning he agreed to bring thē againe to fight with the enemy, that such as were at Rome should rather heare newes of their victory, then of their running away. When he had said, he appointed they should giue those bands that first turned their backes to Hannibal, barely for wheate. So, as there were many of them in great daunger of their liues, for the sore wounds they had giuen them in the battell: yet was there not a man of them, but Marcellus words did more grieue them then the grieuous wounds they had. The next morning betimes was set out of the generals tent, the coate armour died in skarlet, which is the ordinary signe of battell: and the bands that had receiued dishonor the day before, were placed at their owne request in the front of the battell. The other Captaines besides, that were not ouerthrowen, did leade their bands also to the field, and did set them in battell ray. Hannibal hearing of that, cried out: O gods, what a man is this, that can not be quiet, neither with good nor ill fortune? for he is the onely odde man, that neuer giueth rest to his enemy, when he hath ouercome him: nor taketh any for him selfe when he is ouercome. We shall neuer haue done with him, for any thing that I see, sith shame, whether he win or lose, doth still prouoke him to be bolder and valianter. After orations made of both sides, both armies marched forwards to ioyne battell. The Romaines being as strong as the Carthaginians, Hannibal put his Elephants in the voward and front of his battell, and commanded his men to driue them vppon the Romaines: and so they did. Which in deed did somewhat trouble and disorder the first rankes of the Romaines: vntill such time as Flauius, Tribune of the souldiers, tooke an ensigne in his hands, and marched before the beasts, and gaue the first of them such a thrust with the point of his ensigne, that he made her turne backe. The first beast being turned backe thus, ran vpon the second that followed her, and the second made the third goe backe also, and so from one to an other, vntill they all turned. Marcellus perceiuing that, commaunded his horsemen to set vpon the enemies with all the fury they could, in that place where he saw thē, somewhat troubled with these beasts, that turned bake againe vpon them: and that they should driue them further in amongest them. Which they did, and gaue so hotte a charge vppon the Carthaginians, that they made them turne their backes and run away, and they pursued them still, killing them downe right, euen to their campe side: where was the greatest slaughter of all, by reason their Elephantes that were wounded, fell downe starke dead within the gate of their campe. And they say of the Carthaginians there were slaine at this battell, aboue eight thousand, and of the Romaines onely three thousand: howbeit all the rest of them for the most part were very sore hurt. Which fell out very well for Hannibal, that hee might march away at his pleasure, as he did that night, and got him away far off from Marcellus, as knowing he was not in state to follow him ouer sodainely, because of his great number of hurt men in his campe: and so by smal iournies he went into Campania, where he lay in garrison all the sommer, in the city of Sinvesse, to heale the wounds of his sore mangled souldiers. Hannibal hauing now gotten him selfe at the length out of Marcellus hands, and hauing his army free to serue him as he thought good: he burned and destroied al Italy where he went and stood no more in feare of any thing. This made Marcellus ill spoken off at Rome, and caused his enemies to take hold of such a matter against him: for they straight raised Publius Bibulus Tribune, to accuse him, who was a hot harebrained man, but very eloquent, and could deliuer his mind very wel. So his Bibulus called the people oft to counsaile, & told them there, that they must needs call home Marcellus, and appoint some other to take charge of the army: for as for him, sayd he, because he hath fought a litle with Hannibal (and as a man might say, wrestled a litle with him) he is now gotten to the bathes to solace him selfe. But Marcellus hearing this, left his Lieutenants in the campe, and went him selfe to Rome, to aunswer to the vntrue accusations layed against him, and there he perceiued at his comming, how they intended to prosecute the matter, against him vppon these informations. So a day of hearing was appointed for his matter, and the parties came before the people assembled in counsaile, in the great lists or shew place, called Circus Flaminius, to giue iudgement. There Publius Bibulus the Tribune, sitting in his chaire, layed open his accusation with great circumstance: and Marcellus, when Bibulus had told his tale, aunswered him in few wordes, and very discretely, only touching his purgation. But the noble and chiefeſt men of the city, roſe vp and ſpake on Marcellus behalfe, telling the people plainely, that they did Marcellus wrong, to reckon worſe his valiantnes, then their enemy did: and to iudge of him as a coward, conſidering Hannibal only fled from him, of all other Captaines, and would by no meanes fight with him, neuer refuſing to fight with any other whatſoeuer. Theſe perſwaſions tooke ſuch effect, as wher Marcellus accuſer looked for his condēnation: Marcellus to the cōtrary, was not only cleared of accuſation, but furthermore they choſe him Conſull againe the fift time. So being entred his office he went firſt into THVSCAN: where viſiting the good cities one after an other, quieting them, he pacified a great ſedition in the country, when they were all ready to riſe rebel. Afterwards at his returne, he thought to conſecrat the temple of honor & vertue, which he had built with the ſpoiles he got in the warres of SICILE. But the Prieſtes were againſt ſaying, two goddes might not be in one church. Thereupon he built another temple, and ioined it to the firſt, being very angry the Prieſts denied ſo his conſecration: and he did take it an euill token, beſides diuers other ſigns in the element that afterwards appeared, and troubled him much. For there were many temples ſet on fire with lightning at one time: and there and miſe did gnaw the gold, that was in the chappell of Iupiter Capitoline. And it is reported alſo, that an oxe did ſpeake: and a child came out of the head of an Elephant, and that the child was aliue. Furthermore, the Prieſts and Soothſayers ſacrificing to the gods, to withdraw the euill from them, theſe ſiniſter tokens did threaten: they could neuer finde any fauourable ſigne in their ſacrifices. Whereuppon they ſought to keepe Marcellus ſtill at ROME, who had maruellous earneſt deſire to be gone with ſpeede to the warres: for neuer man longed for a thing ſo much, as Marcellus did, to fight with Hannibal. Inſomuch he neuer dreamed of other thing in the night, nor ſpake of any matter elſe in the day to his friends and companions, praied to the gods for any other thing, but that he might fight with Hannibal in the field. I thinke he would willingliеſt haue fought a priuate combat with him, in ſome walled city or incloſed liſtes for the combat. And had it not bene that he had already won him ſelfe a great fame, and ſhewed him ſelfe to the world, (by ſundry great proofs and experience of his doings) a graue, skilfull, and a valiant Captaine as any man of his time: I would haue ſaid it had been pang of youth, & a more ambitious deſire, then became a man of his age, who was three ſcore yeare old at that time, when they made him Conſull againe the fift time. Neuertheles, after he had ended all his propitiatory ſacrifices and purifications, ſuch as the Soothſayers had appointed: he departed from ROME with his fellow Conſull Quintus Criſpinus to the wars. He found Hannibal lying betweene the cities of BANCIA, and VENOVSA, and ſought all the meanes he could to procure him to fight, but he could neuer get him to it. Howbeit Hannibal being aduertiſed by ſpials, that the Cōſuls ſent an army to beſiege the city of the LOCRIANS, ſurnamed EPIZEPHYRIANS: (as ye would ſay) the occidentals, becauſe the GRECIANS, in reſpect of the ITALIANS, are called the orientals:) he laid an ambuſh for them that went, vnder the hil of PETILIVM, which was directly in their way, where he ſlew about two thouſand fiue hundred ROMAINES. That ouerthrow did ſet Marcellus on fire, and made him more deſirous of battell: wherupon he remoued his campe from the place he lay in, and marched nearer to his enemie. Betweene their two campes there was a prety litle hill, ſtrong of ſituation, a wilde thing not growen with wod, and there were high hillocks. From whence they might diſcerne the way, both the one and the others campe, and at the foote of the ſame ran prety ſprings: ſo much as the ROMAINS wondered, that Hannibal cōming thither firſt, did not take that place, but had left it to his enemies. Howbeit Hannibal was crafty enough, leauing it of purpoſe: for it was commodious to lodge his campe in, ſo it ſerued his turne better for an ambuſh. So he had led the wod, the hollow places, and the vallies there about, with ſtore of ſhot and ſpeares, aſſuring him ſelfe that the place would intiſe the ROMAINS thither: & in deed he geſſed right: for ſo fell it out. Straight there flue a rumor abroad in the ROMAINES campe, that there was a paſſing place to lodge in, & euery man tooke vpō him like a skilfull ſouldier, to tell what aduantage they ſhould haue vpon their enemies by taking that place, and ſpecially if they did lodge there, or otherwiſe built a fort vpon it. Whereupon Marcellus determined to go ſee the place himſelf, taking a few horſemē with him. Notwithſtāding, before he would take horſe, he led for his Soothsaier to sacrifice to the gods. The first beast that was sacrificed, the Soothsaier shewed Marcellus the liuer of it without a head. The second beast sacrificed, had a faire great head of a liuer, and all the other parts were also sound, and very new: that by them it appeared al the feare of the first signs and tokens were taken away. Yet the Soothsaiers on the other side sayd, it did make them worse afraid then before: for these so fauorable and lucky tokens of the sacrifice, following immediatly after the first foule & naughty signes, made them doubt them much by reason of so strange and sodaine an alteration. But as the Poet Pindarus saieth. Ill signes to Marcellus.

Marcellus the first that brought in sumptuous & curious tables and pictures into Rome, of the spoyle of Syracuse.

nor whatsoeuer other thing, is here this earth vpon:
Can keepe abacke the course of fatall destiny, nor yet resist the due decrees, which come from heauen on high.)

So Marcellus tooke his horse, with Quintus Crispinus his fellow Consull, and his son one of the Tribunes of the souldiers, hauing onely two hundred and twenty horsemen with him, of the which there was not one ROMAINE among them, but al were THVSCANS, sauing forty FREGELLANIANS, who from the beginning of these warres had alwaies shewed themselues very faithfull and louing to Marcellus. The hill we spake of before, being thicke couered with wodde and bushes, the enemies had set a skout to watch on the top of it, to giue warning if they saw any comming towards it. The ROMAINES could not see him, and he on the other side might see euen into their campe, and perceiue what was done, as he did aduertise those at that time that lay in ambush for Marcellus comming: and they suffered him to passe on, vntill he came directly against them. Then they shewed vpon the sodaine, and compassing in Marcellus, they both shot and strake at him, some following them that fledde, and other fighting with the forty FREGELLANIANS which onely stucke to it: who came roundly in together (notwithstanding the THVSCANS were fled) vpon the first crie they heard, to defend the two Consuls, vntill such time as the Consull Crispinus hauing two woundes on his body with a dart, did turne his horse to flie. And with that, one of the enemies gaue Marcellus such a sore blow with a speare hauing a broade iron head, that he ranne him quite through. The FREGELLANIANS that were left aliue, being but a few in number, seeing Marcellus slaine, left him lying on the ground, and tooke his sonne away with them that was very sore hurt, and by the swiftnesse of their horses recouered their campe, and saued them selues. At this ouerthrow, there were not slaine aboue forty men, and fiue and twenty taken prisoners, of which, fiue of them were the Consuls sergeants, and their officers that caried axes before them, and the other were all horsemen. Within few daies after, the other Consull Crispinus died also of his burts, which was such a misfortune, as neuer came before to the ROMAINES, that both their Consuls were slaine at one battell. Now Hannibal made no great reckonning of all that were slaine, or taken at this field: but when he heard that Marcellus selfe was slaine at this ouerthrow, he went him selfe straight to the place to see him. So when he had viewed his body a great while, standing hard by it, and considering his strength, his stature, and countenance, hauing taken full view of all the parts of him, he spake no proud word against him, nor shewed any glad countenance, as some other would haue done, that had slaine so valiaunt and dangerous an enemy: but wondering how he came to be slaine so strangely there, he tooke of his ring from one of his fingers that sealed his letters, and giuing his body buriall according to his estate, made it to be honorably burnt; and then put all his bones and ashes into a siluer pot, in which he him selfe put a crown of gold, and sent it vnto Marcellus sonne. It fortuned so, that certaine light horsemen of the NVMIDIANS met with them that caried this siluer potte, and would haue taken it from them by force: but they stoode to it, and would not part with it, and so fighting and striuing together for it, the bones & ashes were scattered all about. Hannibal hearing this, said to them that were about him: see, how nothing can be, which the gods will not. So he punished the NVMIDIANS, and cared no more to get Marcellus bones together, but perswaded him selfe it was the will of the gods he should die so strangely, and that his body should haue no burial. Cornelius Nepos, and Valerius Maximus write it thus: but Liuie, & Augustus Cæsar say, that the pot was caried vnto his son, & honorably buried: Marcellus did cō- crat many monuments in diuers places, besides those at ROME. As at CATANA in SICILE: a place for young men to exercise them selues in. In the ile of SAMOTHRACIA, in the temple of the gods called Cabires: many images and tables he brought from SYRACVSE. And in the Ile of LINDOS, in the temple of Minerua, where among other, there is a statue of him, this epigramme grauen vnder it, as Posidonius the Philosopher writeth.

O thou my friend (I say) which passeth forth by me, of Claudius Marcellus here, the image maiest thou see:
whose family at Rome, was of the noblest name.
Seuen times he Consull chosen was, in which he ouercame, great numbers infinite, (in open field and fight) of such as sought his countrtries spoile, and put them all to flight.

Marcellus posterity. The author of this epigramme reckoneth, the two times of his being viceconsull, for the whole Consulshippes: but his posterity continued alwaies in great honour, vnto Marcellus the sonne of Octauia, (Augustus Cæsars sister) and of Caius Marcellus. He died a young man, being Ædilis of ROME, and maried vnto Iulia, Augustus daughter, with whom hee liued a long time. But to honor the memory of him, Octauia his mother built the library, and Augustus Cæsar the Theater, which are called to this day, Marcellus Theater and library.

THE COMPARISON OF Marcellus with Pelopidas.

Pelopidas and Marcellus acts in warres. THese are the greatest things and best worthy of memory (in my opinion) of all Pelopidas and Marcellus doings: and for their manners naturall conditions otherwise, they were all one, because they were both valiant, painefull, and noble minded: sauing that this difference only was betweene them. That Marcellus in many cities he won by assault, did cruelly murder them, and spilt much blood: where Epaminondas and Pelopidas contrarily did neuer put any to the sword they ouercame, neither did they take away the liberty from any they tooke: and it is thought the THEBANS would not haue Marcellus acts preferred before Pelopidas. led the ORCHOMENIANS so cruelly as they did, if one, or both of thē had bene present. Now for their acts, it was a noble and wonderfull peece of seruice that Marcellus did, with so few company of horsemen as he tooke with him, to ouerthrow so great company of horsemen footemen both, of the GAVLES: a thing that neuer Generall but himselfe did, and specially that slew with his owne handes in the field, the Generall of his enemies. Which Pelopidas could neuer attaine vnto, for he seeking to kill Alexander the tyrant of PHERES, was slaine himselfe, and suffered that, which he desired to haue done to an other. And yet for that seruice may be obiected, the battels of LEVCTRES, and of TEGYRA, which were both fam-

and notable. But to encounter with those, there was no notable ambush or secret practise done by Marcellus, that was any thing like comparable to that Pelopidas did at his returne from exile, when he slew the tyrants that kept THEBES in bondage. For that was as notable a policy and sodain an enterprise stolen vpō, as none was euer greater, or more famous. It is true Marcellus was yoked with Hannibal, who was a dreadfull and a violent enemy. so were the THEBANS also at that very time with the LACEDÆMONIANS, who notwithstanding were ouercome of Pelopidas, at the battels of TEGYRA, and of LEVCTRES. Whereas Marcellus did neuer so much as once ouercome Hannibal, as Polybius writeth, but remained vnconquered alwaies, vntil that Scipio ouercame him in battel. Notwithstanding, we do giue best credit to the reports of Cæsar, Liuie, Cornelius Nepos, and of king Iuba among the GREGIANS; who write, that Marcellus otherwhile did ouerthrow certaine of Hannibals cōpanies, howbeit they were neuer no great ouerthrowes to speake of, and it seemeth rather, it was through some mockery & deceit of that AFRICAN then otherwise. Yet sure it was a great matter, and worthy much commendation, that the ROMAINS were brought to that courage, as they durst abide to fight with the CARTHAGINIANS, hauing lost so many great ouerthrows, and hauing so many generals of their armies slaine in battell, and hauing the whole Empire of ROME in so great danger of vtter destruction. For it was Marcellus only of al other generals, that put the ROMAINS in hart againe, after so great and long a feare throughly rooted in them: & incoraged the souldiers also too long to fight with their enemy, and not only to hope, but to assure them selues of victory. For, wher by reason of their continuall losses and fearefull ouerthrowes they had, they thought them selues happy men to escape Hannibals hands by running away: he taught them to be ashamed to flie like cowards, to confesse they were in distresse, to retire, & leaue the field, before they had ouercome their enemies. And where Pelopidas was neuer ouercome in battell being generall, and Marcellus did ouercome more then any general in his time: it might seeme therefore that the great number of the victories of the one, should compare with the good hap of the other that was neuer ouercome. It is true that Marcellus tooke the city of SYRACVSA, and Pelopidas failed of taking the city of SPARTA: but yet do I thinke, that it was more valiant-ly done of Pelopidas to come so neare SPARTA as he did, and that hee was the first that passed the riuer of EVROTAS with an army, which neuer enemy did before him, then it was of Marcellus to win all SICILE. Vnlesse some peraduenture will say againe, this was Epaminondas, not Pelopidas act, as also in the victory of LEVCTRES: where no man liuing can pretend any part of glory to the doings of Marcellus. For he tooke SYRACVSA, being only generall alone, and did ouerthrow the GAVLES without his fellow Consull, and fought with Hannibal, without any mans helpe or incouragement: (for all other were against it, and perswaded the contrarie) and he was the first that altered the maner of wars the ROMAINES vsed then, and that trayned his souldiers, that they durst fight with the enemy. For their death, I neither commend the one nor the other, and the strangenes of either of their deaths doth grieue me maruellously: as I do greatly wonder also, how Hannibal in so many battels as he fought (which are innumerable) could alwaies scape vnhurt. I can not but greatly commend also the valiantnes of one Chrysantas, whom Xenephon speaketh of in his booke of the institution of Cyrus, saying: that he hauing lift vp his sword in his hand ready to kill one of his enemies, and hearing the trumpet sound the retreate, he softly retired, and would not strike him. Howbeit it seemeth Pelopidas is more to be excused: for beside he was very hot and desirous of battell, yet his anger was honorable and iust, and moued him to seeke reuenge. For as the Poet Euripides saieth:

The best that may betide, is when a captaine liues, and doth suruiue the victories, which he with force atchieues, But if he needs must fall, then let him valiauntly euen thrust amid the thickest throng, and there with honor die.

For so becōmeth his death famous, & not dishonorable. But now, besides Pelopidas iust cause of anger, yet was there another respect that most pricked him forward, to do that he did: for he saw his victory ended, in the death of the tyraunt. Otherwise he should hardly haue found so noble an occasion to haue shewed his valiantnes, as in that. And Marcellus contrarily, without any instant necessity, and hauing no cause of heate or choller, (which putteth al men valiant in

The end of Marcellus life.

THE LIFE OF Ariſtides.

Ariſtides wealth.

Riſtides the ſon of Lyſimachus, was certainly of the tribe of An[tio] des, and of the towne of ALOPECIA. But for his goods and w[ea] they diuerſly write of him. For ſome ſay, he liued poorly all the of his life, and that he left two daughters, which by reaſon o[f] pouerty, liued vnmaried many yeares after their fathers death. many of the oldeſt writers do confirme that for troth. Yet Dem[etrius] Phalerius, in his booke intituled Socrates, writeth the contrary he knew certaine lands Ariſtides had in the village of PHA[LERUM] hich did yet beare the name of Aristides landes, in the which his bodie is buried. And rthermore, to shewe that hee was well to liue, and that his house was rich and wealthie, bringeth foorth these proofes. First, that he was one yeare Maior or prouost of ATHENS, hom they called, Archon Eponymos, because the yeare tooke the name of him that had it arely. And they say he came to it, by drawing of the beane, according to the auncient vse the ATHENIANS, and their wonted manner of making their election of the said office: In hich election none were admitted to drawe the beane, but such as were highest set in their sidie bookes, according to the value & rate of their goods, whom they called at ATHENS, ntatosomedimnes, as you would say, those that might despend fiue hundred bushels of wheat the yeare, and vpwards. Secondly, he alleageth he was banished by the Ostracism, which nisheth the nobilitie and great rich men onely, whom the common people enuie, because heir greatnesse, and neuer dealeth with poore men. The third and last reason he makes is, he left of his gift, threefooted stooles in the temple of Bacchus, which those do common- offer vp, as haue won the victorie in comedies, tragedies, or other such like pastimes, wher- they themselues had borne the charge. And those threefooted stooles remaine there yet, hich they say were giuen by Aristides, and haue this inscription vpon them: The tribe of ntiochides wanne the victorie, Aristides defraied the charges of the games, and Archestratus Poet taught them to play his comedies. This last reason, though it seeme likeliest of m all, yet is it the weakest of the rest. For Epaminondas (whom euery man knoweth was ore euen from his birth, and alwaies liued in great pouertie) and Plato the Philosopher, ke vpon him to defray the charges of games that were of no small expence, the one ha- g borne the charges of flute plaiers at THEBES, and the other the daunce of the children ich daunced in a round at ATHENS: towardes the furnishing of which charges Dion the RACVSAN gaue Plato money, & Pelopidas also gaue Epaminondas money. Now, this is not ken that vertuous men should alwaies refuse the gifts of their friends, and that they might in some sort accept their friends courtesie offered them: but because they should thinke it omely and dishonorable for them, to take any thing to enrich themselues, or to spare and de vp. Howbeit where there is any honorable act to be done, or any publike shew to be le, not tending to their priuate benefite: in such a case they should not refuse their friendes ing offer, and goodwill towards them. And where Demetrius saith the threefooted stoole offered vp in the temple of Bacchus, Panatius declareth plainely, that Demetrius was de- ed by the semblance of the name. For since the time of the warres of the MEDES, vnto beginning of the warre of PELOPONNESVS, in all the registers and recordes kept of the iers of the charges of common playes, there were founde but two men bearing name ristides that obtained victory: & neither of them both was sonne vnto Lysimachus, whom write of at this present. For the one is expressely named the sonne of Xenophilus, and the r was long after the same Aristides we now speake of: as appeareth easily by the writing orthographie, which is according to the grammer rules, we haue vsed in GREECE euer Euclides time. Moreouer it is easie to be knowen, by the name of the Poet Archestratus is adioyned to it. For there is no man that maketh mention of a Poet of this name, in all warres of the MEDES: but in the time of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, many doe put in for an author and maker of rimes and songes that were sung in common daunces. Yet ll Panatius obiections, the matter is to be better looked into, and considered of. But for Ostracism banishment, it is true, that such as were great men in estimation aboue the mon people, either in fame, nobilitie, or eloquence, they onely were subiect vnto this ba- ment. For Damon himselfe, being Pericles schoolemaster, was banished: onely because ommon people thought him too wise. Moreouer, Idomeneus writeth, that Aristides was prouost for a yeare, not by lot of beanes, but by voices of the ATHENIANS that chose And if he were prouost since the iorney of PLATEES, as Demetrius writeth: it is likely gh that they did him this honour, for his great vertue and notable seruice, which other e wont to obtaine for their riches. But this Demetrius doth not only defend Aristides, but Socrates pouertie, as if it were a foule vice and reproch to be poore. For he writeth, that ad not only a house of his owne, but also threescore and ten Minas at vsurie, which Criton gaue him interest for. But now to our story again. Aristides was Clisthenes very friend, [illegible] restored the gouernment at ATHENS after the expulsion of the thirty tyrantes, and did [illegible] rence Lycurgus the Lawmaker of the LACEDÆMONIANS for his lawes, aboue all the [illegible] his time: and therefore he euer fauored the state of Aristocratia, that is, where the nobles rule, and haue the soueraignty. Howbeit he euer had Themistocles (Neocles sonne) his [illegible] all aduersarie, as taking part with the contrarie, and defending the popular state of [illegible] ment. Some say, that being schollers, and brought vp together, they were euer contrary to another in all their actions and doings, were it in sport, or in matters of earnest: and after, men beganne to see the naturall inclination of them both, by their contrary affections. For Themistocles was quicke, nimble, aduenturous, and subtill, and would venter on any vpon light occasion. Aristides contrariwise was very quiet, temperate, constant and [illegible] lous well staied, who would for no respect be drawen away from equitie and iustice, [illegible] would lie, flatter, nor abuse any bodie, though it were but in sport. Notwithstanding [illegible] of CHIO writeth, that their malice beganne first of light loue, and that it grew to [illegible] by processe of time betwene them: for (saith he) both the one and the other of them [illegible] loue with Stesilaus, borne in the Ile of CEOS. This fond light loue of theirs, fell not easily them, nor the enuie they conceiued one against another, but continued against each [illegible] matters of state: such was their malice towardes one another. In which calling, Themistocles sought the way to winne friendes, by whose meanes he came to great preferment [illegible] time, and had made himselfe very strong by them. Therefore, when a friend of his told one day, he was worthy to gouerne the citie of ATHENS, and were very fit for it, if he indifferent, and not partiall. The goddes forbid (quoth he) I should euer occupie the place gouernour, where my friends should not finde more fauour then straungers, that doe pleasure. But Aristides taking another course by himselfe, would not stand vpon his [illegible] in gouernment. First, because he would do no man wrong, with pleasuring his friends yet would anger them, by denying their requestes. Secondly, because he saw many rude men of authoritie bold to doe iniustice, and manifest wrong, bearing themselues vp friendes: but he caried this opinion, that no honest man, or good citizen, should trust bolstring of friends, but to his owne iust and vpright doings. Notwithstanding, Aristides ceiuing that Themistocles did rashly alter many things, and euer encountered all his [illegible] hindered his doings: he was enforced sometime to crosse Themistocles againe, and [illegible] against that he preferred, partly to be euen with him, but most to hinder his credite [illegible] thoritie, which increased still through the peoples fauour and goodwils towards him king it better by contrarying him a litle to disappoint somtime a thing that might [illegible] out well for the common wealth, rather then by giuing him the head, to suffer him [illegible] too great. To conclude, it fortuned on a time that Themistocles hauing preferred a matter profitable for the common wealth, Aristides was so much against it, as Themistocles tooke no place. Moreouer Aristides was so earnest against him, that when the counsell vp after Themistocles motion was reiected, he spake it openly before them all: that the mon wealth of ATHENS would neuer prosper, vntill they both were laide in Barathrum, which was a prison or hole, wherein they put all theeues and condemned men. At time, Aristides moued a matter to the people, which diuerse were against, but yet it was him. And when the iudge or president of the counsell did put it to the people, to know allowance of it: Aristides perceiuing by the arguments made against it, that the matter preferred was hurtfull to the common wealth, he gaue it ouer, and would not haue it. Manie times also Aristides spake by other men, when he would haue a thing goe for feare least Themistocles spight towardes him, would hinder the benefite of the [illegible] wealth. They found him very constant and resolute in matters of state, whatsoeuer [illegible] which wanne him great commendation. For he was neuer the prouder for any honor gaue him, nor thought himselfe disgraced for any ouerthrow he receiued: being alwaies this minde, that it was the dutie of an honest citizen, to be euer readie to offer his bodie life to do his countrie seruice, without respect and hope of reward of money, or for honor glory. Therefore when certaine verses were repeated in the Theater, of one of the tragedies Æschilus made in commendation of the auncient Soothsayer Amphiaraus, to this effect.

He will not only seeme a iust man by his face, but iust indeede he will be found, and vertue still embrace:
With all his thought and soule, from whence there may proceede, graue counsels for to beautifie, his countries crowne indeede.

All the people straight cast their eyes vpon Aristides, as vpon him, that in truth aboue all ther most deserued the praise of so great a vertue. For he was so stout and resolute, not only inst fauour and friendship: but to reiect hate and anger also. For in case of iustice, neither ld friendshippe make him go away for his friends sake: nor enuie could moue him to doe ustice, to his very enemie. For proofe hereof it is written, that he had an enemie of his in e of law, and did prosecute it to iudgement: insomuch as after the plaintiff was read, the iudges re so angrie with the offender, that without any more hearing of him, they would haue n sentence against him. But Aristides rising from his place, went and kneeled at the iudges e with the offendor his enemie, and besought them to giue him leaue to speake, to iustifie d defende his cause, according to the course of the law. An other time he being iudge be- ene two priuate men that pleaded before him, one of them said vnto him: Aristides, this ow mine aduersarie here, hath done you great iniurie. My friend (quoth Aristides againe) I thee tell me onely the iniurie he hath done thee, for I am iudge here to do thee right, and my selfe. Moreouer, he being chosen high treasurer of all the reuenues of Athens, did late that all the officers before him, and other his late predecessors, had greatly robbed spoiled the common treasure, but specially Themistocles: who was a wise man, & of great gement, but yet somewhat light fingered. Therefore when Aristides was to giue vppe his ount, Themistocles, and many other suborned by him, were against him, and accused him abusing his office, and followed him so hard, that through their practise they condemned , as Idomeneus writeth. Yet the noblest citizens seeing what iniurie they offered Aristides, e his cause in hande, and found meanes to procure the people not onely to release the imposed vpon him, but to restore him againe to his office of high treasurer for the yeare owing: in the which he seemed to repent his former straightnesse and gouernement the re before, and so deale more fauourably with those he had to doe, and would not examine y thing so straightly as he did before. Whereupon such as were theeues and stealers of the sure of the common wealth, did maruellously praise and like him, and became suters for to continue in the office. But whē the day of election came, that the Athenians would ose him againe, Aristides selfe reproued them, and said. When I faithfully discharged the ie of mine office committed to me by you, I then receiued shame and reproch at your des: and now that I haue dissembled, not seeming to see the thestes and robberies done n your treasure, ye claw me, and say I am an honest man, and a good citizen. But I would knew it, and I tell you plainely, I am more ashamed of the honour you do me now, then I s of the fine you did set vpon me, when you condemned me the last yeare: and I am sorie peake it, that you should thinke it more commendation to pleasure the wicked, then to serue the common wealth. After he had spoken these words, and had bewrayed the com- thefts the officers of the citie did commit: he stopped the theeues mouthes that so high- raised and commended him for so honest a man, but yet of the noble and honest citizens was much commended. Furthermore, on a time when Dathis Lieutenant to Darius king of rsia, was come with all his nauie to go a land about Marathon, in the country of At- a, vpon pretence (as he said) to be reuenged only of the Athenians that had burnt the e of Sardis, but indeede of mind to conquer all Greece, and to destroy the whole coun- before him: the Athenians chose tenne Captaines to go to the warres, among whom iltiades was the chiefest man of authoritie. But Aristides drew very neere him in reputation credite, because he did very good seruice in obtaining the victorie, specially when he a- d with Miltiades in counsell, to giue battell vpon the barbarous people: and also when willingly gaue Miltiades the whole rule and order of the armie. For euery one of the ten ptaines did by turnes leade the whole armie for one whole day: and when Aristides turne e about, he gaue his preferment thereof vnto Miltiades, teaching his other companions, that it was no shame, but honour for them to be ruled by the wisest. Thus by his example appeased all strife that might haue growen among them, and perswaded them all to be contented to follow his direction and counsell, that had best experience in warre. And so much aduance Miltiades honor. For after that Aristides had once yeelded his authoritie him, euery one of the rest did the like when it came to their turne: and so they all submitted themselues vnto his rule and leading. But on the day of the battell, the place where the ATHENIANS were most combred, was in the middest of the battell, where they had set the tribe of the Leontides, and of Antiochides: for thither the barbarous people did bend all their force, made their greatest fight in that place. By which occasion, Themistocles and Aristides fought one hard by an other, for that the one was of the tribe Leontides, and the other of Antiochides: they valiantly fought it out with the enemies, enuying one another: so as the barbarous people at the last being ouerthrowen, they made them flie, and draue them to their shippes: when they were imbarked & gone, the Captaines of the ATHENIANS perceiuing they were not towardes the Iles which was their direct course to returne into ASIA, but that they were driuen backe by storme of winde and pyrries of the sea, towardes the coast of Attica and the citie of ATHENS, fearing least they might find ATHENS vnfurnished for defence, might set vpon it: they thereuppon sent away presently nine tribes that marched thither with such speede, as they came to ATHENS the very same day, and left Aristides in the city of MARATHON, with his tribe and countrie men, to looke to the prisoners and spoyle wonne of the barbarous people. Who nothing deceiued the opinion they had of him. For notwithstanding there was great store of gold and siluer, much apparell, money, and other infinite goods and riches in all their tentes and pauillions, and in the shippes: he had taken of theirs: he was not so couetous as once to touch them, nor to suffer any to meddle with them, vnlesse by stealth some prouided for themselues. As amongest others was one Callias, one of Ceres Priestes, called Dadouchos, as you would say the torch bearer (for in the secret sacrifices of Ceres, his office was to holde the torch) whom when the barbarous people saw, and how he wate a band about his head, and long haire, he tooke for some king, and falling on his knees at his feete, kissed his hand, and shewed him great store of golde he hadhidden and buried in a ditch. But Callias, like a most cruell, and couetous wretch of all other on the earth, tooke away the gold, and killed the poore soule that shewed him the place, becausse hee should not tell it to others. Hereof it commeth, that the comicall Poets do call those that came of him in mockerie, Laccoplutes, as made rich by them: because of the golde that Callias found in it. Immediatly after this battell, Aristides was chosen prouost of ATHENS for the yeare: albeit Demetrius Phalerius writeth, that it was a little before his death, after the iorney of PLATEES. For in their Chronicles, where they set downe their prouosts of ATHENS for the yere, since Xanthippides time, there appeareth no mention of Aristides in that yeare, that Mardonius the king of PERSIANS Lieutenant was ouerthrowen by PLATEES, which was many yeares after. But contrariwise they find Aristides enrolled among the prouostes immediatly after Phanippus, in the yeare the battell was fought at MARATHON. Now the people did most commende Aristides iustice, as of all other vertues and qualities: becausse that vertue is most common & in vse in our life, and doth most benefite to men. Hereof it came, that he being a meane man, obteined the name that one could haue, to be called by the whole citie, a iust man. This surname euer desired of kings, princes, nor of tyrantes, but they alwaies delighted to be surnamed Poliorcetes, to say, conquerors of cities: other Cerauni, to say, lightning or terrible, Tanores, to say, subduers: and some other, Aeti and Hieraces, to say Eagles or Faulcons, like birdes that prey: desiring rather (as it should appeare by those surnames) the reputation growing by force and power, then the commendation that riseth by goodnesse. And notwithstanding, God whom men desire most to be likened to, excell all humaine nature in three speciall things: in immortalitie, in power, and in reason: which three, vertue is the most honorable and pretious thing. For as the natural Philosophers reason, all the foure elements and Vacuum, are immortall and vncorruptible, and for power, earthquakes, lightning, terrible stormes, running riuers, and inundawaters: but as for iuſtice and equitie, no man is partaker of them, ſaue only God, by meanes of reaſon and vnderſtanding. Therefore, becauſe men commonly haue three ſundry honors to the gods: the firſt, that they thinke them bleſſed: the ſecond, that they feare them: the third, that they reuerence them: it appeareth then that they thinke them bleſſed, for the eternitie and immortalitie of their godhead: that they feare them, becauſe of their omnipotencie and power: and that they loue and worſhip them, for their iuſtice and equitie. And yet notwithſtanding, of thoſe three, men doe couet immortalitie, which no fleſh can attaine vnto: and alſo power, which dependeth moſt vpon fortune: and in the meane time they leaue vertue alone, whereof the goddes of their goodneſſe haue made vs capable. But here they ſhew themſelues fooles. For iuſtice maketh the life of a noble man, and of one in great authoritie, ſeeme diuine and celeſtiall: where without iuſtice and dealing vniuſtly, his life is moſt beaſtly, and odious to the world. But now againe to Ariſtides. This ſurname of a iuſt man at the beginning, made him beloued of all the people: but afterwardes it turned him to great ill will, and eſpecially by Themiſtocles practiſe. Who gaue it out euery where, that Ariſtides had ouerthrowen all iuſtice, becauſe by conſent of the parties he was euer choſen Arbitrator to end all controuerſies: and how by this meanes he ſecretly had procured the abſolute power of a king, exceeding any guard or ſouldiers about him. The people moreouer being growen very diſſolute and licentious, by reaſon of the victorie of MARATHON, who ſought that all thinges ſhould paſſe by them, and their authoritie: beganne now to miſlike, and to be greatly offended, that any priuate man ſhould go before the reſt in good fame and reputation. Whereupon, they came out of all ſhires of ATTICA into the citie of ATHENS, and ſo baniſhed Ariſtides with the Oſtraciſmon: diſguiſing the enuie they bare to his glory with the name of feare of tyrannie. For this manner of baniſhment called Oſtraciſmon, or Exoſtraciſmon, was no ordinarie puniſhment for any fault or offence committed: but to giue it an honeſt cloke, they ſaide it was onely a pulling downe and tying ſhort, of too much greatneſſe and authoritie, exceeding farre the maner and countenance of a popular ſtate. But to tell you truely, it was none otherwiſe, then a gentle mean to qualifie the peoples enuy againſt ſome priuate perſon: which enuy bred no malice to him whoſe greatneſſe did offend them, but onely tended to the baniſhing of him for tenne yeares. But afterwardes that by practiſe, this Oſtraciſmon baniſhment was laide vpon meane men, and malefactors, as vpon Hyperbolus that was the laſt man ſo baniſhed: they neuer after vſed it any more at ATHENS. And by the way, it ſhall not be amiſſe to tell you here, why and wherfore this Hyperbolus was baniſhed. Alcibiades and Nicias were the chiefeſt men of ATHENS at that time, and they both were euer at ſquare together, a common thing amongeſt great men. They perceiuing now by the peoples aſſembling, that they were about to execute the Oſtraciſmon, were maruellouſly affraid it was ment to baniſh one of them: wherfore they ſpake together, and made both their followers friends with ech other, and ioyned them in one tribe together, inſomuch, when the moſt voyces of the people were ready thered to condemne him that ſhould be baniſhed, they found it was Hyperbolus. The people therewith were much offended, to ſee the Oſtraciſmon ſo embaſed and ſcorned, that they neuer after would vſe it againe, and ſo left it off for euer. But briefely to let you vnderſtande what the Oſtraciſmon was, and after what ſort they vſed it, ye are to know: that at a certaine day appointed, euery citizen caried a great ſhell in his hande, whereupon he wrote the name of him he would haue baniſhed, and brought it into a certaine place railed about with wodden barres in the market place. Then, when euery man had brought in his ſhell: the magiſtrates and officers of the citie, did count and tell the number of them. For if there were leſſe then ſixe thouſand citizens, that had thus brought theſe ſhels together: the Oſtraciſmon was not full and perfect. That done, they laid a part euery mans name written in theſe ſhels: and whoſe name they found written by moſt citizens, they proclaimed him by ſound of trumpet, a baniſhed man for tenne yeares, during which time notwithſtanding, the partie did enioy all his goods. Now euery man writing thus his name in a ſhell, whom they would haue baniſhed: it is reported there was a plaine man of the country (very ſimple) that could neither write nor read, who came to Ariſtides (being the firſt man he met with) & gaue him his ſhell, praying him to write Ariſtides name vpon it. He being abaſhed withall, did aske the country man, if Aristides had euer done him any displeasure. No, said the country man, he neuer did me hurt, nor I know him not: but it greeues me to heare euery man call him a iust man. Aristides hearing him say so, gaue him no answere, but wrote his owne name vpon the shell, and deliuered it againe to the country man. But as he went his way out of the citie, he lift vppe his handes to heauen, and made a prayer contrarie to that of Achilles in Homer, beseeching the goddes that the ATHENIANS might neuer haue such troubles in hande, as they should be compelled to call for Aristides againe. Notwithstanding, within three yeares after, when Xerxes king of PERSIA came with his armie through the countries of THESSALY & BOEOTIA, and entred into the heart of the country of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS reuoking the law of their Ostracismon, called home againe all those they had banished, and specially, because they were afraid Aristides would take part with the barbarous people, and that his example should moue many other to doe the like, wherein they were greatly deceiued in the nature of the man. For before that he was called home, he continually trauelled vp and downe, persuading and incouraging the GRECIANS to maintaine and defend their libertie. After that law was repealed, and published, and that Themistocles was chosen the onely Lieutenant generall of ATHENS, he did alwaies faithfully aide and assist him in all things, as well with his counsell as also with his counsell: and thereby wanne his enemie great honour, because it stood vpon the safetie and preseruation of his countrie. For when Eurybiades, generall of the armie of the GRÆCIANS, had determined to forsake the Ile of SALAMINA, and that the gallies of the barbarous people were come into the middest of the seas, and had enuironed the Iles all about & the mouth of the arme of the straight of SALAMINA, before any man knew they were inclosed in: Aristides departing out of the Ile of AEgina with a maruellous boldnesse, went through the middest of all the barbarous shippes and fleete, and by good happe gotte into night into Themistocles tent, and calling him out, spake with him there in this sort: Themistocles, if we be both wise, it is high time we should now leaue off this vaine enuy and spight we haue long time borne each other, and that wee should enter into another sort of contention honorable and profitable for vs both. I meane, which of vs two should doe his best indeuour to saue GREECE: you, by ruling and commanding all like Lieutenant generall: and I, by counselling you for the best, and executing your commaundement: considering you are the man alone that will roundliest come vnto the point that is best: which is in my opinion, that we should hazard battell by sea within the straight of SALAMINA, and that assoone as might be possible. But if our friendes and confederates do let this to be put in execution, I do assure you your enemies do helpe it forwarde. For it is said, that the sea both before and behinde vs, and round about vs, is couered all ouer with their shippes, so as they that would not before, shall be now compelled of force, and in spight of their hearts, to fight and bestirre them like men, because they are compassed in all about, and there is no passage left open for them to escape nor to flie. Whereunto Themistocles answered: I am sorie, Aristides, that herein your hastie appeareth greater then mine: but since it is so, that you haue deserued the honor in beginning, and procuring such an honorable and commendable strife betwene vs, I will hereafter indeuour my selfe to exceede you in continuing this your desire. After which answere, he told Aristides, how he purposed to mocke the barbarous king, and praied him to intreate Eurybiades to yeeld to his deuise, & to perswade him that there was no other way to saue Greece but to fight by sea: for Eurybiades gaue more credite to Aristides perswasions, then he did to Themistocles wordes. For when all the Captaines were called to counsell, to determine whether they should giue battell or not: one Cleocritus CORINTHIAN said to Themistocles, that his counsell did not like Aristides at all as it seemed, because he spake neuer a worde to the purpose. Aristides answered him straight, that he vtterly mistooke him. For, quoth he, if I did not thinke his counsell good, I would not hold my peace as I do: but now I am mute for any good will I beare him, but because I find his counsell wise & sound. While the Captaines of the GRECIANS were reasoning in this sort, Aristides seeing PSYTTALEA (a little Iland before SALAMINA within the straight) full of men of warre of their enemies: imbarked immediatly the valiantest and lustiest souldiers he had of all his countrie men, into the foystes or pinnasies he had among all his gallies: and went with them, and landed in that and ouerthrew all the barbarous people he found there, and put them to the sword euerie man, taking the chiefest of them onely prisoners, amõg which, were three sonnes of Sandauce, the kings sister, whom he sent vnto Themistocles. These three Lordes were all slaine by the commaundement of Euphrantidas the soothsayer, and sacrificed to Bacchus Omestes, as to say, the cruell Bacchus, and eater of raw flesh, and all vpon an oracle they had receiued. That done, Aristides dispersed his souldiers about the Ile, to receaue all such as were by fortune of warre, or of the sea, cast into the Iland: to the end that no enemy of theirs should scape their hands, nor any of his friends should perish. For the greatest fleete of all their ships, and the sharpest encounter of the whole battell, was about this litle Iland: and therefore the tokens of triumph were set there. After the battell was wonne, Themistocles to feele Aristides opinion, said vnto him: we haue done a good peece of seruice, but yet there is an other behind of greater importance, and that is this. We must bring all ASIA into EVROPE, which we may easily do, if we sayle with all speed to the straight of HELLESPONT, and go breake the bridge the king hath made there. Then Aristides cried out, Stay there, neuer speake of that: but I pray you let vs rather seeke all the wayes we can, how to driue this barbarous king out of GREECE. For if we keepe him in still with so great an army (& he shall see no way before him to escape) how we driue him then to fight like a desperate man, and perill our selues, we can not tell to what. When Themistocles had heard his opinion, he secretly sent the eunuke Arnaces, his seruant, vnto king Xerxes, to aduertise him from him, that he had altered the GRECIANS purpose, which was fully bent to haue broken vp the bridge he had made at the straight of HELLESPONT, to passe ouer his armie: and that he was the willinger to let him vnderstand that he might the better prouide for the safety of his person. King Xerxes being nettled with this aduertisement, tooke straight his iourney, and with all speed went to recouer the straight of HELLESPONT, & left Mardonius his Lieutenant generall in GREECE, with three hundred thousand of the best souldiers of his armie. This Mardonius was maruellously dreaded of all the GRECIANS, for the wonderfull great armie he had by land, and he did threaten them so by his letters he wrote vnto them. You haue, (sayd he) with your ships by sea, ouercome men acquainted to fight by land, and that neuer handled ower: but now, the plaines of THESSALIE, or the fieldes of BOEOTIA, are very fayre and large for horsemen and foote, to make proofe of their valiantnesse, if you will come to the battell in the field. He wrote offers to the ATHENIANS, by the king his maisters commaundement, of other effect, and offered them from him, to build vp their citie againe, to giue them a great pension, and furthermore to make them Lordes of all GREECE, so they would giue ouer, and leaue off these warres. The LACEDÆMONIANS being forthwith aduertised of his letters written to the ATHENIANS, and fearing least they would haue bene perswaded by them: sent their Ambassadours with all speed to ATHENS, to pray them to send their wiues & children vnto SPARTA, and also to offer them victuals, to relieue their poore old people, because of the great scarcitie that was at ATHENS, for that their city was burnt & rased, and all their country besides destroyed by the barbarous people. The ATHENIANS hauing heard the offers of the Ambassadours of LACEDÆMON, made them a maruellous aunswere through Aristides counsell, & this was: That they bare with the barbarous people, though they thought all things were to be sold for gold & siluer, because they esteemed nothing more pretious, nor better in this world, nor to be rich & wealthy: but on the other side, they were greatly offended with the LACEDÆMONIANS, that they onely regarded the present pouerty & necessity of the ATHENIANS, and did forget their vertue & noble courage, thinking to make them fight more valiantly for the preseruation of GREECE, by offering them victuals to liue withall. The people approuing this aunswere, Aristides then caused the Ambassadours of SPARTA to come to the assembly, and commaunded them to tell the LACEDÆMONIANS by word of mouth, that all the gold vnder, or vnder the ground, could not corrupt the ATHENIANS, to make them take any summe of money or reward, to leaue the defence of the liberty of GREECE: and to the herauld that came from Mardonius, he shewed him the sunne, and sayd vnto him: so long as yonder sunne keepeth his course about the world, so long will the ATHENIANS be mortall enemies to the PERSIANS, because they haue spoiled and destroyed all their country, and haue desti-

led and burnt the temples of their gods. Besides, he willed that the Priests, by commandement of the people, should excommunicate and curse him that would procure them to send vnto the PERSIANS to make peace with them, and to breake their league and alliance with the other GRECIANS. Hereupon, when Mardonius came againe the second time ouerrunne the country of ATTICA: the ATHENIANS got them againe into the Ile of SALAMINA, and then they sent Aristides Ambassadour vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS. He sharply tooke them vp, and reproued their sloth and negligence, because they had againe forsaken ATHENS, & left it to the spoile of the barbarous people: & prayed them yet they would looke to saue the rest of GREECE. The Ephori (which were certaine officers that ruled all things in the citie of SPARTA) when they had heard Aristides perswasions: straight tooke order aide, though it appeared they did nothing all day but play, and make good cheare, keeping that day one of their solemne feastes they called Hyacinthia. Howbeit the next night following, they sent out fiue thousand citizens borne in SPARTA, into the field, all proper and valiant souldiers, euery one of them carying with him seuen Ilotes (which are the common men & slaues in the countrey of LACEDÆMONIA) not making the Ambassadours of Athens priuie to it at all. Wherefore Aristides came againe an other time into their counsell, to complaine of their negligence. But they fell a laughing, and sayd he dreamed, or else he mocked them: for their armie which they had sent against the straungers (for so they called the PERSIANS) was already at the citie of ORESTION in ARCADIA. Aristides hearing their answere, replyed, that they were to blame to mocke them in that sort, to send away their armie so secretly, that they might not know of it: and that it was no time for them now to go about to deceiue their friends, but their enemies rather. Idomeneus in his story reporteth the matter thus in euery point. Notwithstanding, in the decree that was made to send Ambassadours to SPARTA, Aristides is not named for Ambassadour, but there are other appointed: as Xanthippus, and Myronides. Afterwardes Aristides was chosen by voyces of the people, lieutenant generall of the army of ATHENS, in this warre against the PERSIANS, and went to the camp of the GRECIANS by the citie of PLATÆES, with eight thousand footemen armed & appointed. There he found king Pausanias the onely generall of all the whole power and army of the GRECIANS, who brought with him the force of SPARTA: and there came daily into his camp one after an other, a maruellous great multitude of other GRECIANS. Now touching the army of the barbarous people, they incãped all along est the riuer of ASOPVS: but because their camp stretched out a maruellous way in length, they were not intrenched at all, but had onely fortified a peece of ground foure square with a wall about, which was ten furlongs on euery side, to place all their cariage and chiefest things in. And as for the GRECIANS againe, the soothsayer Tisamenus, borne in the city of ELIDE, had told Pausanias, and all the GRECIANS together, that they should haue the victory, so they did not assaile at all, but onely defend. And Aristides, that had sent to the oracle of Apollo at DELPHOS in the name of the ATHENIANS, had answer: they should ouercome their enemies, so they did sacrifice and make speciall prayers, vnto Iupiter and Iuno of mount CITHÆRON, vnto Pan vnto the Nymphes Sphragitides, & also vnto the demy gods, Androcrates, Leucon, Pisander, Demnocrates, Hypsion, Actæon, & Polyidus: and so that they did hazard battell also within their own territories, and in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and of Proserpina. This oracle troubled Aristides maruellously, because the demy gods whom they had commaundement to doe sacrifice vnto, were the founders and auncesters of the PLATÆIANS: and the cause of the Nymphes Sphragitides, is one of the tops of mount CITHÆRON, looking towardes the west, which the sunne letteth in sommer. They say there was an oracle there in old time, whose spirit possessed many inhabitants there abouts, and bestraught them of their wits: whereupon, they called those so possessed, Nympholepty, as who would say, taken with the Nymphes. And againe that the ATHENIANS they should haue the victory, so they did hazard battell in the plaine of Ceres Eleusinian, and within their owne territorie: it was euen to send them backe againe into the country of ATTICA. Aristides being thus perplexed, Arimnestus Captaine of the PLATÆIANS, had such a vision in the night in his sleepe. Him thought that Iupiter the sauiour appeare vnto him, and asked him what the GRECIANS intended to do? and that he answe-my Lord, we must to morrow remoue our camp into the territories of ELEVSIN, and there we will fight with the barbarous people, according to the commaundement the oracle Apollo hath giuen vs. Then that Iupiter replyed, that they were greatly deceaued: for all that Apollo had declared by his oracle was ment within the territorie of the PLATÆIANS, and that they should finde it true, if they considered it well. Arimneſtus hauing plainly ſeene this viſion in his ſleepe, when he did awake in the morning, he ſtraight ſent for the oldeſt citizens, and conſidering with them where this place ſhould be, he found at the length, that at the foote of mount CITHÆRON, by the citie of NYSIA, there was an old temple they called the temple of Ceres Eleuſinian, and of her daughter Proſerpina. When he heard them ſay ſo, he went ſtraight and told Ariſtides of it, and found that it was an excellent place to ſet an army in battell ray, that had but few horſemen: for that the foote of mount CITHARON did let the horſemen, they could not go to the place where the temple ſtoode, and where the plaine and valley did end: beſides alſo, that the chappell of Androcrates was euen in that place, which was all hidden with thicke wood round about it. And becauſe they ſhould lacke nothing to hinder the expreſſe commaundement of the oracle for hope of victorie: the PLATÆIANS (through Arimneſtus counſell and aduiſe) made a common decree, that the confines of the city of PLATÆES ſhould be taken away towards ATHENS ſide, and that the land thereof ſhould be giuen clearely vnto the ATHENIANS, becauſe they ſhould fight with the barbarous people in their owne land, for the defence and preſeruation of GREECE, according to the commaundement of the oracle. This noble gift and preſent of the PLATÆIANS was ſo famous, as many yeares after, king Alexander the great hauing conquered the Empire of ASIA, built vp the walles againe of the citie PLATÆES, and when he had done, made a herauld openly proclaime it at the games Olympicall, that Alexander had done the PLATÆIANS that honour & dignitie, for a memoriall & honour of their magnanimity. Becauſe in the warre againſt the PERSIANS, they had freely and liberally giuen away their land vnto the ATHENIANS, for the ſafetie of the GRECIANS: and had ſhewed themſelues of a noble courage alſo, and verie willing to defend the ſtate of GREECE. Now when the armie of the GRECIANS came to be ſet in order of battell, there fell a ſtrife betweene the ATHENIANS & the TEGEATES, becauſe the ATHENIANS would needes (according to their old cuſtome) haue the left wing of the battell, if the LACEDÆMONIANS had the right wing: and the TEGEATES on the contrary part, would haue the preheminence before the ATHENIANS, alledging the famous actes and notable ſeruice of their auncеſtors in former warres, whereupon the ATHENIANS did mutine. But Ariſtides ſtept betweene them, and told them, that it was no time now to contend with the TEGEATES about their nobilitie and valiantneſſe: and as for you, my Lordes of SPARTA, ſayd he, and you alſo my maiſters of GREECE: we tell you, that the place neither giueth nor taketh vertue away, and we do aſſure you that whereſoeuer you place vs, we will ſo defend & keepe it, as we will not impaire nor blemiſh the honour we haue wonne in former foughten battels, and gotten victories. For we are not come hither to quarrell and fall out with our friends, but to fight with our common enemies: nor to bragge of our auncеſters doings, but to ſhew our ſelues valiant in defence of all GREECE. For this battell will make good proofe to all the GRECIANS, how much eſtimation euery citie, euery Captaine, & particular perſon will deſerue for his part. When Ariſtides had ſpoken, the Captaines & all other of the counſell concluded in fauour of the ATHENIANS, that they ſhould haue one of the wings of the battell. But by this meanes, all GREECE ſtood in maruellous ieopardy at that time, & the ſtate of the ATHENIANS ſpecially in great daunger. For a nũber of the nobleſt citizens of ATHENS, and that brought great ſubſtance with them to the warres, being now at low ſtate, & in pouertie, their goods being ſpent and gone, and ſeeing themſelues diſcountenanced, not bearing that rule & authoritie in the commõ wealth they were wont to do, becauſe other were called to authoritie, and preferred to the offices of the citie: they gathered together, and met at a houſe in the city of PLATÆES, & there conſpired to ouerthrow the authoritie of the people at ATHENS: and if they could not obtaine their purpoſe, then that they would rather looſe all, and betray their countrey vnto the barbarous people. While theſe thinges were practiſed in the camp, many being of the conſpiracie, Ariſtides came to an inckling of it, and was maruellously afrayed, becauſe of the time: wherefore he began to be carefull of the matter, being of ſuch importance as it was, and yet would not be curious to vnderſtand the whole conſpiracy, litle knowing what a number might be drawē into this treaſon, if it were narrowly looked into, but rather reſpected that which was iuſt, then what was profitable for the time. So he cauſed eight perſons onely of the great number to be apprehended, and of theſe eight the two firſt whom they would haue indited as principals, and were moſt to be burdened for the conſpiracy, Æſchines of the towne of LAMPRA, and Egeſias of the towne of ACHARA, they found meanes to ſlie out of the camp, and to ſaue themſelues. And for the other Ariſtides let them at libertie, and gaue them occaſion that were not diſcouered, to be bold, and to repent them of their follies: ſaying, that the battell ſhould be their iudge, where they ſhould purge themſelues of all accuſations layd againſt them, and ſhew the world alſo, that they neuer had any other intention but honeſt, & good, towards their countrey. Mardonius, to proue the courage of the GRECIANS, had ſent all his horſemen, (wherein he was farre ſtronger then the GRECIANS) to skirmiſh with the. Who were lodged at the foote of mount CITHERON in ſtrong places and full of ſtones, ſauing the three thouſand MEGARIANS, that camped in the plaine: by reaſon whereof, they were ſore troubled and hurt, by the horſemen of the barbarous people that ſet vpon them on euerie ſide, for they might charge them where they would. In ſomuch, in the end, perceiuing they alone could no longer reſiſt the force of ſo great a multitude of the barbarous people: they ſent with all ſpeed poſsible to Pauſanias to pray him to ſend them preſent aide. Pauſanias hearing this newes, and ſeeing in his owne ſight the camp of the MEGARIANS almoſt all couered with ſhot and dartes which the barbarous people threw at them, & that they were compelled to ſtand cloſe together in a litle corner, wiſt not what to do. For, to go thither in perſō with the LACEDÆMONIANS that were footmen heauy armed, he thought that was no way to helpe them: So he proued to put ſome enuious deſire and enuie of honour, among the priuate Captaines and generals of the armie of the other GRECIANS, which were then about him: to ſee if he could moue any man to courage and deſire, to offer himſelfe willingly to go aide the MEGARIANS. Howbeit they had all deafe eares, but Ariſtides: who promiſed to go in the name of the ATHENIANS, and brought Olympiodorus into the field, (one of the valianteſt Captaines that ſerued vnder him) with his company of three hundred choſen men, and certaine ſhot mingled amongeſt them. Theſe ſouldiers were ready in a moment, and marched ſtraight in battell ray, a great pace towards the barbarous people. Maſiſtius, that was generall of the horſemen of the PERSIANS, a goodly tall man, perceiuing their comming towards him: turned his horſe, and galloped againſt them. The ATHENIANS taried him, and kept their ground, and the encounter was very hot, becauſe both the one and the other ſide did the beſt they could at this firſt onſet to put the reſt of the battell in ieopardy: and they fought ſo long, that Maſiſtius horſe was ſhot through the body with an arrow, that put him to ſuch paine, as he neuer lin flinging, till he caſt his maiſter on the ground, armed as he was at all peeces. So being on the ground, he could not riſe againe, as well for the waight of his armour, as for that the ATHENIANS came ſo ſodainly vpon him. And notwithſtanding there were many about him to hew him in peeces, yet they could find no way how to kill him, he was ſo throughly armed & loden with gold, copper, and iron, not onely vpon his body and his head, but alſo on his legs and armes: vntill at the length there came one that thruſt the head of his dart through his beuer, and ſo killed him. The PERSIANS perceiuing that, fled immediatly, & forſooke the body of their generall. Shortly after it appeared to the GRECIANS that they had ſped well at this skirmiſh, not becauſe they had ſlaine many of their enemies, but for the great lamentation the barbarous people made for the loſſe of Maſiſtius. For his death did ſo greeue them, that they powled themſelues, they clipped off their horſes and moyles haires, & filled beſides all the field there abouts with pityfull cries & ſhreekes, as they that had loſt the valianteſt and chiefeſt man of authoritie of all their camp, next vnto Mardonius the kings Lieutenant. After this firſt skirmiſh, both the one and the other ſide kept their camp, and would not come into the field many dayes after: for the Soothſayers did promiſe both ſides the victory, as much the PERSIANS, as the GRECIANS, ſo they did but onely defend: and contrarywiſe, they did threaten them to be ouerthrowen, that did aſſault. But donius finding victuals waxed scant, & that they were stored but for few dayes, and moreouer how the GRECIANS daily grew stronger by continuall repayre to their camp, the longer he delayed in the end he resolued to tary no lõger, but to passe the riuer of ASOPVS the next morning by breake of the day, and sodainly to set vpon the GRECIANS. So he gaue the Captaines warning the night before what they should do, because euery man should be ready: but about midnight there came a horseman without any noyse at all, so neare to the GRECIANS camp, that he spake to the watch, and told them he would speake with Aristides, generall of the ATHENIANS. Aristides was called for straight, & when he came to him, the horseman sayd vnto Aristides, I am Alexander king of MACEDON, who for the loue and great good will I beare you, haue put my selfe in the greatest daunger that may be, to come at this present time to aduertise you, that to morrow morning Mardonius will giue you battell: because your enemies sodaine cõming vpõ you, should not make you afrayed, being sodainly charged, & should not hinder also your valiant fighting. For it is no new hope that is come to Mardonius, that makes him to fight: but onely scarcitie of victuals that forceth him to do it, considering that the Prognosticatours are all against it that he should giue you battell, both by reason of the ill tokens of their sacrifices, as also by the aunswers of their oracles, which hath put all the armie in a maruellous feare, and stand in no good hope at all. Thus he is forced to put all at aduenture, or else if he will needes lye still, to be starued to death for verie famine. After king Alexander had imparted this secret to Aristides, he prayed him to keepe it to himselfe, and so remember it in time to come. Aristides aunswered him then, that it was no reason he should keepe a matter of so great importance as that, from Pausanias, who was their Lieutenant generall of the whole armie: notwithstanding, he promised him he would tell it no man else before the battell, and that if the gods gaue the GRECIANS the victorie, he did assure him, they should all acknowledge his great fauour and good will shewed vnto them. After they had talked thus together, king Alexander left him, and returned backe againe, and Aristides also went immediatly to Pausanias tent, and told him the talke king Alexander and he had together. Thereupon the priuate Captaines were sent for straight to counsell, and there order was giuen, that euery man should haue his bandes ready, for they should fight in the morning. So Pausanias at that time (as Herodotus writeth) sayd vnto Aristides, that he would remoue the ATHENIANS from the left to the right wing, because they should haue the PERSIANS themselues right before them, and that they should fight so much the lustier, both for that they were acquainted with their fight, as also because they had ouercomme them before in the first encounter: and that himselfe would take the left wing of the battell, where he should encounter with the GRECIANS that fought on the PERSIANS side. But when all the other priuate Captaines of the ATHENIANS vnderstood it, they were maruellous angry with Pausanias, and sayd he did them wrong, and had no reason to let all the other GRECIANS keepe their place where they were alwayes appointed, and onely to remoue them, as if they were slaues, to be appointed at his pleasure, now of the one side, then of the other, and to set them to fight with the valiantest souldiers they had of all their enemies. Then sayd Aristides to them, that they knew not what they sayd, and now before they misliked, and did striue with the TEGEATES, onely for hauing the left wing of the battell; and when it was graunted, they thought themselues greatly honored that they were preferred before them, by order of the Captaines: and now where the LACEDÆMONIANS were willing of themselues to giue them the place of the right wing, and did in maner offer them the preheminence of the whole armye: they do not thankefully take the honour offered them, nor yet do recken of the vantage and benefite giuen them to fight against the PERSIANS selues, their auncient enemies, & not against their naturall coũtry men aunciently descended of them. When Aristides had vsed all these perswasions vnto them, they were very well contented to chaunge place with the LACEDÆMONIANS: and then all the talke among them was to encourage one an other, and to tell them that the PERSIANS that came against them, had no better harts nor weapons, then those whom they before had ouercome, in the plaine of MARATHON. For sayd they, they haue the same bowes, the same rich imbroidred gownes, the same golden chaines and carcanettes of womanish persons, hanging on their cowardly bodies and faint harts: where we haue alſo the ſame weapons and bodies had, & our harts more liuely & couragious thē before, through the ſundry victories we haue ſince gotten of them. Further, we haue this aduantage more. That we do not fight as other confederates the GRECIANS do, for our citie and country onely, but alſo to continue fame and renowme of our former noble ſeruice, which we wanne at the iourneys of MARATHON and of SALAMINA: to the ende, the world ſhould not thinke that the glory of our triumphes and victories was due vnto Miltiades onely, or vnto fortune, but vnto the courage and worthineſſe of the ATHENIANS. Thus were the GRECIANS throughly occupied.

chaūge the order of their battell in haſt. The THEBANS on the other ſide that tooke part with Mardonius, receiuing intelligence of the altering of their battell, by traytors that ranne betweene both campes: they ſtraight told Mardonius of it. He thereupon did ſodainly chaunge the order of his battell, and placed the PERSIANS from the right wing to the left wing of his enemies: either becauſe he was afrayed of the ATHENIANS, or elſe for the glory that he had a deſire to fight with the LACEDÆMONIANS, and commaunded the THEBANS that tooke his part, that they ſhould fight againſt the ATHENIANS. This alteration was ſo openly done, that euery man might ſee it: whereupon Pauſanias remoued the LACEDÆMONIANS againe, and ſet them in the right wing. Mardonius ſeeing that, remoued the PERSIANS againe from the left wing, and brought them to the right wing (where they were before) againſt the LACEDÆMONIANS: and thus they conſumed all that day in chaunging their men to and fro. So the Captaines of the GRECIANS ſat in counſell at night, and they agreed, that they muſt needes remoue their camp, and lodge in ſome other place where they might haue water at commaundement: becauſe their enemies did continually trouble and ſpoyle that water they had about them, with their horſes. Now when night came the Captaines would haue marched away with their men, to go to the lodging they had appointed: but the people went very ill willing to it, and they had much a do to keepe them vp. For they were no ſooner out of the trenches and fortification of their camp, but the most of them ranne to the citie of PLATÆES, and were maruellouſly out of order, diſperſing themſelues here and there, and ſet vp their tents where they thought good, before the place appointed for them: and there were none that tarried behind, but the LACEDÆMONIANS onely, and that was againſt their willes. For one of their Captaines called Amompharetus maruellous hardie man, that feared no daunger, and longed ſore for battell: he was in a rage with theſe trifling delayes, that he cried it out in the camp, that this remouing was a goodly running away, & ſware he would not frō thence, but would there tary Mardonius coming with his company. Pauſanias went to him, and told him he muſt do that the other CAPTAINS had conſented to in counſell, by moſt voyces. But Amompharetus tooke a great ſtone in his handes, and threw it downe at Pauſanias feete, and told him there is the ſigne I will giue to conclude battell, and I paſſe not for all your cowardly concluſions. Amompharetus ſtubbornneſſe did ſo amaze Pauſanias, that he was at his wits end. So he ſent vnto the ATHENIANS that were onwardes on their way, to pray them to tary for him, that they might go no further, and there withall made the reſt of his men to marche towardes the citie of PLATÆES, preſſing thereby to haue drawen Amompharetus to haue followed him, or elſe he ment to make him alone behind. But in trifling thus, the day brake: and Mardonius vnderſtanding that the GRECIANS did forſake their firſt lodging, he made his army preſently march in battell ray vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. So the barbarous people made great ſhoutes and cries thinking to go fight, but to go ſacke and ſpoyle the GRECIANS flying away, as indeed they did litle better. For, Pauſanias ſeeing the countenaunce of his enemies, made his enſigne ſtay, and commaunded euery man to prepare to fight: but he forgate to giue the GRECIANS the ſignall of the battell, either for the anger he tooke againſt Amompharetus, or for the ſodaine onſet of the enemies, which made them that they came not in ſtraight, nor altogether to the battell after it was begun, but ſtraggling in ſmall companies, ſome here, and ſome there. In the meane time, Pauſanias was buſie in ſacrificing to the gods, and ſeeing, that his firſt ſacrifices were not acceptable vnto them, by the Soothſayers obſeruations they made, he commaunded the SPARTANS to throw their targets at their feete, and not to fight

f their places, but onely to do as he bad them, without resisting their enemies. When he ad giuen this straight order, he went againe and did sacrifice, when the horsemen of the ene- ies were at hand, and that their arrowes flew amongst the thickest of the LACEDÆMONI- ns, and did hurt diuerse of them, and specially poore Callicrates among the rest, that was one the goodliest men in all the GRECIANS hoast and armie. He hauing his deaths wound ith an arrow, before he gaue vp the ghost, said his death did not grieue him, because he me out of his countrie to die for the defence of GREECE: but it grieued him to die so cow- dly, hauing giuen the enemie neuer a blowe. His death was marueilous lamentable, and e constancie of the SPARTANS wonderfull: for they neuer stirred out of their places, nor de any countenance to defend themselues against their enemies that came vpon them, but ered themselues to be thrust through with arrowes, and slaine in the field, looking for the re the goddes would appoint them, and that their Captaine would commaund them to . Some write also, that as Pausanias was at his prayers, and doing sacrifice vnto the gods e behinde the battell, certaine of the LYDIANS came vpon him, and ouerthrew and ke away all his sacrifice: and how Pausanias, and those that were about him, (hauing no her weapons in their hands) draue them away with force of staues and whippes. In me- rie whereof, they say there is a solemne procession kept at SPARTA on that day, which y call the LYDIANS procession, where they whip and beate young boyes about the aul- . Then was Pausanias in great distresse, to see the Priests offer sacrifice vpon sacrifice, d that not one of them pleased the goddes: at the last he turned his eyes to the temple of , and wept, and holding vp his hands, besought Iuno Citheron, and all the other goddes, trons and protectors of the countrie of the PLATÆIANS) that if it were non the will of gods the GRECIANS should haue the victorie, yet that the conquerors at the least should y their deaths dearely, and that they should finde they fought against valiant men and wor- y souldiers. Pausanias had no sooner ended his prayer, but the sacrifices fell out very fauou- le, insomuch the Priests and Soothsayers came to promise him victorie. Thereupon, he ight gaue commaundement to marche toward the enemie, which flew from man to man conuently how they should marche. So as he that had seene the squadron of the LACE- MONIANS, would haue said it had bene like the body of a fierce beast raising vp his bri- es preparing to fight. Then the barbarous people sawe they should haue a hoate battle, and t they should meete with men that would fight it out to the death: wherefore they cou- d their bodies with great targets after the PERSIAN fashion, and bestowed their arrowes ftly vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS. But they keeping close together, and couering them- es with their shields, marched on still vpon them, vntill they came to ioyne with the ene- e so lustily, that they made their targets flie out of their hands, with the terrible thrusts and owes of their pikes and speares vpon their breasts, and ouerthwart their faces, that they slew ny of them, and laide them on the ground. For all that, they dyed not cowardly, but tooke LACEDÆMONIANS pikes and speares in their bare hands, and brake them in two by ength of their armes: and then they quickly pluckt out their cimeters and axes, and lustily de about them, and wrong the LACEDÆMONIANS shields out of their hands by force, and ught it out with them a great while hand to hand. Now, whilest the LACEDÆMONIANS ere busily fighting with the barbarous people, the ATHENIANS stood still imbattelled farre , & kept their ground. But whē they saw the LACEDÆMONIANS tary so long, & that they me not, and heard a marueilous noise of men as though they were fighting, and besides that ere came a speedy messenger vnto them sent from Pausanias, to let them vnderstand they ere fighting: then they marched with all speed they could to helpe them. But as they were omming on a great pace ouer the plaine, vnto that part where they heard the noise: the GRE- IANS that were on Mardonius side came against them. Aristides seeing them comming to- ards them, went a good way before his company, and cried out as loude as he could for life, d coniured the GRECIANS in the name of the gods, the protectors of GREECE, to leaue off ese wars, and not to trouble the ATHENIANS that were going to helpe them that ventured eir liues, to defend the commonwealth & safety of all GREECE. But when he saw they would eeds fight for any request & coniuratiō he could vse, & that they came still vpon him, bending

some do yet begin and end their moneths at one day, and some at another. After this great barrell and ouerthrow of the barbarous people, there rose great strife betwixt the ATHENIANS and the LACEDÆMONIANS, touching the reward and honour of the victory. For the ATHENIANS would not giue place vnto the LACEDÆMONIANS, nor suffer them to set vp any tokens or signes of triumphe. Whereupon the GRÆCIANS running to armes in mutinie together, by this occasion they had almost spoiled one another: had not Aristides through his wisedom and wise persuasions, staied, and quieted the other Captaines his companions, and specially one Leocrates and Myronides, whom he wanne with such discreet and gentle words, that they were contented to referre it wholly vnto the arbitrement and iudgement of the other people of GREECE. So the GRECIANS met in the same place together, purposely to decide their controuersie. In this counsell holden there, Theogiton a Captaine of the MEGARIANS, said for his opinion, that to auoide the ciuill warre might growe betweene the GRECIANS vpon this quarrell: he thought it very requisite, to appoint ouer the reward and honor of this victorie, vnto some other city, then to any of the two that fell out about it. After him rose vp Cleocritus CORINTHIAN, seeming to euery man there that he would haue requested this honour for the citie of CORINTHE, being in deed the third citie in estimation of all GREECE, next vnto SPARTA & ATHENS: howbeit he made an oration in commendation of the PLATÆIANS, which was maruellously liked, & well thought of of euery man. For his opinion went flatly with the PLATÆIANS, that to ende this strife, they should giue the honor of this victory vnto the city of PLATÆES, & so would neither of both parties be angrie that they should be honored. Vpon his words, Aristides first agreed on the ATHENIANS behalfe, & then Pausanias for the LACEDÆMONIANS, that the PLATÆIANS should haue the reward. Now they both being agreede, before the spoile was deuided betweene them, they set aside some score talents that were giuen to the PLATÆIANS, with the which they built a temple vnto Minerua, and gaue her an image, and set out all her temple with pictures that remaine whole vntill this day: and the LACEDÆMONIANS notwithstanding, did set vp their tokens of victory by themselues, and the ATHENIANS theirs also by themselues. So, they sending vnto the oracle of Apollo in the city of DELPHES, to know vnto what gods, and how they should do sacrifice: Apollo answered them that they should build vpon an auter vnto Iupiter, protector of their libertie, howbeit that they should put no sacrifice vpon it, vntill they had first put out all the fire through the whole countrie, because it had bene polluted and defiled by the barbarous people: and then, that they should fetche pure and cleane fire at the common auter, whereon they do sacrifice vnto Apollo Pythius, in the city of DELPHES. This answer being deliuered, the great Lords and officers of GREECE went through all the countrie, to put out the fire euery where. And there was a man of the same citie of PLATÆES at that time called Euchidas, that came and offered him selfe, and promised he would bring them fire from the temple of Apollo Pythias, with all possible speed that might be. So when he came to the city of DELPHES, after he had sprinkled and purified his body with cleane water, he put a crowne of lawrell vpon his head, and went in that manner to take fire from the auter of Apollo. When he had done, he hied him againe as fast as he could runne for life, vnto the citie of PLATÆES, and came thither before the sunne was set, hauing come and gone that day a thousand furlongs. But after he had saluted his citizens, and deliuered them the fire he brought: he fell downe dead at their feete, and gaue vp the ghost. The PLATÆIANS lift him vp starke dead, and buried him in the temple of Diana Euclia, to say, of good renowme: and caused afterwards this Epitaphe following to be grauen vpon his tombe.

Engraued here doth lie, Euchidas speedy man, who in one day both too and fro to Delphes lightly ranne.

Many thinke that this goddesse Euclia is Diana, and so they call her. But other holde opinion she was the daughter of Hercules, and of Myrto the Nymphe, Menœsius daughter, and Patroclus sister, that died a virgine, & was honored afterwards as a goddesse, of the BOEOTIANS, and of the LOCRIANS. For in all their cities and townes in open places, they finde an auter

A generall counsell holden at the city of Plataes.

Afterwards there was a generall counsell holden by all the GRECIANS, in the which Aristides made a motion, that all the cities of GREECE should yearely send their deputies at a certaine day appointed, vnto the city of PLATÆES, there to make their prayers and sacrifices vnto the gods: and that from fiue yeares, to fiue yeares, they should celebrate common games, that should be called the games of libertie: and that they should also leaue throughout the prouinces of GREECE, for maintenance of the warres against the PERSIANS and barbarous people, ten thousand footemen, a thousand horsemen, and a fleete of a hundred saile. Item that the PLATÆIANS thenceforth should be taken also for denoute and holy men, and that no man should so hardy hurt or offend them, and that they should onely tende the sacrifices vnto the goddes, for the health and prosperitie of GREECE. All which articles were enacted in forme and manner aforesaid, and the PLATÆIANS bound themselues yearely to keepe solemne sacrifices and anniuersaries for the soules of the GRECIANS that were slaine in their territories, fighting for defence of the libertie of the GRECIANS. And this they obserue yet vnto this day in this sorte: The sixteenth day of the moneth of Mæmasterion (which the BOEOTIANS call Alalcomenies, and is about the moneth of Ianuarie) they go in procession, and before the procession there goeth a trumpetor that soundeth the alarum. Then there follow certaine chariots loden with branches of firre tree, and with nosegayes and garlandes of triumphe: then a blacke bull, and certaine young gentlemen noble men souns that carie great cawdrons with two eares full of wine and milke, such as they vse to powre vpon the graues of dead men for propiciatory oblations, and other young boyes free borne that cary oiles, perfumes, and other sweete odours in voyall glasses. For no seruant or bondman may lawfully be admitted to haue any office about this misterie, for that they whose memory they honor, died all fighting for defence of the libertie of GREECE. After all this followeth the pronoust of the PLATÆIANS for that time being, last of all: who may not all the rest of the yeare besides so much as touch any iron, nor weare any other coloured gowne but white. Howbeit then he weareth on a purple coloured coate, and holdeth a funerall pot in one of his handes, which he taketh in the towne house, and a naked sworde in the other hand, and so goeth through the citie in this sorte after all the pompe aforesaid, vnto the church yarde, where all their graues be that were slaine at that battell. So when he commeth thither, he draweth water out of a well that is there, and with the same he washeth the tombe stones, square pillers and images that stand vpon those tombes, and then annointeth them with oile and sweete sauors: afterwards, he sacrificeth a bull, and laieth him vpon a heape of wood hard by him, as they do when they burne the bodies of dead men, and making certaine prayers and petitions vnto Iupiter, and Mercurie, goddes of the earth, he doth solemnly inuite the soules of those valiant men that dyed, fighting for the liberty of GREECE, vnto the feast of this funerall sacrifice. Then he taketh a cup full of wine in his hande, and spilling it all vpon their tombes, he speaketh these words alonde: I drinke to the worthy and valiant men, that died sometime in defence of the liberty of GREECE. This solemne ceremonie and anniuersarie, the PLATÆIANS do duely obserue vnto this present day. Now when the ATHENIANS were returned to ATHENS, Aristides perceiuing the people were bent to stablish a popular state, where the people might beare the whole rule and authoritie, iudging them well worthy to be considered of, in respect of their noble seruice and valiant courage they had shewed in this warre: & considering also that they would hardly be brought to like of any other gouernment, being yet in armes, and very stoute, by reason of the famous victories they had obtained: he caused a law to be made, that all authoritie of gouernment should runne in equall course among the citizens, and that thenceforth all burgesses (as well poore as riche) should be chosen by voices of the people, and promoted to offices within the citie. And moreouer, when Themistocles tolde in open assembly, that he had a thing in his head would be greatly to the profit and commoditie of the state, but yet it was not to be spoken openly for diuerse respects, the people willed him to tell it vnto Aristides onely, and to take his aduise in it, to know whether it was meete to be doon or not. Then Themistocles tolde him secretly betwene them, that he thought to set the arsenal on fire, wherewith the GRECIANS ships lay: alleadging, that this meanes the ATHENIANS should be the greatest men of power in all GREECE. Aristides hearing that, without any more, came presently to the people againe, and tolde the whole counsell openly: that nothing could be more profitable in deed for the whole common-wealth, and withall more wicked and vniust, then that Themistocles thought good to do. When the people heard Aristides aunswer, they willed Themistocles to let his deuise alone whatsoeuer it were: so great iusticers were the ATHENIANS, and so much did they trust Aristides wisedom and equitie besides. So they made Aristides afterwards generall of the armie of the ATHENIANS together with Cimon, and sent them to make warre against the barbarous people. Aristides at his comming thither, seeing Pausanias, and the other Captaines that were generals ouer the whole armie, dealing hardly, and churlishly with people their confederates: he on the contrary side, spake gently vnto them, and shewed himselfe as courteous and familiar to them as he could possible, making his companion also familiar to all, and iust to euery body not oppressing some to ease other, in defraying the charges of the warres. Aristides taking this course, it was not noted how by litle and litle he cut off the rule and authority of the LACEDÆMONIANS in GREECE, not by force of armes, nor by ships, nor by numbers of horses, but onely by his graue and wise gouernment. For if the iustice and vertue of Aristides, and the mildenesse and courtesie of Cimon made the gouernment of the ATHENIANS to be liked of, and accepted of all the other people of GREECE: the couetousnesse, pride, and fiercenesse of Pausanias, made it much more to be desired. For Pausanias neuer spake vnto the other captaines of the people, allyes, and confederates, but it was euer in choller, and he was too sharpe with them: and for the poore priuate souldiers, he would cause them to be cruelly whipped for euery small offence, or else to make them stand a whole day together on their feete, laying a heauy iron ancker vpon their shoulders. No man durst go forrage, neither for strawe nor reedes to make them couches of, nor durst water their horse before the SPARTANS: for he had set skoutes for them to whip them home, that went out before them. And one day when Aristides thought to haue spoken to him, and to haue tolde him some thing; he frowned vpon him, and said he had no leasure to speake with him now, and so would not heare him. Whereupon the Captaines of the other GRECIANS, and specially those of CHIO, SAMOS, and of LESBOS, did afterwards follow Aristides, and perswaded him to take vpon him the charge and authoritie to commaund the other people of GREECE, and to take in his protection the allyes and confederates of the same, who long sithence wished to reuolt from the gouernment of the LACEDÆMONIANS, and onely to submit themselues vnto the ATHENIANS. Aristides aunswered them thus: that they had not onely reason to do that they did, but that they were also constrained to do it. Notwithstanding, because the ATHENIANS might haue good ground and assurance of their vndoubted fidelitie and good seruice, they should deliuer them manifest testimonie and assurance thereof, by some famous act attempted against the LACEDÆMONIANS, whereby their people hereafter durst neuer fall from the league of the ATHENIANS. Vliades SAMIAN, & Antagoras of CHIO hearing him say so, both captaines of galleys confedered together: they went one day to set vpon the admirall galley of Pausanias, hard by BIZANTIVM, the one of the one side of her, and the other on the other side, as she was rowing before all the fleete. Pausanias seeing them, stood vp straight in his galley, and began furiously to rage against them, and threatned them that before it were long he would make them know they had bene better to haue assaulted their owne naturall countrie, then to haue set vpon him as they had done. But they aunswered him, and bad him get him away quickly and if he were wise, and let him thanke fortune hardly, that graunted the GRECIANS victorie at the battell of PLATÆES vnder his leading: and that it was nothing else but the only reuerence and respect of the same, that had made the GRECIANS hold their hands till now, from giuing him that iust punishment his pride and arrogancie had deserued. So the end was, they left the LACEDÆMONIANS, & stacke vnto the ATHENIANS: wherein was easily discerned the great courage, and wonderfull magnanimity of the LACEDÆMONIANS. For when they saw their captains were marred and corrupted, through the ouer great authority and liberty they had, they willingly gaue vp their commandement ouer the other GRECIANS, and did no more send their Captaines to be generals of the whole armie of GREECE: thinking it better for their citizens, that they ſhould be obedient, and in euery pointe obſerue the diſcipline the cities and people of GREECE did pay a certaine ſumme of money, towards defraying the charges of the warres againſt the barbarous people. But after that their ſeignioric rule was taken from them, the GRECIANS were contented a taxe ſhould be leauied, and euery city ſhould be reaſonably ſeſſed, according to their wealth and abilitie: becauſe citie might know what they ſhould pay. And for this purpoſe, they prayed the ATHE they would appoint Ariſtides to take order for it, vnto whom they gaue full power & ritie to taxe and ſeſſe euery citie indifferently, conſidering the greatneſſe of the territorie the reuenues of the ſame, as euery one was reaſonably able to beare it. But if Ariſtides poore when he entred into that great charge and office of authoritie, wherein all GRE manner did referre themſelues vnto his diſcretion: he came out of that office more and had made this aſſeſſement and taxation not onely iuſtly and truly, but alſo ſo indif ly according vnto euery mans abilitie, that there was no man could finde fault with h ings. And like as the auncient men in olde time did celebrate, and ſing out the bleſſed thoſe that liued vnder the raigne of Saturne, which they called the golden age: euen the people and confederates of the ATHENIANS afterwards honour the aſſeſſement Ariſtides, calling it the fortunate & bleſſed time of GREECE, and ſpecially, when ſhortly it did double, and treble on the ſodaine. For the taxe Ariſtides made, came to about foure dred and three ſcore talents: and Pericles raiſed it almoſt vnto a third parte. For Thu writeth, that at the beginning of the warres of PELOPONNESVS, the ATHENIANS ſixe hundred talents yearely vpon their confederates. And after the death of Pericles, the tors and counſellers for matters of ſtate, did raiſe it vp higher by litle and litle, vntill it ted vnto the ſumme of thirteene hundred talents. And this was not, becauſe the warres riſe to ſo great a charge, by reaſon of the length of the ſame, and of the loſſes the ATHE had receiued: but for that they did acouſtome the people to make diſtributions of mo hand vnto euery citizen, to make them ſet vp games, and make goodly images, and to ſumptuous temples. Thus was Ariſtides therefore iuſtly honored, praiſed, and eſteemed all other, for this iuſt impoſition of taxes, ſauing onely of Themiſtocles: who went vp downe fleering at the matter, ſaying it was no meete praiſe for an honeſt man, but rather cofer well barred with iron, where a man might ſafely lay vp his gold and ſiluer. This be to be cured with Ariſtides, which was nothing like the ſharpe girde Ariſtides gaue him ly, when Themiſtocles talking with him, tolde him it was an excellent thing for a Capt be able to know, and to preuent the counſels and doings of the enemies: and ſo is it, Ariſtides againe, not onely a needfull, but an honeſt thing, and meete for a worthy rall of an armie, to be cleane fingered, without bribery or corruption. So Ariſtides m the other people of GREECE to ſweare, that they would truely keepe the articles of ance, and he him ſelfe as generall of the ATHENIANS, did take their othes in the the ATHENIANS: and ſo pronouncing execrations & curſes againſt them that ſhould the league and othe taken, he threw iron wedges red hotte into the ſea, and praied to deſtroy them euen ſo, that did violate their vowed faith. Notwithſtanding, afterw (in my opinion) when there fell our great alteration in the ſtate, and that the ATHE were forced to rule more ſtraightly then before: Ariſtides then willed the ATHENIAN him beare the daunger and burden of periury and execration, and that they ſhould not feare thereof to do any thing what ſoeuer they thought meet or neceſſary. To conclude, phraſtus writeth, that Ariſtides was not only a perfect, an honeſt, and iuſt man, in priuat ters betwixt party & party: but in matters of ſtate, and concerning the common weale many things oftentimes according to the neceſſitie of the time, and troubles of the wherein violence and iniuſtice was to be vſed. As when the queſtion was asked in open although it was directly against the articles of the alliance, made and sworne among all the Grecians. Aristides opinion being asked in the same, he answered: it was not iust, but yet profitable. Now, notwithstanding Aristides had brought his city, to rule and command many thousands of people: yet was he still pore for all that, and vntill his dying day he gloried rather to be praised for his pouerty; then for all the famous victories and battels he had won: and that plainely appeareth thus. Callias Ceres torch bearer, was his neare kinseman, who through enemies came to be accused, and stoode in hazard of life: so when the day came that his matter was to be heard before the Iudges, his accusers very faintly, and to litle purpose, vttered the offences whereof they accused him, and running into other by-matters, left the chiefest matter, and spake thus to the Iudges. My Lords, you all know Aristides the sonne of Lysimachus, and you are not ignorant also that his vertue hath made him more esteemed, then any man els is, or can be, in all Greece. How thinke ye doth he liue at home? when you see him abroad vp and downe the city, in a thred bare gowne all to tattered? Is it not likely, trow ye, that he is ready to starue at home for lacke of meate and reliefe, whom we all see quake for very coulde, being so ill arrayed and clothed? And yet M. Callias here, his cosin germaine the richest citizen in all Athens, is so miserable: that notwithstanding Aristides hath done much for him, by reason of his great credit and authority among you, he suffereth him, and his poore wife and children ready to beg, to starue for any help he giueth him. Callias perceiuing the Iudges more angrie with him for that, then for any matter else hee was accused of: hee prayed Aristides might be sent for, and willed him to tell truely whether hee had not offered him good rounde sums of money, many a time and oft, and intreated him to take it, which he euer refused, and answered him alwaies, that he could better boast of his pouerty, then him selfe could of his riches: (which he sayd many did vse ill, and few could vse them well) and that it was a hard thing to find one man of a noble mind, that could away with pouerty, and that such onely might be ashamed of pouerty, as were poore against their wils. So Aristides confirmed all hee spake to be true: and euery man that was at the hearing of this matter, went wholly away with this opinion, that he had rather be poore as Aristides, then rich as Callias. This tale is written thus by Aeschines the Socratian Philosopher: and Plato reporteth of him also, that notwithstanding there were many other famous and notable men of Athens, yet hee gaue Aristides praise aboue them all. For others, sayd he, (as Themistocles, Cimon, and Pericles) haue beautified the city with stately porches, and sumptuous buildings of golde and siluer, and with stone of other fine superfluous deuises: but Aristides was only he, that vertuously disposed himself and all his doings, to the furtherance of the state and common weale. His iustice and good nature appeared plainely in his doings and behauiour towards Themistocles. For though Themistocles was euer against Aristides in all things, and a continuall enemy of his, and that by his meanes and practise he was banished from Athens: yet when Themistocles was accused of treason to the state, hauing diuerse sharpe enemies against him: as Cimon, Alcmeon, with diuerse other: Aristides sought not reuenge, when he had him at his aduantage. For he neither spake nor did any thing against him at that time to hurt him: neither did he reioice to see his enemy in misery, no more then if he had neuer enuied him in his prosperity. And touching Aristides death, some write that he died in the realme of Pontvs, being sent thither about matters of the state: and other think he died an old man in the city of Athens, greatly honored and beloued of al the citizens. But Craterus the Macedonian writeth of his death in this sort. After that Themistocles (saith he) was fled, the people of Athens became very stubborn and insolent: whereupon, many lewd men grew to be common appeachers and accusers of the noble men & chiefest citizens, and to stirre vp the malice and ill will of the common people against them, who were waxen proud by reason of their prosperity, and dominion that was enlarged. Among the rest, Arstides was condemned for extorcion and ill behauiour in the commõ wealth, vpon one Diophantes accusation, of the village of Amphitrope: who burdned him, that he tooke money of the Ionians, to make the annual tribute cease which they payed vnto Athens: & so Craterus saith, that because Aristides was not able to pay the fine they set vpon his head (which was fiue Minas) he was driuen to forsake Athens, and to get him into Ionia where he died. Yet doth not Craterus bring forth any probable matter to proue this true he writeth: as his pleading, his sentence and condemnation, or any decree passed against him, although he vse great diligence else in collecting all such matters, and vouching his authors. Furthermore, other writers that haue specially noted the faults and offences committed by the people of ATHENS in former times against their Captaines and gouernours: they doe declare Themistocles exile, Miltiades captiuity that died in prison, Pericles fine wherein he was condemned, Paches death that slue himselfe in the pulpit for orations, when he saw he was condemned: tell diuerse such stories, adding to also Aristides banishment: but yet they make no mention of the condemnation which Craterus speaketh off. Moreouer, Aristides tombe to be seene at this day vpon the hauen of Phalerus, which was set vp for him at the charge of the common wealth, as it is reported, because he died so poore a man, as they found nothing in his house to bury him with. Other go further, and say that his daughters were maried by decree of the people, at the charge of the common wealth, and that the city gaue euery one of them three thousand Drachmas: and his sonne Lysimachus, a hundred Minas of siluer, and a hundred Iugera, & at Alcibiades request, who was the author of the decree, they gaue him foure Drachmas a day besides, of ordinary allowance. Furthermore, when this Lysimachus died, they left him liue one onely daughter called Polyzelie, whom the people appointed, as Callisthenes writeth, as much prouision to liue withall, as they gaue to any that wan the Olympian games. Also sithence, Demetrius PHALERIAN, Hieronymus RHODIAN, Aristoxenus the Musitian, and Aristotle the Philosopher, at the least if the booke intituled of Nobility bee any of Aristotles workes: all these agree together, that one Myrto, Aristides daughters daughter, was maried to the wise Socrates, who tooke her to his wife (hauing a wife already) because shee was a poore widdow, and could not be maried for her pouerty, hauing much a doe to liue. Yet Panætius doth write against them, in his booke of Socrates life. But Demetrius PHALERIAN writeth in his booke he intituled Socrates, that he could remember very well hee had seene one Lysimachus, Aristides sonnes sonne, or his daughters sonne, that was very poore, and liued of that he could get to interpret dreames, by certaine tables, wherein was written the arte to interpret the signification of dreames: and that he kept commonly about the temple of Bacchus called Iacchion, vnto whom, together with his mother and his sister, he sayd he had caused the people to giue them a Triobolum a peece, euery day towardes their liuing. It is very true that selfe same Demetrius PHALERIAN, when he reformed the state of ATHENS, ordained that the mother and sister should haue eche of them a Drachma by the day to finde them withall, out of the common chamber of the city. And it is no new, nor strange thing, that the people of ATHENS were so carefull to helpe, and to relieue, the women that dwelt in the city: considering that in times past, Aristogiton hauing a lide daughter in the Ile of LEMNOS, in very hard and poore state, and that could not be bestowed in marriage for her pouerty, they caused her to be brought to ATHENS, and maried her in one of the noblest houses of the city, and made her a ioynter besides in the village of POTAMOS. Which great curtesie and humanity of theirs, hath euer deserued great fame and commendation, and yet continueth euen vntill this daie, in that noble city of ATHENS, in the mouth of euery man there.

THE LIFE OF
Marcus Cato the Censor.

Marcus Cato and his auncesters, were (as they say) of the city of TVSCVLVM: but before he went vnto the warres, and dealt in matters of the common wealth, he dwelt and liued in the countrey of the SABINES, vpon certaine land his father left him. And though to many his auncesters were knowen to haue ben obscure: yet hee him selfe did highly commend his father Marcus, by bearing his name, & saying he was a souldier, and had serued valiantly in the fielde. And he telleth also of another Cato that was his great grandfather, who for his valiant seruice had bene oft rewarded of the generals, with such honorable gifts, as the ROMAINES did vse to giue vnto them, that had done some famous act in any battel: and how that he hauing lost fiue horses of seruice in the wars, the value of the same were restored to him againe, in money of the common treasure, because he had shewed himselfe trusty and valiant for the common welth. And where they had a common speach at Rome to call them vpstarts, that were no gentlemen borne, but did rise by vertue: it fortuned Cato to be called one of them. And for his part he did confesse it, that he was of the first of the house that euer had honour, and office of state: but by reason of the noble actes and good seruice of his auncestors, he maintained he was very auncient. He was called at the beginning after his third name, Priscus: but afterwards by reason of his great wisedome and experience he was surnamed Cato, because the ROMAINS call a wise man, and him that hath seene much. Cato called an vpstart. The definition of this word Cato.

He was somewhat giuen to be red faced, and had a paire of staring eyes in his head, as this man telleth vs: that for ill will wrote these verses of him after his death.

Pluto (the god) which rules the furies infernall, will not receiue the damned ghost, of Porcius in his hall:
his saucy coppered nose, and fiery staring eyes,

and all becauſe he did vſe to labor and toile euen from his youth, and to liue ſparingly, as one that was euer brought vp in the wars from his youth: ſo that he was of a very good conſtitution, both for ſtrength of body, as for health alſo. As for vtterance, he eſteemed it as a ſeconde body, and moſt neceſſary gift, not only to make men honeſt, but alſo as a thing very requiſite for a man that ſhould beare ſway and authority in the common wealth. He practiſed to ſpeake well in litle villages neare home, whither he went many times to plead mens cauſes in court iudiciall, that would retaine him of counſell: ſo as in ſhort time hee became a perfect pleader and had tongue at will, and in proceſſe of time became an excellent orator. After he was thus well knowen, they that were familiar with him, began to perceiue a graue manner and behauiour in his life, and a certaine noble mind in him, worthy to be employed in matters of high and great importance, and to be called into the common wealth. For he did not only refuſe to take fees for his pleading, and following the cauſes he maintained: but furthermore made no reckoning of the eſtimation he wan by that manner and practiſe, as though that was not the only marke he ſhot at. But his deſire reached further, rather to win him ſelfe fame by ſeruing in the wars, and by valiant fighting with his enemy: then with ſuch a quiet and pleaſing manner of life. Inſomuch as when he was but a young ſtripling in maner, he had many cuts vpon his breſt, which he had receiued in diuerſe battels and encounters againſt the enemies. For he himſelfe writeth, that he was but ſeuenteene yeare old, when he went firſt vnto the warres, which was about the time of Hannibals chiefe proſperity, when he ſpoyled and deſtroyed all Italy. So when he came to fight, he would ſtrike luſtely, and neuer ſturre foote nor giue backe, but would looke cruelly vpon his enemy, and threaten him with a fearfull & terrible voice, which he vſed him ſelfe, and wiſely taught other alſo to vſe the like: for ſuch countenances, ſayeth he, many times do feare the enemies more, then the ſword yee offer them. When he went any iourney, he euer marched a foote, and caried his armor vpon his backe, and had a man waiting on him that caried his vittels with him, with whom he was neuer angry (as they ſay) for any thing he had prepared for his dinner or ſupper, but did helpe to dreſſe it him ſelfe for the moſt part, if he had any leyſure, when hee had done the duty of a priuate ſouldier in fortifying the campe, or ſuch other needfull buſineſſe. All the while he was abroad in ſeruice in the wars he neuer dranke other then cleane water, vnles it were when he found he was not well and then he would take a litle vineger: but if he ſaw he were weake, he would then drinke a litle wine. Now it fortuned that Manius Curius the ROMAINE, who had triumphed thriſe, had a houſe and land hard by Cato, where he kept in times paſt, which Cato for a walke would often viſite. And he conſidering how litle land he had to his houſe, and what a litle houſe he had of all, and how poorely it was built, wondered with him ſelfe what maner of man Curius was: bene, that hauing bene the greateſt man of ROME in his time, and hauing ſubdued the moſt nations and people of all ITALY, and driuen king Pyrrus alſo out of the ſame: yet him ſelfe with his owne hands did manure that litle patch of ground, and dwell in ſo poore and ſimple fatme. Whither notwithſtanding, after his three triumphs, the SAMNYTES ſent their Ambaſſadours to viſite him, who found him by the fires ſide ſeething of parſeneapes, and preſented him a maruellous deale of gold from their ſtate and communalty. But Curius returned them againe with their gold, and told them, that ſuch as were contented with that ſupper, had no need of gold nor ſiluer: and that for his part, he thought it greater honour to command them that had gold, then to haue it him ſelfe. Cato remembring theſe thinges to him ſelfe, went home againe, and beganne to thinke vppon his houſe, of his liuing, of his family and ſeruaunts, and alſo of his expences: and to cut off all ſuperfluous charges, and fell him ſelfe to labour with his owne handes, more then euer he had done before. Furthermore, when Fabius Maximus tooke the city of TARENTVM againe, Cato ſerued vnder him being very young, where he came into familiar acquaintance with Nearchus the PYTHAGORIAN philoſopher, in whō he had maruellous delight to hear him talke of Philoſophy. Which Nearchus held the ſame opinion of pleaſure, that Plato did, by calling it the ſweete poyſon and chiefeſt bayte to allure men to ill: and ſaying that the body was the firſt plague vnto the ſoule, and that her onely health and remedy, and purgation ſtoode vppon rules of reaſon, good examples and contemplations, to driue ſinfull thoughts and carnall pleaſures of the body, far off from her. Cato moreouer him selfe much to sobriety and temperaunce, and framed him selfe to be contented with litle. They say he fell in his very olde age to the study of the Greeke tongue, and to reade Greeke bookes, and that he profited somwhat by Thucydides, but much more by Demosthenes, to frame his matter, and also to be eloquent. Which plainely appeareth, in all his bookes and writings, full of authorities, examples, & stories taken out of Greeke authors: and many of his sentences and morals, his adages and quick answers, are translated out of the same word for word. Now there was a noble man of ROME at that time, one of great authority, and a deepe wise man besides, who could easily discerne buddes of vertue sprowting out of any towardly youth, who was of a good and honourable disposition to helpe forward, and to aduaunce such. His name was Valerius Flaccus, a neare neighbour vnto Cato, who was informed by his seruants of Catoes strange life, how he would be doing in his ground with his owne hands: and how he would be gone euery day betimes in the morning to litle villages thereabout, to pleade mens causes that praied his counsaile, & that when he had done, he would come home againe: and if it were in winter, that he would but cast a litle coat on his shoulders, and being sommer hee would go out bare, naked to the waist, to worke in his ground among his seruaunts and other workemen: and would besides, sit and eate with them together at one bord, and drinke as they did. Moreouer, they told him also a world of such maners and fashions which he vsed, that shewed to be a marueilous plaine man, without pride and of a good nature. Then they told him what notable wise sayings and graue sentences they heard him speake. Valerius Flaccus hearing this report of him, willed his men one day to pray him to come to supper to him. Who falling in acquaintance with Cato, and perceiuing he was of a very good nature, & well giuen, & that he was a good griffe to be set in a better ground: he perswaded him to come to ROME, and to practise there in the assembly of the people, in the common causes and affaires of the common weale. Cato followed his counsaile, who hauing bene no long practiser among them, did grow straight into great estimation, and wanne him many friends, by reason of the causes he tooke in hand to defend: and was the better preferred and taken also, by means of the speciall fauor and countenance Valerius Flaccus gaue him. For first of all, by voice of the people he was chosen Tribune of the souldiers, (to say, colonell of a thousand footemen) and afterwards he was made treasurer: and so went forwards, and grew to so great credit and authority, as he became Valerius Flaccus companion in the chiefest offices of state, being chosen Consull with him, & then Censor. But to begin with al, Cato made choise of Quintus Fabius Maximus, aboue all the Senators of ROME, & gaue him selfe to follow him altogether: and not so much for the credit & estimation Fabius Maximus was off, (who therein exceeded all the ROMAINS of that time) as for the modesty and discrete gouernment he saw in him, whom hee determined to follow, as a worthy mirrour and example. At which time Cato passed not for the malice and euill will of Scipio the great, who did striue at that present being but a yong man, with the authority and greatnesse of Fabius Maximus, as one that seemed to enuy his rising and greatnes. Cato being sent treasurer with Scipio, when he vndertooke the iourney into AFRICA, and perceiuing Scipioes bountifull nature and disposition to large gifts without meane to the souldiers: he tolde him plainely one day, that he did not so much hurt the common wealth in wasting their treasure, as he did great harme in changing the auncient manner of their auncestors: who vsed their souldiers to be contented with litle, but hee taught them to spend their superfluous money (all necessaries prouided for) in vaine toies and trifles, to serue their pleasure. Scipio made him answer, hee would haue no treasurer should controll him in that sort, nor that should looke so narrowly to his expenses: for his intent was to go to the warres, with full sailes as it were, and that he would (and did also determine to) make the state priuy to all his doings, but not to the money he spent. Cato hearing this answere, returned with speede out of SICILE vnto ROME, crying out with Fabius Maximus in open Senate, that Scipio spent infinitely, and that he tended plaies, commedies, and wrestlings, as if he had not beene set to make warres, inuasions, and attempts vppon their enemies. Vpon this complaint the Senate appointed certaine Tribunes of the people, to goe and see if their informations were true; and finding them so, that they should bring him backe againe to ROME. But Scipio shewed farre otherwise to the commissioners that came thither, and made them see apparaunt victory, through the necessary preparation and prouision he had made for the warres: and he confessed also, that when he had dispatched his great busines, and was at any leysure, he would be priuately mery with his friends: and though he was liberall to his souldiers, yet that made him not negligent of his duety and charge in any matter of importaunce. So Scipio took shipping, and sailed towards AFRIKE, whither he was sent to make warre. Now to return to Cato. uerse called him the Demosthenes of ROME: howbeit the maner of his life was in more estimation then his eloquence. For all the youth of ROME did seeke to attaine to his eloquence and commendation of wordes, and one enuied another which of them should come neareſt: but few of them would file their handes with any labour as their forefathers did, and make a supper and dinner, without fire or prouision, or would be content with a meane gowne, a poore lodging, and finally would thinke it more honorable to defie fansies & pleasures, then to haue and enioy them. Because the state was waxē now of such power and wealth, as it could no more retaine the auncient discipline, and former austerity and straightnes of life it vsed by reason of the largenes of their dominion and seigniory, and the numbers of people and nations that were become their subiects, it was euen forced to receiue a medley of sundry countrey fashions, examples, and maners. This was a cause, why in reason men did so greatly wonder at Catoes vertue, when they saw other straight wearied with paines and labour, tenderly brought vp like pulers: and Cato on the other side neuer ouercommen, either with the one or with the other, no not in his youth, when he most coueted honor, nor in his age also when he was gray headed and balde, after his Consulship and triumphe, but like a conqueror that had gotten the maistery, he would neuer giue ouer labor euen vnto his dying day. For he wrote him selfe, that there neuer came gowne on his backe that cost him aboue a hundred pence, that his hindes and worke men alwaies drunke no worse wine, when he was Consull and generall of the army, then he did him selfe: and that his Cater neuer bestowed in meate for his supper, aboue thirty Asses of ROMAINE money, and yet he sayed it was, because hee would be the stronger, and apter to do seruice in the wars for his countrey and the common weale.

He sayd furthermore, that being heire to one of his friends that died, he had a peece of tapestry by him with a deepe border, which they called then the Babylonian border, and he caused straight to be sold: and that of all his houses he had abroade in the countrey, hee had not one wall plastered, nor rough cast. Moreouer he would say, hee neuer bought bondeman or woman dearer, then a thousand fiue hundred pence, as one that sought not for fine made men, nor goodly personages, but strong fellowes that could away with paines, as carters, horsekeepers, neatheardes, and such like: and againe he would sell them when they were olde, because he would not keepe them when they could do no seruice. To conclude, he was of opinion that no man bought any thing deare, that was for litle purpose: yea, though he gaue but a farthing for it, he thought it too much to bestow so litle, for that which needed not. Hee would haue men purchase houses, that had more store of arable land and pasture, then of fine horteyardes or pleasant deins. Some say, he did thus, for very misery and couetousnesse: other thinke, and not amisse, that he liued so sparingly, to moue others by his example to cutte off all superfluity and waste.

Neuertheleſſe, to sell slaues in that sort, or to turne them out of dores when you haue had the seruice of all their youth, and that they are growen old, as you vse bruite beastes that haue serued whileſt they may forage: me thinkes that must needes proceede of too seuere and grieuous nature, that hath no longer regard or consideration of humanity, then whileſt one is able to doe an other good. For we see, gentleneſſe goeth further then iuſtice. For nature teacheth vs to vſe iuſtice onely vnto men, but gentleneſſe sometimes is shewed vnto bruite beastes: for that commeth from the very fountaine and spring of all curteſie and humanity, which shall neuer drie vp in any man liuing. For to say truely, to keepe caſt horſes spoiled in our seruice, and dogs also not onely when they are whelps, but when they be old: be euen tokens of gentleneſſe and kindneſſe. As the ATHENIANS made a law, when they builded their temple called Hecatompedon: that they should suffer the moyles and mules that did seruice in their carriage about the building of the same, to graze euery where, without let or trouble of any man. And they say, there was one of their moiles thus turned at liberty, that came her selfe to the place about, going before all the other draught beastes, that drew vp cartes loden towardes the ci-tie, and kept them companie, as though she seemed to encourage the rest to draw: which the people liked so well in the poore beast, that they appointed shee should be kept whilest she lived, at the charge of the towne. And yet at this present are the graues of Cimons mates to be seene, that wanne him thrise together the game of the horse race at the games Olympian, and they are hard by the graue of Cimon himselfe. We heare of diuerse also that had buried their dogges they brought vppe in their house, or that waited on them: as among others, olde Xanthippus buried his dogge on the toppe of a cliffe, which is called the dogges pit vnto this day. For when the people of ATHENS did forsake their citie at the comming downe of Xerxes the king, this dogge followed his maister, swimming in the sea by his gallies side, from the firme lande, vnto the Ile of SALAMINA. And there is no reason, to vse liuing and sensible things, as wee would vse an olde shoo or a ragge, to cast it out vppon the dung-hill when we haue worne it, and can serue vs no longer. For if it were for no respect else, but to vse vs alwaies to humanitie: we must euer shewe our selues kinde and gentle, euen in such small pointes of pittie. And as for me, I could neuer finde in my heart to sell my draught Oxe that had ploughed my lande a long time, because he could plough no longer for age: and much lesse my slaue to sell him for a litle money, out of the country where he had dwelt a long time, to plucke him from his old trade of life wherewith he was best acquainted, and then especially, when he shall be as vnprofitable for the buier, as also for the seller. But Cato on the other side gloried, that he left his horse in SPAYNE he had serued on in the warres during his Consulship, because he would not put the commonwealth to the charge of bringing of him home by sea into ITALIE. Now a question might be made of this, and probable reason of either side, whether this was noblenesse, or a niggardlinesse in him: but otherwise to say truly, he was a man of a wonderful abstinence. For when he was generall of the army, he neuer tooke allowance but after three bushels of wheat a moneth of the commonwealth, for himselfe & his whole family: and but a bushell and halfe of barley a day, to keepe his horse and other beasts of his cariage. On a time when he was Praetor, the gouernment of the Ile of SARDINIA fell to his lot. And where the other Praetors before him had put the country to exceeding great charge, to furnish them with tents, bedding, clothes, and such like stuffe, and burthened them also with a maruellous traine of seruants and their friends that waited on them, putting them to great expence of feasting and banketing of them: Cato in contrary maner brought downe all that excesse and superfluitie, vnto a maruellous neere and vncredible sauing. For when he went to visite the cities, he came a foote to them, and did not put them to a penny charge of himselfe: and had onely one officer or bailife of the state, that waited on him, and caried his gowne and a cup with him, to offer vp wine to the gods in his sacrifices. But though he vsed himselfe simply to the subiects, and eased them of their former charges, yet he shewed himselfe seuere and bitter to them in matters concerning iustice: and spared no man, in any commaundement or seruice for the state and common wealth. For he was therein so precise, that he would not beare with any litle fault. So by this meanes, he brought the SARDINIANS vnder his gouernment, both to loue and feare the Empire of ROME, more then euer they did before. For his grace both in speaking and writing did rightly shew him selfe: because it was pleasant and yet graue: sweete and fearefull: merry and seuere: sententious, and yet familiar, such as is meete to be spoken. And he was to be compared, as Plato sayed vnto Socrates: who at the first sight seemed a plaine simple manne to them that knew him not outwardly, or like a pleasaunt taunter or mocker: but when they did looke into him, and found him throughout, they saw he was full of graue sentences, goodly examples, and wise perswasions, that he would make men water their plantes that heard him, and leade them as hee would by the eare. Therefore I can not see any reason that moues men to say, Cato hadde Lasias grace and eloquence. Notwithstanding, lette vs referre it to their iudgements that make profession to discerne orators graces and stiles: for my part I shall content my selfe to write at this present, onely certaine of his notable sayings and sentences, perswading my selfe that mens manners are better discerned by their wordes, then by their lookes, and so doe many thinke.

request, about those that were banished from ACHAIA. The matter was argued after in the Senate, and there fell out diuers opinions about it. Some would haue had them reſtored to their country and goods againe: other were wholly againſt it. So Cato riſing vp at the laſt, ſaid vnto them. It ſeemes we haue litle elſe to doe, when we ſtande beating of our braines all day, diſputing about theſe olde GRECIANS, whether the ROMAINES or the ACAIANS ſhall burie them. In the end, the Senate tooke order they ſhould be reſtored vnto their countrie againe. Whereupon Polybius thought to make petition againe vnto the Senate, that the baniſhed men whom they had reſtored by their order, might enioy their former eſtates and honors in ACHAIA, they had at the time of their baniſhment: but before he would moue the matter vnto the Senate, he would feele Catoes opinion firſt, what he thought of it. Who anſwered him, ſmyling: me thinkes Polybius thou art like Vlyſſes, that when he had ſcaped out of the Cyclops caue the giant, he would needes goe thither againe, to fetch his hatte and girdle he had left behind him there. He ſaid alſo, that wiſe men did learne and profite more by fooles, then fooles did by wiſe men. For wiſe men ſaide he, do ſee the faultes fooles commit, and can wiſely auoide them: but fooles neuer ſtudie to follow the example of wiſe mens doings. He ſaid alſo that he euer liked young men better that bluſhed, then thoſe that looked euer whitely: and that he would not haue him for a ſouldier, that wagges his hande as he goeth, remoues his feete when he fighteth, and rowteth and ſnorteth louder in his ſleepe, then when he cryeth out to his enemie. An other time when he would taunt a maruellous fatte man: ſee, ſaide he, what good can ſuch a body do to the commonwealth, that from his chinne to his codpeece is nothing but belly? And to another man that was giuen to pleaſure, and deſired to be great with him: my friend, ſaied Cato, as refuſing his acquaintance: I cannot liue with him that hath better iudgement in the pallate of his mouth, then in his hart. This was alſo his ſaying, that the ſoule of a louer, liued in anothers body: and that in all his life time he repented him of three things. The firſt was, if that he euer tolde ſecret to any woman: the ſecond, that euer he went by water, when he might haue gone by lande: the third, that he had bene idle a whole day, and had done nothing. Alſo when he ſaw a vicious olde man, he would ſay, to remoue him: O gray beard, age bringeth many deformities with it, helpe it not beſides with your vice. And to a ſeditious Tribune of the people that was ſuſpected to be a poiſoner, and would needes paſſe ſome wicked law by voice of the people, he would ſay: O young man, I know not which of theſe two be worſe, to drinke the drugges thou giueſt, or to receiue the lawes thou offereſt. An other time, being reuiled by one that led a lewde and naughtie life: go thy way, ſaid he, I am no man to ſcolde with thee. For thou art ſo vſed to reuile, and to be reuiled, that it is not dainty to thee: But for my ſelfe, I neuer vſe to heare ſcolding, and much leſſe delight to ſcolde. Theſe be his wiſe ſayings we finde written of him, whereby we may the eaſilier coniecture his maners and nature. Now, when he was choſen Conſul with his friend Valerius Flaccus, the gouernment of SPAYNE fell to his lot, that is on this ſide of the riuer of BETIS. So, Cato hauing ſubdued many people by force of armes, and wonne others alſo by friendly meanes: ſodainly there came a maruellous great army of the barbarous people againſt him, and had enuironed him ſo, as he was in maruellous danger, either ſhamefully to be taken priſoner, or to bee ſlaine in the field. Wherefore, he ſent preſently vnto the CELTIBERIANS, to pray aide of them, who were next neighbours vnto the marches where he was. Theſe CELTIBERIANS did aske him two hũdred talents to come & helpe him: but the ROMAINS, that were about him, could not abide to hire the barbarous people to defend them. Then Cato told them ſtraight, there was no hurt in it, nor any diſhonour vnto them. For ſayed he, if the field be ours, then we ſhall pay their wages we promiſed, with the ſpoile and money of our enemies: and if we loſe it, then our ſelues and they lie by it, being left neither man to paie, nor yet any to aske it. In the end hee wanne the battell, after a ſore conflict, and after that he had maruellous good fortune. For Polybius writeth, that all the walles of the cities that were on this ſide the riuer of BÆTIS, were by his commaundement raſed all in one day, which were many, and full of good ſouldiers. Him ſelfe writeth, that hee tooke moe cities in SPAINE, then he remained there daies: and it is no vaine boaſt, if it be true that is written, that there were foure hundred cities of them. Now, though the ſouldiers vnder him had got well in this iourney, and were rich, yet he cauſed a pound weight of ſiluer to be giuen to euery ſouldier beſides: ſaying, he liked it better that many ſhould returne home with ſiluer in their purſes, then a few of them with gold onely. But for himſelfe he affirmed: that of all the ſpoile gotten of the enemies, he neuer had any thing, ſauing that which hee tooke in meate and drinke. And yet, ſaith he, I ſpeake it not to reproue them that grow rich by ſuch ſpoiles but becauſe I would contend in vertue rather with the beſt, then in money with the richeſt, or in couetouſneſſe with the moſt vertuous. For, not onely he himſelfe was cleare from bribes and extortion, but his officers alſo vnder him kept the ſame courſe. In this Spaniſh iorney, he had fiue of his ſeruantes with him, whereof one of them called Paulus, bought three young boyes that were taken in the warres, when the ſpoile was ſold to them that would giue moſt. So Cato knew it. But Paulus being affraide to come neere his maiſter, hung himſelfe: and then Cato ſolde the boyes againe, and put the money made of them into the treaſurie cheſtes of ſtuing at Rome. Now while Cato was in Spaine. Scipio the great that was his enemy, & ſought to hinder the courſe of his proſperitie, and to haue the honour of conquering all the reſt of Spayne: he made all the friendes he could to the people, to be choſen in Catoes place. He was no ſooner entred into his charge, but he made all the poſſible ſpeede he could to be gone, that he might make Catoes authoritie ceaſe the ſooner. Cato hearing of his haſtie comming, tooke only fiue enſignes of footemen, and fiue hundred horſemen to attend vpon him home: with the which, in his iorney homeward, he ouercame a people in Spayne called the Lacetanians, and tooke ſixe hundred traitors alſo that were fled from the Romaines campe to their enemies, and did put to death euery mothers childe of them. Scipio ſtorming at that, ſaid Cato did him wrong. But Cato to mocke him finely, ſaid: it was the right way to bring Rome to floriſh, when noble borne citizens would not ſuffer meane borne men, and vpſtarts as himſelfe was, to go before them in honor: and on the other ſide when meane borne men would contend in vertue, with thoſe that were of nobleſt race, and farre aboue them in calling. For all that, when Cato came to Rome, the Senate commaunded that nothing ſhould be changed nor altered otherwiſe, then Cato had appointed it, whileſt he was in his office. So that the gouernment for which Scipio made ſuch earneſt ſute in Spayne, was a greater diſgrace vnto him, then it was vnto Cato: becauſe he paſſed al his time & office in peace, hauing no occaſion offered him to do any notable ſeruice worthy memorie. Furthermore, Cato after he had been Conſull, and had graunted to him the honor to triumphe: did not as many others doe, that ſeeke not after vertue, but onely for worldly honor and dignity. Who, when they haue been called to the higheſt offices of ſtate, as to be Conſuls, and haue alſo granted them the honor to triumphe: do then leaue to deale any more in matters of ſtate, & diſpoſe themſelues to liue merrily and quietly at home, and not to trouble themſelues any more. Now Cato, farre otherwiſe behaued himſelfe. For he would neuer leaue to exercile vertue, but began a freſh, as if he had bene a young nouelle in the worlde, and as one greedy of honour and reputation, and to take as much paines and more then he did before. For, to pleaſure his friends or any other citizen, he would come to the market place, and plead their cauſes for them that required his counſell, and goe with his friends alſo into the warres. As he went with Tiberius Sempronius the Conſull, and was one of his Lieutenants at the conqueſt of the countrey of Thrace, and vnto the prouinces adioyning to the riuer of Danvbye vpon thoſe marches. After that he was in Greece alſo, Collonell of a thouſand footemen, vnder Manius Aquilius, againſt king Antiochus ſurnamed the great, who made the Romaines ſo much affraid of him, more euer they were of enemy but Hanniball. For, when he had conquered all the regions and prouinces of Asia, which Seleucus Nicanor enioyed before, & had ſubdued many barbarous and warlike nations: he was ſo proud hearted, as he would needs haue wars with the Romaines whom he knew to be the only worthy men, and beſt able to fight with him. So he made ſome honeſt ſhew and pretence of warres, ſaying: it was to ſet the Grecians at liberty, who had no cauſe thereof, conſidering they liued after their owne lawes, and were but lately deliuered from the bondage of king Philp, and of the Macedonians, through the goodneſſe of the Romaines. Notwithſtanding, he came out of Asia into Greece with a maruellous great army, and all Greece was ſtraight in armes and in wonderfull daunger, becauſe of the great promiſes and large hopes the gouernours of diuerſe cities (whom the king had wonne and corrupted corrupted with money) did make vnto them. Whereupon Manius dispatched Ambassadors vnto the citie, and sent Titus Quintius Flaminius among others, who kept the greatest part of the people from rebelling (that were easily drawen to giue care to this innouation) as we haue expressed more amply in his life: and Cato being sent Ambassadour also, perswaded the CORINTHIANS, those of PATRAS, and the ÆGIANS, and made them sticke still to the ROMAINES, and continued a long time at ATHENS. Some say they finde an oration of his written in the Greeke tongue, which hee made before the ATHENIANS, in commendation of their auncestors: wherein he said, he tooke great pleasure to see ATHENS, for the beautie and statelinesse of the citie. But this is false. For he spake vnto the ATHENIANS by an interpreter, though he could haue vttered his oration in the Greeke tongue if he had beene disposed: but he did like the lawes and customes of his owne countrie, and the ROMAINE tongue so well, that he laughed at them that would praise and commend the Greeke tongue. As he did once mocke Posthumius Albinus, who wrote an historie in the Greeke tongue, praying the readers in his preface to beare with him, if they found any imperfection in the tongue: mary, saide Cato, he had deserued pardon in deede, if he had beene forced to haue written his storie in the Greeke tongue, by order of the states of GREECE, called the councel of the Amphictyons. They say the ATHENIANS wondered to heare his ready tongue. For what he had vttered quickly in few words vnto the interpreter: the interpreter was driuen to deliuer them againe with great circumstances, and many wordes. So that he left them of this opinion, that the GRECIANS words lay all in their lips, and the ROMAINES wordes in their heads. Now king Antiochus kept all the straites and narrow passages of the mountaines called THERMOPYLES (being the ordinary way and entry into GREECE) and had fortified them aswell with an armie that camped at the foote of the mountaine, as also with walles and trenches he had made by hand, besides the naturall strength and fortification of the mount it selfe in sundry places: and so he determined to remaine there, trusting to his owne strength and fortifications aforesaid, and to turne the force of the warres some other way. The ROMAINES also, they despaired vtterly they should be able any way to charge him before. But Cato remembring with himselfe the compasse the PERSIANS had fetched about before time likewise to enter into GREECE: he departed one night from the campe with part of the armie: to proue if he could finde the verie compasse about, the barbarous people had made before. But as they climed vp the mountaine, their guide that was one of the prisoners taken, in the countrie, lost his way, and made them wander vp and downe in maruellous steepe rockes and crooked wayes, that the poore souldiers were in maruelous ill taking. Cato seeing the danger they were brought into by this lewde guide, commaunded all his souldiers not to sturre a foot from thence, and to tarry him there: and in the meane time he went himselfe alone, and Lucius Manlius with him (a lustie man, and nimble to climbe vpon the rockes) and so went forwarde at aduenture, taking extreame and vncredible paine, and in as much danger of his life, grabbing all night in the darke without moone light, through wilde Olyue trees, and high rockes (that let them they could not see before them, neither could tell whither they went) vntill they stumbled at the length vppon a litle path way, which went as they thought directly to the foote of the mountaine, where the campe of the enemies lay. So they set vppe certaine markes and tokens, vppon the highest toppes of the rockes they could choose, by view of eye to be discerned furthest off vpon the mountaine called Callidromus. And when they had done that, they returned backe againe to fetch the souldiers, whom they led towardes their markes they had set vp: vntill at the length they found their path way againe, where they putte their souldiers in order to march. Now they went not farre in this path they found, but the way fayled them straight, and brought them to a bogge: but then they were in worse case then before, and in greater feare, not knowing they were so neare their enemies, as in deede they were. The day began to breake a litle, and one of them that marched formost, thought he heard a noise, and that he saw the GREEKES campe at the foote of the rockes, and certaine souldiers that kept watch there. Whereupon Cato made thē stay, and willed only the FIRMANIANS to come vnto him, and none but them, because hee had found them faithfull before, and very ready to obey his commandement. They were with him at a trise to know his pleasure: so Cato sayd vnto them.

My fellowes, I must haue some of our enemies taken prisoners, that I may know of them who they be that keepe that passage, what number they be, what order they keepe, how they are camped and armed, and after what sort they determine to fight with vs. The way to worke this feate standeth vpon swiftnesse and hardinesse to runne vpon them sodainely, as Lions doe, which being naked feare not to runne into the middest of any heard of fearefull beasts. He had no sooner spoken these wordes, but the FIRMANIAN souldiers beganne to runne downe the mountaine as they were, vpon those that kept the watch: and so setting vpon them, they being out of order, made them flie, and tooke an armed man prisoner. When they had him, they straight brought him vnto Cato, who by oath of the prisoner, was aduertised howe that the strength of their enemies armie was lodged about the person of the king, within the straight and valley of the saide mountaine: and that the souldiers they saw, were sixe hundred ÆTOLIANS, all braue souldiers, whom they had chosen and appointed to keepe the toppe of the rockes ouer king Antiochus campe. When Cato had heard him, making small account of the matter, as well for their small number, as also for the ill order they kept: he made the trumpets sound straight, and his souldiers to march in battell with great cries, himselfe being the formost man of all his troupe, with a sword drawen in his hand. But when the ÆTOLIANS saw them comming downe the rockes towardes them, they beganne to flie for life vnto their great campe, which they filled full of feare, trouble, and all disorder. Now Manius at the same present also, gaue an assault vnto the walles and fortifications the king had made ouerthwart the vallies and straights of the mountaines: at which assault king Antiochus selfe had a blow on the face with a stone, that strake some of his teeth out of his mouth, so that for very paine and anguish he felt, he turned his horse back, and got him behinde the preasse. And then there were none of his armie that made any more resistance, or that could abide the fierceneesse of the ROMAINES. But notwithstanding that the places were very ill for flying by cause it was vnpossible for them to scatter and straggle, being holden in with high rockes on the one side of them, and with bogges and deepe marisses on the other side, which they must needes fall into if their feete slipped, or were thrust forward by any: yet they fell one vpon other in the straights, and ranne so in heapes together, that they cast themselues away for feare of the ROMEINES swords that lighted vpon them in euery corner. And there Manius Cato, that neuer made ceremonie or niseneesse to praise himselfe openly, nor reckoned it any shame to do it: did take a present occasion for it, as falleth out vpon all victorie and famous exploites. And so did set it out with all the ostentation and braue words he could giue. For he wrote with his owne hands, and such as saw him chase and lay vpon his flying enemies that day, were driuen to say, that Cato was not bound to the ROMAINS, but the ROMAINS bound vnto Cato. And then Manius the Consull selfe, being in a great heate with the furie of the battell, embraced Cato a great while, that was also hotte with chasing of the enemie: and spake aloude with great ioy before them all, that neither he, nor the people of ROME could recompence Cato for his valiant seruice that day. After this battell, the Consull Manius sent Cato to ROME, to be the messenger him selfe to report the newes of the victory. So hee imbarked incontinently, and had such a faire winde, that he passed ouer the seas to BRINDES without any daunger, and went from thence vnto TARENTVM in one day, and from TARENTVM in fiue daies more to ROME. And so he came to ROME in fiue dayes after his landing in ITALIE. He made such speede, that him selfe was in deede the first messenger that brought newes of the victory. Whereupon he filled all ROME with ioy and sacrifices, and made the ROMAINES so proude, that euer after they thought them selues able men to conquer the world both by sea and land. And these bee all the martiall deedes and noble actes Cato did. But for his doings in ciuill policy and state, he seemed to be of this opinion. That to accuse and pursue the wicked he thought it was the best thing an honest man and good gouernour of the common weale could employ him selfe vnto: for he accused many, and subscribed many other accusations which they preferred. And to be short, he did alwaies stirre vp some accuser, as he did Valerius against Scipio. But Scipio, by reason of his nobility, the greatnes of his house, and the magnanimity of his minde, passed not for any accusation they could lay against him: being out of all feare, they should be able to condemne him. And so he let fall the accusation he had gainst him. Notwithstanding, he ioyned with other that accused Lucius Scipio, his own brother, and followed the matter so sore against him, that he caused him to be condemned in a great summe of money to the cõmon wealth: who being vnable to pay the fine, had gone to prison, and hardly scaped it, had not the Tribunes of the people reuoked his condemnation. It is said that Cato comming through the market place one day, and meeting with a young man by the waye that had ouerthrowne his aduersarie in sute, and put one of his late fathers greatest enemies to open shame and foyle before the people: he imbraced him with a good countenance, and sayed vnto him. Oh my sonne, sacrifices that good children should offer to their fathers soule, be not lambes nor kiddes, but the teares and condemnations of their enemies. But as he vexed other, so he scaped not free himselfe from danger, in administration of the common welth. For if they could catch the least vantage in the world of him, his enemies straight accused him; so as they say he was accused almost a fifty times, and at the last time of his accusation, he was about the age of fourescore yeares. And then he spake a thing openly that was noted: that it was a harder thing to giue vp an account of his life before men in any other world, then in this amongst whome he liued. And yet was not this the last sute he followed: for foure yeares after, when he was fourescore and tenne yeares of age, he accused Servius Galba. And thus he liued as Nestor, in manner three ages of man, alwayes in continuall sute & action. For when he wrestled with the first Scipio the AFRICAN about matters of state and commonwealth; he went on vnto the time of the second, that was adopted by the first Scipios sonne, the naturall sonne of Paulus AEmilius, who ouercame Perseus, king of MACEDON. Furthermore, Marcus Cato tenne yeares after his Consulship, sued to be Censor, which was in ROME the greatest office of dignity that any citizen of ROME could attaine vnto: & as a man may say, the roome of all glory and honour of their common wealth. For among other authorities, the Censor had power to examin mens liues and manners, and to punish euery offendor. For the ROMAINES were of that minde, that they would not haue men marry, beget children, liue priuately by themselues, and make feastes and banquets at their pleasure, but that they should stand in feare to be reproued and inquired of by the magistrate: and that it was not good to giue euery body liberty, to do what they would, following his owne lust and fancie. And they iudging that mens naturall dispositions do appeare more in such things, then in all other things that are openly done at noone dayes, and in the sight of the world: vsed to choose two Censors, that were two Surueyors of mãners, to see that euery man behaued himselfe vertuously, and gaue not themselues to pleasure, nor to breake the lawes and customes of the common wealth. These officers were called in their tongue, Censores, and alwayes of custome one of them was a PATRICIAN, and the other a cõmoner. These two had power & authoritie to disgrade a knight by taking away his horse, and to put any off the Senate, whom they saw liue dissolutely and disorderly. It was their office also, to cesse and rate euery citizen according to the estimation of their goodes, to note the age, genealogie, and degrees of euery man, and to keepe bookes of them, besides many other prerogatiues they had belonging to their office. Therefore when Cato came to sue for this office among other, the chiefest Senators were all bent against him. Some of them for very enuy, thinking it shame and dishonor to the nobility, to suffer men that were meanely borne, and vpstartes (the first of their house and name, that euer came to beare office in the state) to be called and preferred vnto the highest offices of state in all their cõmon wealth. Other also that were ill liuers, & knowing that they had offended the lawes of their coũtry: they feared his cruelty too much, imagining he would spare no man, nor pardon any offence, hauing the law in his own hands. So when they had consulted together about it, they did set vp seuen competitors against him, who flattered the people with many fayre words and promises, as though they had neede of magistrates to vse them gently, and to doe things for to please them. But Cato contrariwise, shewing no countenance that he would vse them gently in the office, but openly in the pulpit for orations, threatning those that had liued naughtily and wickedly, he cryed out: that they must reforme their citie, and perswaded the people not to choose the gentlest, but the sharpest phisitions: and that himselfe was such an one as they needed, and among the PATRICIANS Valerius Flaccus an other, in whose company he hoped (they two being chosen Censors) to do great good vnto the common wealth, by burning and cutting off (like Hydras heades) vanitie and voluptuous pleasures, that were crept in amongest them: and that he saw well nough, how all the other suters sought the office by dishonest meanes, fearing such offices they knew would deale iustly and vprightly. Then did the people of ROME shew themselues nobly minded, and worthy of noble gouernours. For they refused not the towerdes uerity of Cato, but reiected those meale-mouthed men, that seemed ready to please the ple in all things: and thereupon chose Marcus Cato Censor, and Valerius Flaccus to be fellow, and they did obey him, as if he had beene present officer, and no suter for the being in themselues to giue it to whom they thought good. The first thing he did after he stalled in his Censorship, was that he named Lucius Valerius Flaccus, his frend & fellow for with him, prince of the Senate: & among many other also whom he thrust out of the nate, he put Lucius Quintius Flaminius off the Senate, that had bene Consul seuen yeares fore, and was brother also vnto Titus Quintius Flaminius that ouercame Philip king of MADON in battell, which was greater glory to him, then that he had bene Consul. But the why he put him off the Senate, was this. This Lucius Quintius caried euer with him a yong boy to the warres, whom he gaue as good countenance and credit vnto, as to any of his familiar friends he had about him. It fortuned on a time whilest Lucius Quintius was Consul and gouernour of a prouince, that he made a feast, and this boy being set at his table, by him, as his manner was, he beganne to flatter him, knowing how to handle him when he pretily merry: and soothing him, told him he loued him so deerly, that vpon his departing ROME, when the Swordplayers were ready to fight for life and death with vnrebated swords to shew the people pastime, he came his way, and left the sight of that he neuer saw, that very desirous to haue seene a man killed. Then this Lucius Quintius, to make him see the sayed: care not for the sight thou hast lost, boy, for I will let thee see as much. And when had spoken these wordes, he commaunded a prisoner condemned to dye, to be fetched brought into his hall before him, and the hangman with his axe. Which was forthwith according to his commaundement. Then asked he the boy, if hee would straight see the killed: yea sir, sayed the boy: and with that he bad the hangman strike off his head. Many ters report this matter thus. And Cicero to confirme it also, wrote in his booke de Se that the same was written in an oration Cato made before the people of ROME. Now Quintius being thus shamefully put off the Senate by Cato, his brother Titus being withall, could not tell what to doe, but besought the people that they would command to declare the cause, why he brought such shame vnto his house. Whereupon Cato before the people, made recitall of all this feast. And when Lucius denied it, affirming not so: Cato would haue had him sworne before them all, that it was not true they had ned him withall. But Lucius prayed them to pardon him, who sayed he would not swear. Whereupon the people iudged straight that he deserued well that shame. So not long certaine games being shewed in the Theater, Lucius came thither, and passing beyond ordinary place that was appointed for those that had been Consuls, he went to sit alock mongest the multitude. The people tooke pity on him, and made such a do about him, forced him to rise, and to go sit among the other Senators that had bene Consuls: saluting best they could, the shame and dishonor happened vnto so noble a house. Cato put out Senate also, one Manlius, who was in great towardnes to haue beene made Consul the yeare following, onely because he kissed his wife too louingly in the day time, and before daughter: and reprouing him for it, he tolde him, his wife neuer kissed him, but when it dered. So when he was disposed to be merry, he would say it was happy with him when thundered. He tooke away Lucius Scipioes horse from him, that had triumphed for the ries he had won of the great king Antiochus: which wan him much ill will, because it red to the world he did it of purpose, for the malice he did beare Scipio the AFRICAN, was dead. But the thing that most grieued the people, of all other extreamities he vsed, was putting downe of all feasts and vaine expences. For a man to take it cleane away, and to openly seene in it, it was vnpossible, because it was so common a thing, and euery man was so to it. Therefore Cato to fetch it about indirectly, did praise euery citizens goodes, and their apparrell, their coches, their litters, their wiues chaines and iewels, and all other moueables and houſehold ſtuffe, that had coſt aboue a thouſand fiue hundred Drachmes a peece, at leſſe times as much as they were worth: to the end that ſuch as had beſtowed their money in thoſe curious trifles, ſhould pay ſo much more ſubſidie to the maintenance of the common wealth, as their goods were ouer valued at. Moreouer he ordained for euery thouſand Aſſes that thoſe trifling things were praiſed at, the owners thereof ſhould pay three thouſand Aſſes to the common treaſury: to the end that they who were grieued with this taxe, and ſawe other pay leſſe ſubſidy (that were as much worth as themſelues, by liuing without ſuch toyes) might call home themſelues againe, and lay aſide ſuch fooliſh brauery and fineneſſe. Notwithſtanding Cato, was enuied euery way. Firſt, of them that were contented to pay the taxe impoſed, rather then they would leaue their vanity: and next, of them alſo, that would rather reforme themſelues, then pay the taxe. And ſome thinke that this law was deuiſed rather to take away their goods, then to let them to make any ſhewe of them: and they haue a fond opinion beſides, that their riches are better ſeene in ſuperfluous things, then in neceſſarie. Whereat they ſay Ariſtotle the Philoſopher did wonder more, then at any other thing: how men could thinke them more rich and happy, that had many curious and ſuperfluous things, then thoſe that had neceſſary and profitable things. And Scopas the THESSALIAN, whē one of his familiar frends asked him, I know not what trifling thing, & to make him grant it the ſooner, told him it was a thing he might well ſpare, and did him no good: marry ſayeth he, all the goods I haue, are in ſuch toyes as do me no good. So this couetous deſire we haue to be rich, commeth of no neceſſarie deſire in nature, but is bred in vs by a falſe opinion from the common ſort. Now Cato caring leaſt of all for the exclamations they made againſt him, grewe to be more ſtraight and ſeuere. For he cut off the pipes and quilles priuate men had made to conuey water into their houſes & gardens, robbing the city of the water that came frō their cōmon conduite heads, and did plucke downe alſo mens porches that were made before their dores into the ſtreete, and brought down the priſes of cōmon works in the city, and moreouer raiſed the common farmes and cuſtomes of the city, as high as he could: all which things together made him greatly hated and enuied of moſt men. Wherefore, Titus Flaminius, and certaine other being bent againſt him in open Senate, cauſed all Catoes couenants and bargains made, with the maſter work-man for repairing and mending of the common buildings and holy places, to be made voyde, as things greatly preiudiciall to the common wealth. And they did ſo ſtirre vp the boldeſt and raſheſt of the Tribunes of the people againſt him, becauſe they ſhould accuſe him vnto the people, and make requeſt he might be condemned in the ſumme of two talents. They did maruellouſly hinder alſo the building of the pallace he built at the charge of the common wealth, looking into the market place vnder the Senate houſe: which pallace was finiſhed notwithſtanding, and called after his name, Baſilica Porcia: as who ſhould ſay, the pallace Porcius the Cenſor built. Howbeit it ſeemed the people of ROME did greatly like and commend his gouernment in the Cenſorſhip. For they ſet vp a ſtatue of him in the tēple of the goddeſſe of health, whereunder they wrote not his victories nor triumph, but onely ingraued this inſcription word for word, to this effect by tranſlation: For the honor of Marcus Cato the Cenſor: becauſe he reformed the diſcipline of the common wealth of ROME (that was farre out of order, and giuen to licentious life) by his wiſe precepts, good manners, and holy inſtitutions. Indeed, before this image was ſet vp for him, he was wont to mocke at them that delighted, and were deſirous of ſuch things: ſaying, they did not conſider how they bragged in founders, painters and image makers, but nothing of their vertues: and that for himſelfe, the people did alwaies carry liuely images of him in their hartes, meaning the memory of his life and doings. When ſome wondred why diuerſe meane men & vnknowne perſons had images ſet vp of thē, and there were none of him: he gaue them this anſwer. I had rather men ſhould aske why Cato had no image ſet vp for him, then why he had any. In the end, he would haue no honeſt mā abide to be praiſed, vnles his praiſe turned to the benefit of the cōmon wealth: and yet was he one of them that would moſt praiſe himſelfe. So that if any had done a fault, or ſtept awry, and that men had gone about to reproue them: he would ſay they were not to be blamed, for they were no Catoes that did offend. And ſuch as counterfeated to follow any of his doings, and came short of his manner, he called themselues handed Catoes. He would say that in most daungerous times the Senate vsed to cast their eyes vpon him, as passengers on the sea do looke vpon the master of the shippe in a storme: so that many times when he was absent, the Senate would put ouer matters of importance vntill he might come among them. And this is confirmed to be true, as well by other as himselfe. His authoritie was great in matters of state, for his wisdome, his eloquence, and great experience. Besides this commendation, they praised him for a good father to his children, a good husband to his wife, and a good sauer for his profit: for he was neuer careless of them, as things to be lightly passed on. And therefore me thinkes I must needes tell you the way some part of his wel doing, to follow our declaration of him. First of all he married a gentlewoman more noble then rich, knowing that either of both should make her proude and stout enough: but yet he thought the nobler borne, would be the more ashamed of dishonest then the meaner borne: and therefore they would be more obedient to their husbandes, and honest manner and reasonable things. Furthermore, he sayed: that he that bet his wife or childe, did commit as great a sacriledge, as if he polluted or spoyled the holiest things in the worlde: and he thought, it a greater praise for a man to be a good husband then a great Senator. And therefore he thought nothing more commendable in the life of olde Socrates then his patience, in vsing his wife well, that was such a shrewe, and his children that were so harebrainde. After Catoes wife had brought him a sonne, he coulde not haue so earnest businesse in hand, if it had not touched the common wealth, but he would let all alone, and go home to his house, about the time his wife did vnswadell the young boy to wash and dress him: for she gaue it sucke with her owne breasts, and many times would let the slaues children sucke of her also, because they might haue a naturall loue towardes her sonne, hauing sucked one milke, and beene brought vp together. When his sonne was come to age of discretion, and that he was able to learne any thing, Cato himselfe did teach him, notwithstanding he had a slaue in his house called Chilo (a very honest man, and a good Grammarian) who did also teach many other: but as he sayed himselfe, he did not like, a slaue should rebuke his sonne, nor pull him by the eares, when peraduenture he was not apt to take very sodainly that was taught him: neither would he haue his sonne bounde to a slaue for so great a matter, that, as to haue his learning of him. Wherefore he himselfe taught him his grammer, the lawe, and to excercise his body, not onely to throwe a dart, to play at the sword, to vawte, to ride a horse, and to handle all sortes of weapons, but also to fight with fistes, to abide colde and heate, and to swim ouer a swift running riuer. He sayed moreouer, that he wrote great histories in great letters with his owne hand, because his sonne might learne in his father house the vertues of good men in times past, that he taking example by their doings, should frame his life to excell them. He sayed also, that he tooke as great heed of speaking any vnhonest or vncomely words before his sonne, as he would haue done if he had been before the Vestall Nunnes. He neuer was in the hotte house with his sonne: for it was a common vse with the ROMAINES at that time, that the sonnes in law did not bathe themselues with their mothers in lawe, but were ashamed to see one another naked. But afterwardes they hauing learned of the GREEKES to wash themselues naked with men, it taught them also to be naked in the bathe euen with their wiues. There lacked no towardlines, nor good disposition in Cato his sonne, to frame himselfe vertuous: for he was of so good a nature, that he shewed himself willing to followe whatsoeuer his father had taught him. Howbeit he was such a weakeling, that he could not away with much hardnesse, & therefore his father was contented not to binde him to that straight and painefull life, which himselfe had kept. Yet he became valiant in the warres. For he fought maruellous stoutly in the battell, in which Perseus king of MACEDON was ouerthrowen by Paulus AEmilius: where his sword being stricken out of his hand, with a great blow that lighted on it, and by reason his hand was somewhat sweaty besides, he fell into a great fury and prayed of his frends about him to recouer it. So they all together ranne vpon the enemies in that place where his sword fell out of his hand, & came in fiercely on them, that they made a lane through them, and clearing the place, found it in the end, but with much a do, being vnder such a heape of dead bodies and other weapons as were

ROMAINES as MACEDONIANS, one lying on an other. Paulus Æmilius the generall hearing of this act of his, did highly cõmend the young man. And at this day there is a letter extant from Cato to his sonne, in the which he praiseth this worthy fact and toile of his, for the recouering of his sworde againe. Afterwardes, this Cato the younger maried Tertia, one of Paulus AEmilius daughters, and sister vnto Scipio the second, & so was matched in this noble house, not only for his own vertues sake, but for respect of his fathers dignity and authority: whereby the great care, paines and study that Cato the father tooke in bringing vp his son, in vertue and learning, was honorably rewarded in the happy bestowing of his sonne. He euer had a great number of young litle slaues which he bought, when any would sell their prisoners in the warres. He did choose them thus young, because they were apt yet to learne any thing he would traine them vnto, & that a man might breake thẽ, like yoũg coltes, or litle whelps. But none of them all, how many soeuer he had, did euer go to any mans house, but whẽ himselfe or his wife did send them. If any man asked them what Cato did: they answered, they could not tell. And when they were within, either they must needs be occupied about somewhat, or else they must sleepe: for he loued them well that were sleepy, holding opinion that slaues that loued sleepe were more tractable, and willing to do any thing a man would set them to, then those that were waking. And because he thought that nothing did more prouoke slaues to mischiefe and naughtines, then lust & desire of women: he was contented his slaues might company with his bondwomen in his house, for a peece of money he appointed them to pay, but with straight commaundement besides, that none of them should deale with any other woman abroad. At the first when he gaue himselfe to follow the warres, and was not greatly rich, he neuer was angry for any fault his seruants did about his person: saying that it was a foule thing for a gentleman or noble man, to fall out with his seruants for his belly. Afterwardes, as he rose to better state, and grew to be wealthier, if he had made a dinner or supper for any of his friends and familiars, they were no sooner gone, but he would scourge them with whips and leather thongs, that had not waited as they should haue done at the borde, or had forgotten any thing he would haue had done. He would euer craftily make one of them fall out with another: for he could not abide they should be friends, being euer iealous of that. If any of them had done a fault that deserued death, he would declare his offence before them all: and then if they condemned him to dye, he would put him to death before thẽ all. Howbeit in his latter time he grew greedie, and gaue vp his tillage, saying that it was more pleasant, thẽ profitable. Therefore because he would lay out his mony surely, & bring a certen reuenue to his purse, he bestowed it vpon ponds, and naturall hotte bathes, places fit for fullers craft, vpon meadows and pastures, vpon copises and young wood: and of all these he made a great & a more quiet reuenue yearely, which he would say, Iupiter himselfe could not diminish. Furthermore, he was a great vsurer, both by land and by sea: and the vsurie he tooke by sea, was most extreame of all other, for he vsed it in this sort. He would haue them to whom he lent his money vnto, that trafficked by sea, to haue many partners, and to the nũber of fifty: and that they should haue so many shippes. Then he would venture among them for a part only, whereof Quintius his slaue whom he had manumissed, was made his factor, & vsed to sayle, and traficke with the marchantes, to whom he had lent his money out to vsury. And thus he did not venture all the money he lent, but a litle peece only for his part, and got maruellous riches by his vsury. Moreouer he lent monie to any of his slaues, that would therwith buy other yoũg slaues, whom they taught & brought vp to do seruice, at Catoes charge and cost: & then they sold them againe at the yeares end, and some of them Cato kept for his owne seruice, and gaue his slaues as much for them, as any other offred. Therefore to allure his son in like manner to make profit of his money: he told him it was no wise mans part to diminish his substance, but rather the parte of a widdowe. Yet this was a token of a most greedy couetous minde, that he durst affirme him to be diuine, and worthy immortall praise, that increased his wealth and patrimony more, then his father left him. Furthermore, when Cato was grown very old, Carneades the ACADEMICKE, and Diogenes the STOICKE, were sent from ATHENS as Ambassadors to ROME, to sue for a release of a fine of fiue hundred talents which they had imposed on the ATHENIANS vpon a condẽnatiõ passed againſt thẽ for a contempt of appearaunce, by the sentence of the SICYONIANS, at the sute of the OROPIANS. Immediately whē these two Philosophers were arriued in the city of ROME, the young gentlemen that were giuen to their bookes, did visit and welcome them, and gaue great reuerence to them after they had heard them speake, and specially to Carneades: whose grace in speaking, and force of perswading was no lesse, then the fame ranne vpon him, and specially when he was to speake in so great an audience, and before such a state, as would not suppresse his praise. ROME straight was full, as if a winde had blown this rumor into euery mans eare: that there was a GRECIAN arriued, a famous learned man, who with his eloquence would leade a man as he lust. There was no other talke a while through the whole city, he had so inflamed the young gentlemens mindes with loue and desire to be learned: that all other pleasures and delightes were set aside, and they disposed themselues to no other exercise, but to the studie of Philosophie, as if some secret and diuine inspiration from aboue had prouoked them to it. Whereof the Lordes and Senators of ROME were glad, and reioyced much to see their youth so well giuen to knowledge, and to the studie of the Greeke tongue, and to delight in the company of these two great and excellent learned men. But Marcus Cato euen from the beginning that young men beganne to studie the Greeke tongue, and that it grew in estimation in ROME, did dislike of it: fearing least the youth of ROME that were desirous of learning and eloquence, would vtterly giue ouer the honour and glory of armes. Furthermore, when he sawe the estimation and fame of these two personages did increase more and more, and in such sort that Caius Aquilius, one of the chiefest of the Senate made sute to be their interpretour: he determined then to conuey them out of the cittie by some honest meane and colour. So he openly found fault one daye in the Senate, that the ambassadours were long there, and had no dispatch: considering also they were cunning men, and could easily perswade what they would. And if there were no other respect, this only might perswade them to determine some answer for thē, and so to send them home againe so to their schooles, to teach their children of GREECE, and to let alone the children of ROME, that they might learne to obey the lawes and the Senate, as they had done before. Now he spake this to the Senate, not of any priuate ill will or malice he bare to Carneades, as some men thought: but because he generally hated Philosophy, and of ambition despised the muses and knowledge of the Greeke tongue. Which was the more suspected, because he had sayed, that Socrates was but a busy man, & a sturrer vp of sedition, and sought by all meanes possible to surpe tiranny, and rule in his coūtrie: by peruerting & changing the manners & custōs of the same, and alluring the subiectes thereof to a disliking of their lawes and auncient customes. And he laughed at Socrates schoole, that taught the arte of eloquēce: saying his scholers waxed olde, and were still so long in learning, that they ment to vse their eloquence and pleade causes in an other world, before Minos when they were dead. Therefore to plucke his sonne from the studie of the Greeke tongue, he sayed to him with a strained voyce, and in a bigger sound then he was wont to do: (as if he had spoken to him by way of prophecy or inspiration) that so long as the ROMAINES disposed themselues to studie the Greeke tongue, so long would they mar and bring all to naught. And yet time hath proued his vaine words false and vntrue. For the cittie of ROME did neuer flourish so much, nor the ROMAINE Empire was euer so great, as at that time, when learning and the Greeke tongue most flourished. Howbeit Cato did not onely hate the philosophers of GREECE, but did dislike them also, that professed phisicke in ROME. For he had either heard or read the answer Hippocrates made, when the king of PERSIA sent for him, & offred him a great summe of gold and siluer, if he would come and serue him: who sware he would neuer serue the barbarous people, that were naturall enemies to the GRECIANS. So Cato affirmed, it was an oth that all other phisitians had euer after: wherefore he commaunded his sonne to flye from them all alike, and sayed he had written a litle booke of phisicke, with the which he did heale those of his house when they were sicke, and did keepe them in health when they were whole. He neuer forbad them to eate, but did alwaies bring them vp with hearbes, and certaine light meates, as mallards, ringdoues and hares: for such meates, sayed he, are good for the sicke, and light of digestion, sauing that they make them dreame and snort that eate them. He boasted also how with maner of phiſicke, he did alwaie keepe himſelfe in health, and his family from ſickneſſe. Yet for all that, I take it he did not all that he bragged of: for he buried both his wife, and his ſonne alſo. But he himſelfe was of a ſtrong nature, and a luſtie bodie, full of ſtrength, and health, and liued long without ſickeneſſe: ſo that when he was a very olde man and paſt mariage, he loued women well, and married a young maiden for that cauſe onely. After his firſt wife was dead, he maried his ſonne vnto Paulus Æmylius daughter, the ſiſter of Scipio, the ſecond AFRICAN. Cato him ſelfe being a widower, tooke paines with a pretie young maide that waited in his houſe, and came by ſtelth to his chamber: howbeit this haunt could not long continue ſecret in his houſe, and ſpecially where there was a young gentlewoman maried, but needs muſt be ſpied. So, one day when this young maide went ſomwhat boldly by the chamber of young Cato, to goe in to his father, the young man ſaid neuer a worde at it: yet his father perceiued that he was ſomewhat aſhamed, and gaue the maide no good countenance. Wherefore finding that his ſonne and daughter in law were angrie with the matter, ſaying nothing to them of it, nor ſhewing them any ill countenance: he went one morning to the market place (as his maner was) with a traine that followed him, amongeſt whom was one Salonius, that had bene his clearke, and waited vpon him as the reſt did. Cato calling him out aloude by his name, asked him if he had not yet beſtowed his daughter. Salonius aunſwered him, he had not yet beſtowed her, nor would not before he made him priuie to it. Then Cato tolde him againe: I haue found out a husbande for her, and a ſonne in lawe for thee, and it will be no ill match for her, vnleſſe ſhe miſlike the age of the man, for in deede hee is very olde, but otherwiſe there is no fault in him. Salonius tolde him againe, that for that matter, he referred all to him, and his daughter alſo, praying him euen to make what match he thought good for her: for ſhe was his humble ſeruant, and relyed wholly vppon him, ſtanding in neede of his fauour and furtherance. Then Cato beganne to diſcouer, and tolde him plainely hee would willingly marrie her himſelfe. Salonius therewith was abaſhed, becauſe he thought Cato was too olde to marrie then, and him ſelfe was no fit man to match in any honourable houſe, ſpecially with a Conſull and one that had triumphed: howbeit in the ende, when he ſawe Cato ment good earneſt, he was very glad of the match, and ſo with this talke they went on together to the market place, and agreed then vpon the marriage. Now while they went about this matter, Cato the ſonne taking ſome of his kinne and friendes with him, went vnto his father, to aske him if he had offended him in any thing, that for ſpight he ſhould bring him a ſteppe mother into his houſe. Then his father cried out, and ſaid: O my ſonne, I pray thee ſay not ſo, I like well all thou doeſt, and I find no cauſe to complaine of thee: but I do it, becauſe I deſire to haue many children, and to leaue many ſuch like citizens as thou art, in the commonwealth. Some ſay that Piſiſtratus the tyrant of ATHENS, made ſuch a like aunſwere vnto the children of his firſt wife, which were men growen, whē he maried his ſecond wife Timonaſſa, of the towne of ARGOS, of whom he had (as it is reported) Iophon, and Theſſalus. But to returne againe to Cato, he had a ſonne by his ſecond wife, whom he named after her name, Cato SALONIAN: and his eldeſt ſonne died in his office being Prætor, of whom he often ſpeaketh in diuerſe of his bookes, commending him for a very honeſt man. And they ſay, he tooke the death of him very paciently, and like a graue wiſe man, not leauing therefore to do any ſeruice for buſineſſe for the ſtate, otherwiſe then he did before. And therein he did not as Lucius Lucullus and Metellus ſurnamed Pius, did afterwards: who gaue vp medling any more with matters of gouernment and ſtate, after they were waxen olde. For he thought it a charge and duetie, whereunto euery honeſt man whileſt he liued was bound in all pietie. Nor as Scipio AFRICAN had done before him, who perceiuing that the glorie and fame of his doings did purchaſe him the ill will of the citizens, he changed the reſt of his life into quietneſſe, and forſooke the citie and all dealings in cōmon wealth, and went & dwelt in the country. But as there was one that told Dionyſius the tirant of SYRACVSA, as it is written, that he could not die more honorably, then to be buried in the tyrannie: euen ſo did Cato thinke, that he could not waxe more honeſtly old, then in ſeruing of the common wealth vnto his dying day. So at vacant times, when Cato was deſirous a litle to recreate and refreſh himſelfe, he paſſed his time away in reading of bookes, and looking vppon his husbandry in the country. This is the cauſe why he wrote so many kindes of bookes and stories. But his tillage and husbandry in the countrie did tend and follow all in his youth, for his profit. For he said he had but two sortes of reuenue, tillage, and sparing: but in age, whatsoeuer he did in the countrie, it was all for pleasure and to learne some thing euer of nature. For he hath written a booke of the countrie life, of tillage, in the which he sheweth how to make tartes and cakes, and how to keepe them. He would needes shew such singularity and skill in all things: when he was in his house in the country, he fared a litle better then he did in other places, and would oftentimes bid his neighbours, and such as had land lying about him, to come and suppe with him, and he would be merry with them: so that his companie was not onely pleasant, and liking to old folke him selfe, but also to the younger sort. For he had seene much, and had experience in many things, and vsed much pleasant talke profitable for the hearers. He thought the bord of the chiefest meanes to breede loue amongest men, and at his owne table would alwaies praise good men and vertuous citizens, but would suffer no talke of euill men, neither in praise nor dispraise. Now it is thought the last notable act and seruice he did in the common wealth, was the ouerthrow of CARTHAGE: for in deede he that wanne it and rased it was Scipio the second, but it was chiefely through Catoes counsell & aduise, that the last warre was taken in hand against the CARTHAGINIANS, & chaunced vpon this occasion. Cato was sent into AFRICKE to vnderstand the cause and controuersie that was betwene the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, king of NVMIDIA, which were at great warres together. And he was sent thither because king Massinissa had euer bene a friend vnto the ROMAINES, and that the CARTHAGINIANS were become their confederates since the last wars, in the which they were ouerthrowen by Scipio the first, who tooke for a fine of them, a great part of their Empire, and imposed vpon them besides, a great yearely tribute. Nowe when he was come into that countrie, he found not the citie of CARTHAGE in miserie, beggerie, and out of order as the ROMAINES supposed: but full of lustie youthes very rich and wealthy, and great store of armour and munition in it for the warres, so that by reason of the wealth thereof, CARTHAGE caried a high saile, and stouped not for a litle. Wherefore he thought that it was not then time for the ROMAINES to leaue to vnderstand the controuersies betwixt the CARTHAGINIANS and Massinissa, and rather to prouide betimes to destroy CARTHAGE, that had euer an auncient enemie to the ROMAINES, and euer sought to be reuenged of that they had suffered at their hands before, and that they were now growen to that greatnesse and courage in so short time, as in manner it was incredible: so as it was likely they would fall into great enmitie with the ROMAINES, as they euer did before. Therefore so soone as he returned to ROME, he plainely told the Senate, that the losses and harmes the CARTHAGINIANS had receiued by the last warres they had with them, had not so much diminished their power and strength, as the same had shewed their owne folly and lacke of wisedome: for it was to be feared much, least their late troubles had made them more skilfull, then weakened them in the warres. And that they made warres now with the NVMIDIANS, to exercise themselues, meaning afterwards to warre with themselues: and that the peace they had made with them was but an intermission and stay of warres, onely expecting time and opportunity to begin with them againe. They say moreouer, that besides the perswasions he vsed, he brought with him of purpose, AFRICKE figges in his long sleeues, which he shooke out amongest the Senate. When the Senators maruelled to see so goodly faire greene figges, he said: This countrie that beareth them, is not aboue three daies sailing from ROME. But yet this is a straunge which they report of him besides: that he neuer declared his opinion in any matter in the Senate after that, but this was euer the one end of his tale: me thinketh still CARTHAGE would be vtterly destroyed. Publius Scipio Nasica, vsed euer in like manner the contrarie speech: that he thought it meete CARTHAGE should stand. This Publius Scipio sawe, by his opinion, that the ROMAINES through their pride and insolency were full of absurdities, caried themselues very high, by reason of their happy successe and victories, and were seditious minded, that the Senate could hardly rule them: and that by reason of their great authoritie they imagined they might bring their citie to what height they would. Therefore he feared that the feare of CARTHAGE might alwaies continue as a bridle, to raigne in the insolencie

f the people of ROME, who knew well enough, that the CARTHAGINIANS were of no ſuf-ient power to make wars with the ROMAINES, nor yet to ouercome them: & euen ſo were y not wholly to be deſpiſed, and not to be feared at all. Cato ſtill replied to the contrary, that erein conſiſted the greateſt danger of all: that a citie which was euer of great force & power, d had bene puniſhed by former warres & miſerie, would alwaies haue an eie of reuenge to eir enemies, & be much like a horſe that had broken his haltar, that being vnbridled, would one vpon his rider. And therefore he thought it no good nor ſound aduiſe, ſo to ſuffer the ARTHAGINIANS to recouer their ſtrength, but rather they ought altogether to take away outward daunger, and the feare they ſtood in to looſe their conqueſt: and ſpecially, when y left meanes within the citie ſelfe to fall ſtill againe to their former rebellion. And this is cauſe why they ſuppoſe Cato was the occaſion of the third and laſt warre the ROMAINES d againſt the CARTHAGINIANS. But now when the warre was begun, Cato died, and be-e his death he prophecied, as a man would ſay, who it ſhould be that ſhould end thoſe wars. d it was Scipio the ſecond, who being a young man at that time, had charge only as a Co- Catoes death.

THE COMPARISON OF
Ariſtides with Marcus Cato.

NOW that we haue ſet downe in writing, theſe notable and worthy thinges of memorie: if we will conferre the life of the one, with the life of the other, perhappes the difference betweene the one and the other will not eaſily be diſcerned, ſeeing there be ſo many ſimilitudes and reſemblances one of an other. But if wee come to compare them in euery particularitie, as we would do Poets works, or pictures drawen in tables: firſt, in this we ſhall finde them much a like, that hauing had nothing elſe to preferre and commend them, but their only vertue and wiſedom, they haue bene both gouernors Ariſtides and Catoes acceſſe to the common wealth.

in their common wealth, and haue thereby atchieued to great honour and eſtimation. But me thinkes when Ariſtides came to deale in matters of ſtate, the common wealth and ſeigniorie of ATHENS was then of no great power, & therefore it was eaſie for him to ſet himſelfe in great Beſides, the other gouernors & captaines that were of his time, & competitors with him, were not very rich, nor of great authoritie. For the taxe of the richeſt perſons then at ATHENS reuenue, was but at fiue hundred buſhels of corne and vpwards, and therefore were ſuch called Pentacoſiomedimni. The ſecond taxe was but at three hundred buſhels, and they were called knights. The third & laſt was at two hundred buſhels, and they called them Zeugitæ. When Marcus Cato comming out of a litle village from a rude countrie life, went at the firſt dash (as it were) to plunge himſelfe into a bottomleſſe ſea of gouernement in the common weale of ROME: which was not ruled then by ſuch gouernors and captaines, as Curius, Fabricius, Oſtilius were in old time. For the people of ROME did no more beſtow their offices vpon the meane labouring men, as came but lately from the plough and the mattocke: but they would looke now vpon the nobilitie of their houſes, and vpon their riches that gaue them money, or ſued earneſtly to them for the offices. And by reaſon of their great power and authoritie, they would be waited vpon and ſued vnto, by thoſe that ſought to beare the honorable offices of the ſtate and common wealth. And it was no like match nor compariſon, to haue Themiſtocles an aduerſarie and competitor, being neither of noble houſe, nor greatly rich (for to ſay, that all the goods his father left him, were not worth aboue foure or fiue hundred talents when he began to deale in ſtate) in reſpect as to contend for the chiefeſt place of honour & authority againſt Scipio AFRICAN, Seruilius Galba, or Quintius Flaminius, hauing no other maintenance, nor helpe to truſt vnto, but a tongue ſpeaking boldly with reaſon and all vprightneſſe. Moreouer, Ariſtides at the battels of MARATHON, and of PLATÆES, was but one of the captaines of the ATHENIANS: where Cato was choſen one of the two Conſuls among many other noble and great competitors, and one of the two Cenſors, before ſeuen other that ſued ſute for it, which were all men of great reputation in the citie, and yet was Cato preferred before them all. Furthermore, Ariſtides was neuer the chiefeſt in any victorie. For at the battell of MARATHON, Miltiades was the generall: and at the battell of SALAMINA, Themiſtocles, and at the iourney of PLATÆES, king Pauſanias, as Herodotus ſaith, who writeth that he had a maruellous victory there. And there were that ſtriued with Ariſtides for the ſecond place, Sophanes, Amynias, Callimachus, and Cynegirus, euery one of the which did notable valiant uice at thoſe battels. Now Cato was generall himſelfe, and chiefe of all his army in worthie and counſell, during the warre he made in SPAYNE while he was Conſull. Afterwards at the iourney where king Antiochus was ouerthrowen in the country of THERMOPILÆ, being but a Colonell of a thouſand footemen, and ſerning vnder an other that was Conſull, wanne the honour of the victorie, when he did ſodainely ſet vpon Antiochus behind, where he looked only to defend himſelfe before. And that victorie without all doubt was one of the chiefeſt actes that euer Cato did, who draue ASIA out of GRECE, and opened the way to Lucius Scipio to paſſe afterwardes into ASIA. So then for the warres, neither the one nor other of them was euer ouercome in battell: but in peace and ciuill gouernement, Ariſtides was ſupplanted by Themiſtocles, who by practiſe got him to be baniſhed ATHENS for ten yeares. Whereas Cato had in manner all the greateſt and nobleſt men of ROME that were in his time ſworne enemies vnto him, and hauing alwaies contended with them euen to his laſt gaſpe, he euer kept him ſelfe on ſound grounde, like a ſtout champion, and neuer tooke the foyle. For he hauing accuſed many before the people, and many alſo accuſing him: he was neuer once condemned, but alwaies his tongue was the buckler and defence of his life and innocencie. Which was to him ſo neceſſarie a weapon, and with it he could help himſelfe ſo in great matters, that (in my opinion) it was only cauſe why he neuer receiued diſhonor nor was vniuſtly condemned: rather then for any thing elſe he was beholding to ſome eloquence to any other that did protect him. And truely, eloquence is a ſingular gift, as Antipater ſaith, in that he wrote of Ariſtotle the Philoſopher after his death: ſaying, that among many other ſingular graces and perfections in him, he had this rare gift, that he could perſwade what he liſted. Now there is a rule confeſſed of all the world, that no man can attaine any vertue or knowledge, then to knowe how to gouerne a multitude of men, or a citie: a part whereof is Oeconomia, cõmonly called houſerule, conſidering that a citie is no other, then an aſſembly of many houſholds & houſes together, and then is the citie commonly ſtrong and of power, when as the townes men and citizens are wiſe and wealthy. Therefore Lycurgus that baniſhed gold and ſiluer from LACEDÆMON, and coyned them money of iron, that would be marred with fire & vinegar when it was hot, did not forbid his citizens to be good husbands: but like a good lawmaker, exceeding all other that euer went before him, he did not only cut off all ſuperfluous expences that commonly waite vpon riches, but did alſo prouide that his people ſhould lacke nothing neceſſarie to liue withall, fearing more to ſee a begger and needy perſon dwelling in his citie, and enioy the priuiledges of the ſame, then a proud man by reaſon of his riches. So me thinkes, Cato was as good a father to his houſehold, as he was a good gouernor to the common wealth: for he did honeſtly increaſe his goods, and did teach other alſo to doe the ſame, by ſauing and knowledge of good husbandry, whereof in his booke he wrote ſundry good rules and precepts. Ariſtides contrariwiſe, made iuſtice odious and ſlanderous by his pouertie, and as a thing that made men poore, and was more profitable to other, then to a mans ſelfe that vſed iuſtice. And yet Heſiodus the Poet, that commendeth iuſtice ſo much, doth wiſh vs withall to be good husbands, reprouing ſloth and idlenes, as the roote and originall of all iniuſtice. And therefore me thinkes Homer ſpake wiſely when he ſaid.

Oeconomia, houſerule.

In times paſt, neither did I labour, carcke nor care for buſineſſe, for family, for foode, nor yet for fare:
but rather did delight, with ships the ſeaes to ſaile,

As giuing vs to vnderſtand that iuſtice & husbandry are two relatiues, & neceſſarily linked one to the other: and that a man who hath no care of his owne things, nor houſe, doth liue vniuſtly, and taketh from other men. For iuſtice is not like oyle, which Phiſitions ſay is very holſome for mans bodie, if it be applied outwardly: and in contrary manner very ill, if a man drinke it: neither ought a iuſt man to profite ſtraungers, and in the end not to care for him ſelfe nor his. Therefore, me thinkes this gouerning vertue of Ariſtides had a fault in this reſpect, if it be true that moſt authors write of him: that he had no care nor forecaſt with him to leaue ſo much, as to marrie his daughters withall, nor therewith to burie himſelfe. Where thoſe of the houſe of Cato, continued Prætors and Conſuls of ROME, euen vnto the fourth deſcent. For his ſonnes ſonnes, and yet lower, his ſonnes ſonnes ſonnes came to the greateſt offices of dignitie in ROME. And Ariſtides, who was in his time the chiefeſt man of GREECE, left his poſteritie in ſo great pouerty, that ſome were compelled to become Soothſaiers (that interprete dreames, and tell mens fortune) to get their liuing, and other to aske almes: and left no meane to any of them, to do any great thing worthy of him. But to contrary this, it might be ſaid, pouertie of it ſelfe is neither ill nor diſhoneſt: but where it groweth by idleneſſe, careleſſe life, vanitie, and folly, it is to be reproued. For when it lighteth vpon any man that is honeſt, and liueth well, that taketh paines, is very diligent, iuſt, valiant, wiſe, and gouerneth a common wealth well: then it is a great ſigne of a noble minde. For it is vnpoſſible that man ſhould doe any great thinges, that had ſuch a baſe minde as to thinke alwaies vppon trifles: and that he ſhould relieue the poore greatly, that lacketh himſelfe reliefe in manie thinges. And ſure, riches is not ſo neceſſarie for an honeſt man that will deale truely in the common wealth, and gouernement, as is ſufficiencie: which being a contentation in it ſelfe, and deſirous of no ſuperfluous thing, it neuer withdraweth a man from following his buſineſſe in the common wealth, that enioyeth the ſame. For God is he alone, who ſimply and abſolutely hath no neede of any thing at all: wherefore the chiefeſt vertue that can be in man, and that commeth neereſt vnto God, ought to be eſteemed that, which maketh man to haue neede of leaſt things. For like as a luſtie bodie, and well complexioned, hath no neede of ſuperfluous fare and curious apparell: euen ſo a cleane life, and ſound houſe, is kept with a little charge, and ſo ſhould the goods alſo be proportioned, according to vſe and neceſſitie. For hee that gathereth much, and ſpendeth litle, hath neuer enough. But admit he hath no deſire to ſpend much, then he is a foole to trauell to get more then he needeth: and if he do deſire it, and dare nor for niggardlineſſe ſpend part of that he laboureth for, then is he miſerable. Now would I aske Cato with a goodwill, if riches be made but to vſe them, why do you boaſt then you haue gotten much together, when a litle doth ſuffiſe you? and if it be a commendable thing (as in truth it is) to be contented with the bread you finde, to drinke of the ſame tappe workemen and labourers do, not to care for purple died gownes, nor for houſes with plaſtered walles: it followeth then that neither Ariſtides, nor Epaminondas, nor Manius Curius, nor Caius Fabricius, haue forgotten any part of their duties, when they cared not for getting of that which they would not vſe nor occupie. For it was to no purpoſe for a man that eſteemed rootes and parſenippes to be one of the beſt diſhes in the worlde, and that did ſeeth them himſelfe in his chimney, whileſt his wife did bake his bread, to talke ſo much of an Aſſe, and to take paines to write by what art and induſtrie a man might quickely enrich himſelfe. For it is true, that ſufficiencie and to be contented with a litle, is a good and commendable thing: but it is becauſe it taketh from vs all deſire of vnneceſſarie thinges, and maketh vs not to paſſe for them. And therefore we finde that Ariſtides ſaide, when rich Callias caſe was pleaded, that ſuch as were poore againſt their wils, might well be aſhamed of their pouertie: but ſuch as were willingly poore, had good cauſe and might iuſtly reioyce at it. For it were a mad part to thinke that Ariſtides pouertie proceeded of a baſe minde and ſlothfulnes, ſince he might quickly haue made himſelfe rich without any diſhoneſtie at all, by taking only the ſpoile of ſome one of the barbarous people whom he had ouercome, or any one of their tentes. But enough for this matter. Furthermore, touching the victorie and battels Cato had wonne, they did in manner litle helpe to increaſe the Empire of ROME: for it was already ſo great, as it could almoſt be no greater. But Ariſtides victories are the greateſt conqueſtes and nobleſt actes that the GRECIANS euer did in any warres: as the iourney of MARATHON, the battell of SALAMINA, and the battell of PLATEES. And yet there is no reaſon to compare king Antiochus with king Xerxes, nor the wals of the citie of SPAINE which Cato ouerthrew and raſed, vnto ſo many thouſandes of barbarous people, which were then ouerthrowen and put to the ſword by the GRECIANS, aſwell by land as by ſea. In all which ſeruices, Ariſtides was the chiefeſt beſides all other, as touching his valiantnes in fighting: notwithſtanding, he gaue other the glory of it, that deſired it more then himſelfe, as he did eaſily alſo leaue the gold & ſiluer vnto thoſe, that had more neede of it then himſelfe. Wherein he ſhewed himſelfe of a nobler minde, then they did. Furthermore, for my part, I will not reproue Catoes manner, to commend and extoll himſelfe ſo highly aboue all other, ſince he himſelfe ſayth in an oration he made, that praiſe himſelfe is as much folly, as alſo to diſpraiſe himſelfe: but this I thinke, his vertue is not perfect, that deſireth other ſhould not praiſe him, then he that commonly doth vſe to praiſe himſelfe. For, not to be ambitious, is a great ſhew of humanitie, & neceſſary for him that will liue amongeſt men of gouernement: and euen ſo, ambition is hatefull, and procureth great enuie vnto him, that is infected withall. Of the which Ariſtides was cleare, and Cato farre gone in it. For Ariſtides did helpe Themiſtocles his chiefeſt enemie, in all his nobleſt actes, and did ſerue him (as a man would ſay) like a priuate ſouldier that garded his perſon, when Themiſtocles was generall, being the onely inſtrument and meane of his glorie: which was indeede the onely cauſe that the citie of ATHENS was ſaued, and reſtored againe to her former good ſtate. But contrariwiſe, croſſing Scipio in all his enterpriſes, thought to hinder his voyage and iourney vnto CARTHAGE, in the which he ouercame Hannibal, who vntill that time was euer inuincible: and ſo in the ende, continuing him ſtill in iealouſie with the ſtate, and euer accuſing him, he neuer left him till he had driuen him out of the citie, and cauſed his brother Lucius Scipio to be ſhamefully condemned for theft, and ill behauiour in his charge. Furthermore, temperance and modeſtie, which Cato did euer commende ſo highly: Ariſtides truely had them moſt ſincerely. But Catoes ſecond wife, who maried a maide (that was neither fit for dignitie and calling, nor agreeable for his age) made him to be thought a lecherous man, and not without manifeſt cauſe. For he can not be excuſed with honeſtie, that being a man of mariage, brought his ſonne that was married, and his faire daughter in law, a ſteppe mother into his houſe, and but a clarkes daughter, whoſe father did write for money, for any man that would hire him. Take it Cato maried her to ſatisfie his luſt, or elſe for ſpight to be reuenged of his ſonne, becauſe his ſonne could not abide his young filth he had before: either of theſe turneth ſtill to his ſhame, as well the effect, as alſo the cauſe. Againe, the excuſe he made to his ſonne why he maried, was alſo a lye. For if he had grounded his deſire indeede, to haue gotten either children, as he ſayd, that might be as honeſt men as his eldeſt ſonne: then ſurely he had done well after the death of his firſt wife, if he had ſought him an other wife ſoone after, that had bene of an honeſt houſe, and not to haue lyen with a young harlatry filth, till his ſonne had ſpyed him and then when he ſaw it was knowen, to go and mary her, and to make alliance with him, not becauſe it was honorable for him to do it, but was eaſieſt to be obtained.

THE LIFE OF Philopœmen.

IN the citie of MANTINEA, there was a citizen in old time called Caſſander, one that was as nobly borne and of as great authoritie in gouernment there, as any man of his time whatſoeuer. Notwithſtanding, fortune frowned on him in the end, in ſo much as he was driuē out of this country, and went to lye in the city of MEGALOPOLIS, only for the loue he bare vnto Crauſis, Philopœmenes father, a rare mā, and nobly giuen in all things, and one that loued him alſo very well. Now ſo lōg as Crauſis liued, Caſſander was ſo well vſed at his hands, that he could lacke nothing: and when he was departed this world, Caſſander, to requite the loue Crauſis bare him in his life time, tooke his ſonne into his charge, being an orphane, and taught him, as Homer ſayd Achilles was brought vp by the old Phœnix. So this child Philopœmen grew to haue noble conditions, and increaſed alwayes from good to better. Afterwardes, when he came to grow to mans ſtate. Ecdemus and Demophanes, both MEGALOPOLITANS, tooke him into their gouernment. They were two Philoſophers that had bene hearers of Arceſilaus, in the ſchoole of Academia, and afterwardes employed all the Philoſophy they had learned, vpon their gouerning of the common wealth, and dealing in matters of ſtate, as much or more, then any other men of their time. For they deliuered their city from the tyranny of Ariſtodemus, who kept it in ſubiection, by corrupting thoſe that killed him. And they did helpe Aratus also to driue the tyrant Niocles, out of SICYONE, at request of the CYRENIANS, that were troubled with ciuill dissentiō & factions amōg they went vnto CYRENA, where they did reforme the state of the common wealth, and blished good lawes for them. But for themselues, they reckened the education and bri vp of Philopœmen, the chefest acte that euer they did: iudging that they had procured uersall good vnto all GREECE, to bring vp a man of so noble a nature, in the rules and prec of Philosophy. And to say truely, GREECE did loue him passingly well, as the last valia she brought foorth in her age, after so many great and famous auncient Captaines: alwayes increase his power and authoritie, as his glory did also rise. Whereupon there ROMAINE, who to prayse him the more, called him the last of the GRECIANS: me that after him, GRECE neuer brought forth any worthy person, deseruing the nam GRECIAN. And now concerning his person, he had no ill face, as many suppose he for his whole image is yet to be seene in the citie of DELPHES, excellently well done, were aliue. And for that they report of his hostesse in the citie of MEGARA, who took for a seruing man: that was by reason of his curtesie, not standing vpon his reputation because he went plainly besides. For she vnderstanding that the generall of the Ach came to Inne there all night, she bestirred her, and was very busie preparing for his her husband paraduenture being from home at that time: and in the meane season cam lopœmen into the Inne, with a poore cloke on his backe. The simple woman seeing h better apparelled, tooke him for one of his men that came before to prouide his lodging so prayed him to lend her his hand in the kitchin. He straight cast off his cloke, and to fall to hew wood. So, as Philopœmen was busie about it, in commeth her husband finding him riuing of wood: ha ha ha, sayd he, my Lord Philopœmen, why what m this? Truely nothing else, sayd he in his DORICAN toung, but that I am punished, be haue neither fayre boy, nor goodly man. It is true that Titus Quintius Flaminius sayd vnto him, seeming to mocke him for his personage: O Philopœmen, thou hast fayre and good legges, but thou hast no belly, for he was fine in the waist, and small bodied with reason, I take it this iesting tended rather to the proportion of his army, then body: because he had both good horsemen, and footemen, but he was often without to pay them. These iestes, schollers haue taken vp in schooles of Philopœmen. But descend to his nature and conditions: it seemeth that the ambition and desire he had to honour in his doings, was not without some heate and wilfulnesse. For, because he wo together follow Epaminondas steps, he shewed his hardinesse to enterprise any thing, hi dome to execute all great matters, and his integrity also, in that no money could corrupt but in ciuill matters and controuersies, he could hardly other whiles keepe himself the boundes of modestie, patience, and curtesie, but would often burst out into choll wilfulnesse. Wherefore it seemeth, that he was a better Captaine for warres, thē a wise nour for peace. And indeede, euen from his youth he euer loued souldiers, and armes lighted maruellously in all martiall exercises: as in hādling of his weapō well, riding o gallantly, and in vawting nimbly. And because he seemed to haue a naturall gift in wre certaine of his friends, and such as were carefull of him, did wish him to giue most vnto that exercise. Then he asked them, if their life that made such profession, w no hinderaunce to their martiall exercises. Aunswere was made him againe, that the tion of the person, and manner of life that wrestlers vsed, and such as followed like was altogether contrary to the life and discipline of a souldier, and specially touching limme. For wrestlers studied altogether to keepe themselues in good plight, by muc ping, eating, and drinking, by labouring, and taking their ease at certaine houres, by n ling a iotte of their exercises: and besides, were in hazard to loose the force and stre their body, if they did surfet neuer so litle, or passed their ordinary course & rule of diet. souldiers contrariwise are vsed to all chaunge, and diuersitie of life, and specially be from their youth, to away with all hardnesse, and scarsitie, and to watch in the night sleepe. Philopœmen hearing this, did not onely forsake those exercises, and scorned the afterwardes being generall of an armie, he sought by all infamous meanes he could

downe all wrestling, and such kinde of exercise, which made mens bodies vnmeete to take paines, and to become souldiers for to fight in defence of their country, that otherwise would haue bene very able and handsome for the same. When he first left his booke and schoolemasters, and began to weare armour in inuasions the MANTINEIANS vsed to make vpon the LACEDÆMONIANS, to get some spoile on a sodaine, or to destroy a part of their countrey: Philopœmen then would euer be the formost to go out, and the hindermost to come in. When he had leasure, he vsed much hunting in time of peace, all to acquaint his body with toyle and trauell, or else he would be digging of his grounds. For he had a fayre manor, not passing twenty furlongs out of the citie, whither he would walke commonly after dinner or supper: and then when night came that it was bed time, he would lye vpon some illfauored matresse, as the meanest labourer he had, and in the morning by breake of the day, he went out either with his vine men to labour in his vineyard, or else with his plough mē to follow the plough, and sometimes returned againe to the city, and followed matters of the common wealth, with his friends and other officers of the same. Whatsoeuer he could spare and get in the warres, he spent it in buying of goodly horses, in making of fayre armours, or paying his poore countreymens ransome, that were taken prisoners in the warres: but for his goods and reuenue, he sought onely to increase them, by the profit of tillage, which he esteemed the iustest and best way of getting of goods. For he did not trifle therein, but employed his whole care and study vpon it, as one that thought it fit for euery noble man & gentleman so to trauell, gouerne, and increase his owne, that he should haue no occasion to couet or vsurpe an other mans. He tooke no pleasure to heare all kinde of matters, nor to read all sortes of bookes of Philosophie: but those onely that would teach him most to become vertuous. Neither did he much care to read Homers workes, sauing those places onely that stirred vp mens harts most vnto valiantnesse. But of all other stories, he specially delighted to read Euangelus bookes, which treated of the discipline of warres, how to set battels, and declared the actes and gestes of Alexander the great, saying: that men should euer bring his wordes vnto deedes, vnlesse men would take them for vaine stories, and things spoken, but not to profit by. For in his bookes of the feates of warre, and how battels should be ordered, he was not onely contented to see them drawen and set out, in chartes and mappes: but would also put them in execution, in the places themselues as they were set out. And therefore, when the armie marched in order of battell in the field, he would consider and studie with himselfe, the sodaine euents and approches of the enemies, that might light vpon them, when they comming downe to the valley, or going out of a plaine, were to passe a riuer or a ditch, or through some straight: also when he should spread out his army, or else gather it narrow: and this he did not onely forecast by himselfe, but would also argue the same with the Captaines that were about him. For Philopœmen doubtlesse was one of the odde men of the world, that most esteemed the discipline of warre, (and sometime peraduenture more then he needed) as the most large field and most fruitefull ground that valiantnesse could be exercised in: so that he despised & cōtemned all that were no souldiers, as men good for nothing. When he was come now to thirty yeares of age, Cleomenes king of LACEDÆMON, came one night vpon the sodaine, and gaue an assault to the city of MEGALOPOLIS, so lustely, that he draue backe the watch and got into the market place, and wanne it. Philopœmen hearing of it, ranne immediatly to the rescue. Nertheless, though he fought verie valiantly, and did like a noble souldier, yet he could not repulse the enemies, nor driue them out of the citie. But by this meanes he got his citizens leasure, and some time to get them out of the towne to saue themselues, staying those that followed them: and made Cleomenes still waite vpon him, so that in the end he had much a do to saue himselfe being the last man, and very sore hurt, & his horse also slaine vnder him. Shortly after, Cleomenes being aduertised that the MEGALOPOLITANS were gottē into the city of MESSINA, sent vnto them to let them vnderstād, that he was ready to deliuer them their citie, lands, & goods again. But Philopœmen seeing his coūtreymen very glad of these newes, & that euery man prepared to returne againe in hast: he stayd them with these perswasions, shewing them that Cleomenes deuise was not to redeliuer thē their citie, but rather to take thē together with their city: foreseeing well enough, that he could not continue long there, to keepe naked walles and emptie houſes, and that himſelfe in the end ſhould be compelled to go his way. This perſwaſion ſtayed the MEGALOPOLITANS, but withall it gaue Cleomenes occaſion to burne and plucke downe a great part of the citie, and to cary away a great ſumme of money and a great ſpoyle. Afterwardes, when king Antigonus was come to aide the ACHAIANS gainſt Cleomenes, and that Cleomenes kept on the top of the mountaines of Sellaſia, and had all the paſſages, & wayes vnto them out of all thoſe quarters: king Antigonus ſet his armie battell hard by him, determining to ſet vpon him, and to driue him thence if he could poſſibly. Philopœmen was at that time amongeſt the horſemē with his citizens, who had the ILLYRIANS on the ſide of them, being a great number of footemen & excellent good ſouldiers, which did ſhut in the taile of all the army. So they were commaunded to ſtand ſtill, and to keepe their place, vntill ſuch time as they did ſhew them a redde coate of armes on the top of a pyke from the other wing of the battell, where the king himſelfe ſtood in perſon. Notwithſtanding this ſtraight cōmaundement, the Captaines of the ILLYRIANS would abide no longer, but went to ſee if they could force the LACEDÆMONIANS that kept on the top of the mountaines. The ACHAIANS contrariwiſe, kept their place and order, as they were commaunded. Euclidas, Cleomenes brother, perceiuing thus their enemies footemen were ſeuered from their horſemen, ſodainly ſent the lighteſt armed ſouldiers & luſtieſt fellowes he had in his bands, to giue a charge vpon the ILLYRIANS behind, to proue if they could make them turne their faces on them, becauſe they had no horſemen for their garde. This was done, and theſe light armed men did maruellouſly trouble and diſorder the ILLYRIANS. Philopœmen perceiuing that, and conſidering how theſe light armed men would be eaſily broken and driuen backe, ſince occaſion ſelfe inforced them to it: he went to tell the kings Captaines of it, that lett men of armes. But when he ſaw he could not make them vnderſtand it, and that they made no reckening of his reaſons, but tooke him of no skill, becauſe he had not yet attained any credit or eſtimation to be iudged a man, that could inuent or execute any ſtratageme of warre: he went thither himſelfe, and tooke his citizens with him. And at his firſt comming, he ſo troubled theſe light armed men, that he made them flie, and ſlue a number of them. Moreouer, to encourage the better king Antigonus men, and to make them giue a luſty charge vpon their enemies, whileſt they were thus troubled and out of order: he left his horſe, and marched foote vp hill and downe hill, in rough and ſtony wayes, full of ſprings and quauemyres, being heauily armed at all peeces as a man at armes, and fighting in this ſort very painfully and vneaſily; he had both his thighes paſt through with a dart, hauing a leather thong on the middeſt of it. And though the blow did not take much hold of the fleſh, yet was it a ſtrong blow, for it pearced both thighs through & through, that the iron was ſeene on the other ſide. Then was he ſo combered with this blow, as if he had bene ſhackled with irons on his feet, and knew not what to do: for the leather faſtened in the middeſt of the dart, did greeue him maruellouſly, when they thought to haue pulled the dart out of the place where it entred in, ſo as neuer a man about him durſt ſet his hands to it. Philopœmen on the other ſide, ſeeing the fight terrible on either ſide, and would ſoone be ended: it ſpited him to the guttes, he would ſo fayne haue bene among them. So at the length he made ſuch ſtruggling, putting backe one thigh, and ſetting forward an other, that he knapped the ſtaffe of the dart a ſunder, and made them pull out the two troncheons, the one on this ſide, and the other on the other ſide. Then when he ſaw he was at libertie againe, he tooke his ſword in his hand, and ranne through the middeſt of them that fought, vnto the foremoſt ranckes, to meete with the enemy: ſo that he gaue his men a new courage, and did ſet them on fire with enuie, to follow his valiantneſſe. After the battell was wonne, Antigonus asked the MACEDONIAN Captaines, to proue them, who moued the horſemen to deuide themſelues, and giue the charge, before the ſigne that was commannded. They aunſwered him, that they were forced to do it againſt their will, becauſe a young MEGALOPOLITAN gentlemā gaue a charge with his company, before the ſigne was giuen. Then Antigonus laughing, told them: the young gentleman played the part of a wiſe and valiant Captaine. This exploit, together with Antigonus teſtimony, gaue great reputatiō vnto Philopœmen, as we may eaſily imagine. So king Antigonus maruellouſly intreated him he would ſerue with him, and offered him a bande of men at armes, and great entertainemēt.

tainement, if he would go with him. But Philopœmen refused his offer, and chiefly, because he knew his owne nature, that he could hardly abide to be commaunded by any. Notwithstanding, because he could not be idle, he tooke sea, and went into CRETA, where he knew there were warres, onely to continue himselfe in exercise thereof. So when he had serued a long time with the CRETANS, which were valiant souldiers, and very expert in all policies and fates of warre, and moreouer were men of a moderate and spare dyet: he returned home againe to ACHAIA, with so great credit and reputation of euery one, that he was presently chosen generall of all the horsemen. So when he entred into his charge, he founde many horsemen very ill horsed, vpon litle iades, such as might be gotten cheapest, and how they sed not to go themselues in person to the warres, but did send other in their stead: and to be hort, how they neither had harts, nor experience of the warres, and all because the Generals nd Captaines of the people of the ACHAIANS that serued before him, did take no heede to hose matters, as fearing to offend any, because they had the greatest authority in their hands, o punish or reward whom they thought good. Philopœmen fearing none of all these things, would leaue no part of his charge and duety vndone, but went himselfe in person to all the cities, to perswade and encourage the young gentlemen, to be well horsed, & well armed, that hey might winne honour in the field, be able to defend themselues, and ouerthrow their enemies. And where perswasion could do no good, there he would set fynes vpon their heades hat so refused, and did vse to muster them oft, and did acquaint them with tilting, turning, and arriets, and one to fight with an other, and at such times and places specially, as he knew there would be multitudes of people to giue them the looking on: that in short space he made them ery forward, proper, and ready horsemen, whose chiefest propertie is, to keepe their order nd rankes in the battell. So as when necessitie serued for the whole company of horsemen o turne together, halfe turne, or whole turne, or else euery man by himselfe: they were so throughly trained in it, that all the whole troupe set in battell ray, did seeme as it were to be ut one body, they remoued so together, and withall so easily, and at all times, and so oft, as time they would on the one side, or on the other. Now in a great battell the ACHAIANS had with the ÆTOLIANS and the ELIANS, by the riuer of Larissus: Demophantus generall of the horsemen of the ÆTOLIANS, came from his company to fight with Philopœmen, who also made towardes him, and gaue him first such a blow with his speare, that he strake him starke ead. When Demophantus fell to the ground, his souldiers fled by and by vpon it. This wanne Philopœmen great honour, who gaue no place to the youngest men in fighting most valiantly with his owne hands: nor to the oldest men in wisedome, for the wise leading of his army. In eed the first man that made the people of ACHAIA grow in power and greatnes, was Aratus: or before his time ACHAIA was of small reckning, because the cities of the same stood deuided betweene themselues, and Aratus was the first man that made them ioyne together, & stablished among them an honest ciuill gouernement. Whereby it happened, that as we see in rookes and riuers where any litle thing stoppeth and falleth to the bottom, which the course of the water bringeth downe the streame, there the rest that followeth doth vse to stay, and go o further: euen so in the citie of CREECE that were in hard state, and sore weakened, by faction one against an other, the ACHAIANS were the first that stayd themselues, and grew in amitie one with the other, and afterwardes drew on the rest of the cities into league with them, s good neighbours & confederates. Some by helping and deliuering them from the oppression of tyrants, and winning other also by their peaceable gouernement and good concorde: hey had a meaning in this wise, to bring all the country of PELOPONNESVS into one body nd league. Neuertheless, while Aratus liued, they depended most vpon the strength & power of the MACEDONIANS: first with sticking vnto king Ptolomie, and then vnto Antigonus, nd last to Philip, who ruled in manner all the state of GREECE. But when Philopœmen came to ouerne, & to be the chiefest man, the ACHAIANS being strõg enough to resist the strongest, ould match thẽ no more vnder any other bodies ensigne, nor would suffer any more straũge ouernours or Captaines ouer them. For Aratus (as it seemed) was somwhat too soft and cold or the warres, and therefore the most things he did, were by gentle intreaties, by intelligences, & by the kings friendships with whom he was great, as we haue at large declared in his life. But Philopœmen being a man of execution, hardy and valiant of perſon, and of good fortune, in the firſt battell that he euer made, did maruellouſly encreaſe the courage and hartes of the ACHAIANS: becauſe vnder his charge they euer foyled their enemies, alwayes had the vpper hand ouer them. The firſt thing Philopœmen began withall at his comming, he chaunged the manner of ſetting of their tables, and their faſhion of armour themſelues. For before they caried litle light targettes, which becauſe they were thin and narrow, did not couer halfe their bodies, and vſed ſpeares farre ſhorter then pykes, by reaſon whereof they were very light, and good to skirmiſh and fight a farre off: but when they came to ioyne battell, their enemies then had great vantage of them. As for the order of their battelles, they knew not what it ment, nor to caſt themſelues into a ſquadring, but onely vſed the ſquare battell, nor yet gaue it any ſuch fronte where the pykes of many rankes might puſh together, and where the ſouldiers might ſtand ſo cloſe, that their targettes ſhould touch one an other, as they do in the ſquardron of the battell of the MACEDONIANS: by reaſon whereof, they were ſoone broken, and ouerthrowen. Philopœmen reformed all this, perſwading them to vſe the pyke and ſhield, in ſtead of their litle targets, ſpeares or boreſtaffe, and to put good mortians or burganettes on their heads, corſellettes on their bodies, and good taſſes and greaues to couer their thighes and legges, that they might beare it out manfully, not giuing a foote of ground, as light armed men that runne to and fro in skirmiſhe. And thus hauing perſwaded and taught the young men to arme themſelues throughly, firſt he made them the bolder and more couragious to fight, as if they had been men that could not haue bene ouercome: then he turned all their vaine ſuperfluous charges into neceſſarie and honeſt expences. But he could not poſsibly bring them altogether from their vaine and riche apparell, they had of long time taken vp, the one to exceede another, nor from their ſumptuous furniture of houſes, as in beddes, hangings, curious ſeruice of table, and delicate kinde of diſhes. But to begin to withdraw this deſire in them whereas they had, to be fine and delicate, in all ſuperfluous and vnneceſſarie things, and to loue good things neceſſarie, and profitable: he wiſhed them to looke more nearely to their owne charge about themſelues, taking order as well for their apparell, as alſo for their diet, how to ſpare in them, to come honorably armed to the field, for defence of their countrey. Thereupon, if you had looked into the goldſmithes ſhoppes, ye ſhould haue ſeene nothing elſe in their handes, but breaking and battering of pottes of gold and ſiluer, to be caſt and molten downe againe, and then gilding of armours and targettes, and ſiluering of harneſſe. In the ſhew places for the running of horſes, there was mannaging and breaking of young horſes, and young men exerciſing armes. Womens handes alſo were full of morions and head peeces, whereto they tyed goodly braue plumes of feathers of ſundry colours. They were alſo full of imbrodered arming coates and caſſockes, with curious and very rich workes. The ſight of which brauerie did heaue vp their hartes, and made them gallant and luſty, ſo as enuie bred ſtraight in them who ſhould do beſt ſeruice, and no way ſpare for warres. Indeede, ſumptuouſneſſe and brauerie in other ſightes, doth ſecretly carry mens mindes away, and allure them to ſeeke after vanities, which makes them tender bodied and womaniſh perſons: becauſe this ſweete tickling, and intuſing of the outward ſence that is delighted therewith, doth ſtraight melt and ſoften the ſtrength and courage of the mind. But againe, the ſumptuous coſt beſtowed vpon warlike furniture, doth incourage and make great a noble hart. Euen as Homer ſayth it did Achilles, when his mother brought him armour and weapons, ſhe had cauſed Vulcan to make for him, and layed them at his feete, who ſeeing them, could not tarie, but was ſtraight ſet on fire with deſire to occupie them. So when Philopœmen had brought the youth of ACHAIA to this good paſſe, to come braſely armed and furniſhed into the field, he began then to exerciſe them continually in armes: wherein they did not onely ſhewe themſelues obedient to him, but did moreouer ſtriue one to excell an other, and to do better then their fellowes. For they liked maruellous well the ordering of the battell he had taught them, becauſe that ſtanding ſo cloſe together as they did, they thought ſurely they could hardly be ouerthrowen. Thus by continuance of time, being much vſed to weare their armour, they found them a great deale eaſier ghter then before, besides the pleasure they tooke to see their armor so braue, and so riche: in much as they longed for some occasion to trie them straight vpon their enemies. Now the CHAIANS at that time were at warres with Machanidas, the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, who ght he by all deuise he could with a great armie, to become chiefe Lorde of all the PELO-ONNESIANS. When newes was brought that Machanidas was come into the countrie of MANTINIANS, Philopœmen straight marched towards him with his armie: so they met with not farre from the citie of MANTINEA, where by and by they put themselues in order of battell. They both had entertained in pay a great number of straungers to serue them, besides the whole force of their countrie; and when they came to ioyne battell, Machanidas with his straungers gaue such a lusty charge vpon certaine slingers and archers being the forlorne hope whom Philopœmen had cast off before the battell of the ACHAIANS to begin the skirmish, that ouerthrew them, and made them flie withall. But where he should haue gone on directly inst the ACHAIANS that were ranged in battell ray, to haue proued if he could haue broke em: he was very busie, and earnest still to follow the chase of them that first fled, & so came rd by the ACHAIANS that stood still in their battel, and kept their rancks. This great ouer-row fortuning at the beginning, many men thought the ACHAIANS were but cast away. Philopœmen made as though it had bin nothing, and that he set light by it, and spying the eat fault his enemies made, following the forlorne hope on the spur, whom they had ouer-rowne, and straying so far from the battell of their footmen, whom they had left naked, and e field open vpon them: he did not make towards them to stay them, nor did striue to stop em that they should not follow those that fled, but suffered them to take their course. And hen he saw that they were gone a good way from their footmen, he made his men marche on the LACEDÆMONIANS, whose sides were naked, hauing no horsemen to garde them: d so did set vpon them on the one side, & ran so hastily on them to win one of their flancks, e he made them flie, and slue withall a great number of them. For it is said, there were foure ound and LACEDÆMONIANS slaine in the field, because they had no man to leade them. And reouer, they say they did not looke to fight, but supposed rather they had wonne the field, hen they saw Machanidas chasing still those vpon the spur, whom he had ouerthrowne. Af-this Philopœmen retired to meete Machanidas, who came backe from the chase with his angers. But by chance there was a great broad ditch betweene them, so as both of them rode on the bancks sides of the same, a great while together, one against another of them: the e side seeking some conuenient place to get ouer and flie, and the other side seeking meanes keepe them from starting away. So, to see the one before the other in this sort, it appeared as y had bin wilde beasts brought to an extreamitie, to defend themselues by force, from so ce a hunter as Philopœmen was. But whilest they were striuing thus, the tyrants horse that s lusty and couragious, and felt the force of his masters spurres pricking in his sides, that the ood followed after, did venter to leape the ditche, comming to the bancks side, stood vpon hindmost legs, and aduaunced forward with his foremost feete, to reach to the other side. en Simmias and Polyænus, who were about Philopœmen when he fought, ranne thither aight to keepe him in with their boresta[illegible] that he should not leape the ditch. But Philopœ- who was there before them, perceiuing that the tyrants horse by lifting vs his head so h, did couer all his maisters body: forsooke by and by his horse, and tooke his speare in h his hands, and thrust at the tyrant with so good a will, that he slue him in the ditche. In mory whereof, the ACHAIANS that did highly esteeme this valiant act of his, and his wis-me also in leading of the battell: did set vp his image in brasse, in the temple of Apollo in LPHES, in the forme he slue the tyrant. They say, that at the assembly of the cõmon games led Nemea, (which they solemnize in honor of Hercules, not fat from the citie of ARGOS) d not long after he had wonne this battell of MANTINEA, being made Generall the second e of the tribe of the ACHAIANS, and being at good leisure also by reason of the feast: he shewed all the GRECIANS that were come thither to see the games and pastimes, his ar-e ranging in order of battell, and made them see how easily they remoued their places euery y, as necessitie and occasion of fight required, without troubling or confounding their ckes, and that with a maruelous force and redinesse. When he had done this, he went into the Theater to heare the musitians play, and sing to their instruments, who should win the game, being accompanied with lusty young gentlemen apparrelled in purple cloakes, skarlet coates & cassockes they ware vpon their armor, being all in the flower of their and well giuen and disposed: who did greatly honor and reuerence their captaine, and that, shewed themselues inwardly of noble hearts, being incouraged by many notable they had fought, in which they had euer attained the victorie, and gotten the vpper their enemies. And by chance, as they were entred into the Theater, Pylades the musi ing certaine poems of Timotheus, called the Perses, fell into these verses.

O Greekes, it is euen he, which your prosperitie Hath giuen to you: and therewithall a noble liberty.

When he had sweetly song out aloude these noble verses, passingly well made: the assembly of the GRECIANS in the Theater, that were gathered thither to see the game all their eyes straight vpon Philopœmen, and clapped their hands one to an other for ioy cause of the great hope they had in him, that through him they should soone recouer auncient reputation, and so imagined they possessed already the noble and worthy mi their aunce sters. And as young horse that do alwaies looke to be ridden by their o riders, if any stranger get vp on their backes, do straight waxe strange to be handeled make great a do: euen so, when the ACHAIANS came to any dangerous battell, their were euen done, if they had any other Generall or leader then Philopœmen, on whom sti depended and looked. And when they saw him euer, the whole armie reioyced, and straight to be at it, they had such confidence in his valiantnesse and good fortune: and not without cause. For of all men, their enemies did feare him most, and durst not stand him: because they were afraide to heare his name onely, as it seemed by their doings. Philip king of MACEDON, imagining that if he could finde meanes to dispatche Philo out of the way, howsoeuer it were, the ACHAIANS would straight take part againe with sent men secretly into the city of ARGOS, to kill him by treason. Howbeit the practise w couered, and the king euer after was mortally hated of all the GRECIANS generally, ken for a cowardly and wicked Prince. It fortuned one day when the BOEOTIANS laid to the city of MEGARA, and thought certainly to haue wonne it at the first assault: the a rumor sodainly amongst them, that Philopœmen came to aide the city, and was not from it with his armie. But it was a false report. Notwithstanding, the BOEOTIANS w scared, that for feare they left their scaling ladders behinde them, which they had set a the wals to haue scaled the towne, and fled straight to saue themselues. An other time, Nabis tyrant of Lacedemon, wanne the city of Messina.

Nabis the tyrant of LACEDÆMON, that succeeded Machanidas, had taken the city of M NA vpon the sodaine: Philopœmen being then a priuate man, and hauing no charge o diers, went vnto Lysippus, general of the ACHAIANS that yere, to perswade him that he send present aide vnto them of MESSINA. Lysippus told him, it was too late now to go t and that it was but a lost towne, not to be holpen: considering the enemies were in it alr Philopœmen perceiuing he could not procure him to go, went thither himselfe with the of MESSINA only, not staying for the assembly of the MEGALOPOLITANS, that w counsel about it, to giue him cõmission by voices of the people to take thẽ with him: bu all willingly followed him, as if he had bene their continuall Generall, and the man t nature was worthiest of all other to commaund them. Now when he came neere vnto M SINA, Nabis hearing of his comming, durst not tary him, though he had his army w the citie, but stole out at an other gate, and marched away in all the hast he could, thi himselfe a happy man and he could so escape his hands, and retire with safety, as indeed h And thus was MESSINA, by his meanes, deliuered from captiuitie. All that we haue w hitherto concerning Philopœmen, falleth out doutlesse to his great honor and glory: but wards he was greatly dispraised for a iorney he made into CRETA, at the request of the G TYNIANS, who sent to pray him to be their Captaine, being sore troubled with wars time. Because Philopœmen went then to serue the GORTYNIANS, when the tyrant Nab greatest wars with the MEGALOPOLITANS, in their own country: they laid it to his c either that he did it to flie the warres, or else that he sought honor out of season with sions, when his poore citizens the MEGALOPOLITANS were in such distresse, that their country being lost & destroyed, they were driuen to keep them within their city, and to sow all their voide groundes and streetes in the same with corne, to sustaine them withall, when their enemies were encamped almost hard at their towne gates. And the rather, because himself making warres with the CRETANS, and seruing strangers beyonde the sea in the meane time, gaue his enemies occasion to slaunder him that he fled, that he would not stay to fight for defence of his countrie. Againe, there were that said, because the ACHAIANS did choose other for their Generall, that he being a priuate man and without charge, was the rather contented to be Generall of the GORTYNIANS, who had maruellously intreated him to take the charge: for he was a man that could not abide to liue idlely, and that desired specially about things to serue continually in the warres, and to put in practise his skil and discipline in the ordering of an armie. The wordes he spake one day of king Ptolomie do witnesse as much. For when there were some that praised king Ptolomie highly, saying that he trained his army well, and that he still continued his person in exercise of armes: It is not commendable for a king (said he) of his yeares, to delight in training his men to exercise armes, but to do some act himself in person. Well, in the ende, the MEGALOPOLITANS tooke his absence in such ill part, that they thought it a peece of treason, and would needs haue banished him, and put him from the freedome of the citie: had not the ACHAIANS sent their Generall Aristenetus to them, who would not suffer the sentence of banishment to passe against him, although otherwise there was euer contention betweene them about matters of the common-wealth. Afterwards, Philopœmen perceiuing his countrimen made no more account of him, to fright them withall, he made diuerse small villages and cities rebell against them, and taught them to say, & to giue it out, that they were not their subiects, neither paide them tribute from the beginning: and he made them stand to it openly, and maintaine their sedition against the citie of MEGALOPOLIS, before the counsell of the ACHAIANS. These things happned shortly after. But whilest he made wars in CRETA for the GORTYNIANS, he shewed not himself a PELOPONNESIAN, nor like a man borne in ARCADIA, to make plaine & open wars: but he had learned the maner of the CRETANS, to vse their owne policies, fine deuises, and ambushes against themselues. And made them know also, that all their crafts, were but childish sports as touching in respect of those that were deuised, and put in execution, by a wise experienced captaine, and skilfull to fight a battell. So Philopœmen, hauing won great fame by his acts done in CRETA, returned againe to PELOPONNESVS, where he found that Philip king of MACEDON had ouercome in battell, by T. Q. Flaminius: and that the ACHAIANS ioyning with the ROMAINES, did make war against the tyrant Nabis, against whom he was made generall immediatly vpon his returne, and gaue him battell by sea. In the which it seemed he fell into like misfortune, as Epaminondas did: the euent of this battell falling out much worse with him, then he looked for, in respect of his former courage and valiantnesse. But as for Epaminondas, some say he returned willingly out of ASIA, & the Iles, without any exploit done, because he would not haue his countrimen fleshed with spoile by sea, as fearing least of valiant soldiers by land, they would by litle & litle (as Plato said) become dissolute mariners by sea. But Philopœmen contrariwise, presuming on the skill he had to set the battel in good order by land, would needs take vpon him to do the same by sea. But he was taught to his cost to know what exercise & experience, & how strong it maketh them that are practised in things. For he lost not only the battell by sea, being vnskilful of that seruice: but he comitted besides a fouler error. For he caused an old ship to be rigged, which had bin very good of seruice before, but not occupied in a long time together, and imbarked his countrimen into the same, which were all likely to perish, because the ship had diuers leakes, by fault of good calking. This ouerthrow made his enemies despise him vtterly, perswading themselues he was fled for altogether, & had forsaken them for fear: whereupon they laid siege to the citie of GYTHIVM. Philopœmen being aduertised thereof imbarked his men sodainly, and set vpon his enemies ere they wist it, or had any thought of his comming: and found them straglingly vp and downe, without watch or garde, by reason of the victorie they had lately wonne. So he landed his men closely by night, and went and set vpon his enemies campe, and burnt it euery whit: and in this feare and hurly burly, stile

a great number of them. Shortely after this stealing vpon them, the tyrant Nabis also stole vpon him againe vnwares, as he was to go through a maruellous ill & dangerous way. Which made the ACHAIANS amazed at the first, thinking it vnpossible for them that they could escape that danger, considering their enemies kept all the wayes thereabouts. But Philopœmen bethinking himselfe, and considering the nature & scituation of the place: after he had viewed it well, he shewed them plainly then, that the chiefest point of a good souldier, and man of war was to know how to put an armie in battell, according to the time and scituation of the place. For he did but alter the forme of his battell a litle, and sorted it according to the scituation of the place, wherein he was compassed: and by doing this without trouble or businesse, he tooke away all feare of danger, and gaue a charge vpon his enemies in such fierce wise, that in a short time he put thē all to flight. And when he perceiued that they did not flie all in troupe together towards the city, but scattering wise, abroade in the fields in euery place: he caused the trumpet to sound the retreate. Then he commaunded the chase to be followed no further, for that all the countrie thereabout was full of thick woods and groues, very ill for horsemen, and also because there were many brookes, vallies, and quauemires, which they should passe ouer, he encamped himselfe presently, being yet broade day. And so, fearing least his enemies would in the night time draw vnto the city, one after another, and by couples: he sent a great number of ACHAIANS, and laid them in ambush amongst the brookes and hils neere about: which made great slaughter of Nabis souldiers, because they came not altogether in troupe, but scatteringly one after an other as they fled, one here, an other there, and so fell into their enemies hands, as birds into the fowlers net. These acts made Philopœmen singularly beloued of the GRECIANS, and they did him great honour in all their Theaters and common assemblies. Whereas Titus Quintius Flaminius, of nature very ambitious, and couetous of honour, did much repine, and was enuious at the matter, thinking that a Consul of ROME should haue place and honor amongst the ACHAIANS, before a meane gentleman of ARCADIA. And imagined he had deserued better of all GREECE, then Philopœmen had: considering, how by only proclamation of an herald, he had restored GREECE againe to her ancient liberty, which before his comming was subiect vnto king Philip, & vnto the MACEDONIANS. After which Titus Quintius made peace with the tyrant Nabis. Nabis was shortly after very traitorously slaine by the ÆTOLIANS. Whereupon the city of SPARTA grew to a tumult, & Philopœmen straight taking the occasion, went thither with his armie, & handled the matter so wisely, partly for loue, and partly by force, he wan the city, and ioyned it vnto the tribe of the ACHAIANS. So was he maruellously commended and esteemed of the ACHAIANS for this notable victory, to haue wonne their tribe and communalty so famous a city, and of so great estimation. For the city of SPARTA was no small encrease of their power, and being ioyned as a member of ACHAIA. Moreouer he wan by this meanes, the loue & good will of all the bodie of LACEDÆMON, of the hope they had to finde him a protector and defender of their liberty. Wherefore, when the tyrant Nabis house and goods were sold, as forfited to the state: they resolued in their counsell to make him a present of the money thereof, which amounted to the sum of fiue score talents, and sent Ambassadors purposely vnto him, to offer it him. Then Philopœmen shewed himself plainly to be no counterfeit honest man, but a good man indeed. For first of all, there was not one of all the LACEDÆMONIANS that durst presume to offer him the money, but euery man was afraide to tell him of it: & euery body that was appointed to do it made some excuse or other for themselues. Notwithstading, in the end they made one Timolaus to take the matter vpon him, who was his familiar friend, and also his hoast. And the same Timolaus, when he came vnto MEGALOPOLIS, & was lodged and entertained in Philopœmens house, did so much reuerence him for his wise talke & conuersation, for his modest diet, & iust dealing with all men: that he saw there was no likely possibility to corrupt him with money, so as he durst not once open his mouth to speake to him of the present he had brought him, but found some other occasion to excuse the cause of his cōming vnto him. And being sent vnto him again the second time, he did euē as much as at the first time. And making a third proose, he ventured at the last to open the matter vnto him, and told him the good will the city of SPARTA did beare him. Philopœmen became a glad man to heare it: and when he had heard all he had to say to him, he went himselfe vnto the citie of SPARTA. There he declared vnto the counsell, that it was not honest men, and their good friends, they should seeke to win and corrupt with money, considering they might command their vertue vpon any occasion, without cost vnto them: but that they should seeke to bribe naughty men with money, and such as by seditious orations in counsell did mutine, and put a whole citie in vprore: to the end that hauing their mouthes stopped with gifts, they should trouble them the lesse in the commonwealth. For, said he, it is more necessarie to stop your enemies mouthes, and to sowe vp their lips from libertie of speaking: then it is to keepe your friends from it. So noble a man was Philopœmen against all couetousnesse of money. Shortly after, the LACEDÆMONIANS beginning to stir againe, Diophanes (who was then Generall of the ACHAIANS) being aduertised of it, began to prepare to punish them. The LACEDÆMONIANS on the other side preparing for the warres, did set all the country of PELOPONNESVS in armes. Hereupon Philopœmen sought to pacifie Diophanes anger, declaring vnto him, that king Antiochus, and the ROMAINES, being at warres together at that present time, and they both hauing puisant armies one against an other in the middest of GREECE: it was meete for a good Generall & wise gouernor, to haue an eye to their doings, to be carefull of the same, and to beware that he did not trouble or alter any thing within his countrie at that instant, but then rather to dissemble it, & not to seeme to heare any fault whatsoeuer they did. Diophanes would not be perswaded, but entred the territories of LACEDÆMON with a great army, and Titus Quintius Flaminius with him: and they together marched directly towards the city of SPARTA. Philopœmen was so mad with their doings, that he tooke vpon him an enterprise not very lawfull, nor altogether iust: neuertheless, his attempt proceeded of a noble minde, & great courage. For he got into the citie of SPARTA, and being but a priuate person, kept out the Generall of the ACHAIANS, and the Consull of the ROMAINS for entring the citie: & when he had pacified all troubles and seditions in the same, he deliuered it vp again as it was before, into the hands of the cõmunalty of the ACHAIANS. Neuertheless, himselfe being afterwards generall of the ACHAIANS, did compell the LACEDÆMONIANS to receiue those home againe whom they had banished for certaine faults, and did put foure score naturall borne citizens of SPARTA vnto death, as Polybius writeth. Or three hundred & fifty, as Aristocrates an other historiographer reciteth. Then he pulled downe the wals of the city, and rased them to the ground, and tooke away the most part of their territories, and gaue them to the MEGALOPOLITANS. All those whome the tyrants had made free denizens of SPARTA, he compelled them to depart the country of LACEDÆMON, and forced them to dwell in ACHAIA, three thousand only excepted, who would not obey his commandement: all those he solde for slaues, & with the money he made of them (to spight them the more) he built a goodly faire walke within the citie of MEGALOPOLIS. Yet furthermore, to do the LACEDÆMONIANS all the mischiefe he could, and as it were, to treade them vnder the feete in their most grieuous misery: he did a most cruell and vniust act toward them. For he compelled them to leaue the discipline and maner of education of their children, which Lycurgus had of olde time instituted: and made them to follow the maner the ACHAIANS vsed, in liew of their old grounded country custome, because he saw they would neuer be humble minded, so long as they kept Lycurgus order and institution. Thus were they driuen to put the heads in the choller, by the miserable mishap that befell them: and in all despight, to suffer Philopœmen in this maner to cut a sunder (as it were) the sinews of their commonwealth. But afterwards they made sute to the ROMAINES, that they might be suffered to enioy their ancient discipline againe, which being graunted them, they straight left the maner of the ACHAIANS, and did set vp againe as much as was possible (after so great miserie & corruption of their maners) their old ancient customes and orders of their countrie. Now about the time the wars began in GREECE, betwene the ROMAINES & king Antiochus, Philopœmen was then a priuate man, & without any authority. He seeing that king Antiochus lay still in the citie of CHALCIS, and did nothing but feast and loue, and had maried a young maide farre vnmeete for his years: & perceiuing that his SYRIAN soldiers wandred vp & downe the townes in great disorder, playing many lewde parts without guide of Captaines, he was very sory he was not at that time Generall of the ACHAIANS, and tolde the ROMAINES, that he enuied their victorie, hauing warres with enemies that were so easily to be ouercome. For (said he) if fortune fauored me that I were Generall of the ACHAIANS at this present, I would haue killed them euery man in the cellers and tippling houses. Now when the ROMAINES had ouercome Antiochus, they began to haue surer footing in GRECE: and to compasse in the ACHAIANS of all sides, and specially, by reason the heads and gouernours of the cities about them did yeeld to the ROMAINES, to winne their fauour. And now their greatnesse grew in haste, by the fauour of the gods, so as they were become the monarche of the whole world: who brought them now to the ende that fortune had determined. Philopœmen in the meane time did like a good pylot, bare hard against the billowes and roughnesse of their waues: and though for the time he was forced to giue place, and to let things passe, yet for all that he was against the ROMAINES and did withstand them in the most part of their proceedings, by seeking euer to defend the liberty of those, who by their eloquence and well doing caried great authority among the ACHAIANS. And when Aristænetus MEGALOPOLITAN, (a man of great authoritie among the ACHAIANS, and one that euer bare great deuotion to the ROMAINES (said in open Senate among the ACHAIANS, that they should deny the ROMAINES nothing, nor shew themselues vnthankfull to them: Philopœmen hearing what he said, held his peace a while, and suffered him to speake (though it boiled in his heart, he was so angrie with him) and in the end, breaking all pacience, & as one ouercome with choller, he said. O Aristænetus, why haue you such hast to see the vnfortunate ende of GRECE? An other time, when Manius Consull of ROME (after he had conquered king Antiochus) did make request to the counsell of the ACHAIANS, that such as were banished from LACEDÆMON, might returne home into their countrie againe, and that Titus Quintius Flaminius also did earnestly intreate them: Philopœmen was against it, not for any hatred he bare vnto the banished mẽ, but because he would haue done it by his owne meane, and the onely grace of the ACHAIANS, to the end they should not be beholding for so good a turne, neither vnto Titus, nor yet to the ROMAINES. Afterwards he himselfe, being Generall of the ACHAIANS, did restore them whole to their owne again. Thus was Philopœmen somtime, a litle too bolde & quarrellous, by reason of his great stomack: and specially when any man of authority sought for to haue things, &c.

lie, being three score and ten yeares of age, he was the eight time chosen Generall of the ACHAIANS, and hoped well, not onely to passe the yeare of his charge in peace and quietnesse, but also all the rest of his life without any sturre of new warres, he saw the affaires of GRECE take so good successe. For like as the force and strength of sickneſse declineth, as the natural strength of the sickly body empaireth: so through all the cities and people of GRECE enuy, quarrell and wars surceased, as their power diminished. Neuertheless, in the end of his yeare of gouernment, the gods diuine (who iustly punish all insolent words and deeds) threw him to the ground, as they suffer a rider vnfortunately to take a fall off his horse, being come almost to the ende of his carriere. For they write, that he being in a place on a time amongst good companie, where one was maruellously praised for a good Captaine, said vnto them: what maisters, can yee commend him that was contented to be taken prisoner aliue of his enemies? Shortly after came newes that Dinocrates MESSINIAN (a priuate enemie of Philopœmen for certaine controuersies past betweene them, and a man generally hated besides of all honorable and vertuous men, for his licentious wicked life) had withdrawne the city of MESSENE from the deuotion of the ACHAIANS: and moreouer, that he came with an armie to the towne called COLONIDE. Philopœmen was at that time in the citie of ARGOS, sick of an ague, and yet hearing these newes, tooke his iorney towards MEGALOPOLIS, making all the speed he could possible, for that he came aboue foure hundred furlongs that day. Straight he departed thence toward MESSINA, and taried not, but tooke with him a company of men at armes of the lustiest and wealthiest MEGALOPOLITANS: who were all young noble men of the city, and willingly offered themselues to go with him for the goodwill they bare him, and the desire they had to follow his valiantnesse. Thus went they on their way towards the citie of MESSINA, & marched so long, that they came neere to the hil of Euander, where they met with Dinocrates and his company, & gaue so fierce an onset on them, that they made them turne taile: howbeit in the meane while, there came a relieſe of 500 men to Dinocrates which he had left to keepe the countrey of MESSINA. The flying men that were scattered here and there, seeing this supply, gathered them selues againe together, and shewed vpon the hils. Philopœmen fearing to be enuironed, and being desirous to bring his men safe home againe, who most of loue had followed him: began to march away through narrow bushy places, him selfe being in the rereward, and turned oftentimes vpon his enemies, and skirmished with them, onely to driue them away from following of the rest of his company, and not a man that durst once set vpon him: for they did but cry out aloofe, and wheele as it were about him. Howbeit Philopœmen sundry times venturing far from his company, to giue these young noble men leysure to saue them selues one after an other: tooke no heede to him selfe that he was alone, enuironed on euery side with a great number of enemies. Notwithstading, of all his enemies there was not a man that durst come to hand strokes with him, but stil slinging and shooting at him a farre off, they drane him in the end amongst stony places betweene two rockes, where he had much a doe to guide his horse, although hee had spurred him that he was all of a gore bloud. And as for his age, that did not lette him but he might haue saued him selfe, for he was strong and lusty by the continuall exercise he tooke: but by cursed happe his body being weake with sickenes, and weary with the long iorney he had made that day, he found him selfe very heauy and ill disposed, that his horse stumbling with him, threw him to the ground. His fall was very great, and bruised all his head, that he lay for dead in the place a great while, and neuer sturred nor spake: so that his enemies thinking hee had beene dead, came to turne his body to strippe him. But when they saw him lift vp his head and open his eyes, then many of them fell all at once vppon him, and tooke him, and bound both his hands behinde him, and did all the villany and mischiefe they could vnto him, and such, as one would litle haue thought Dinocrates would haue vsed in that sort, or that hee could haue had such an ill thought towardes him. So, they that taried behinde in the city of MESSINA, were marvellous glad when they heard these newes, and ranne all to the gates of the city to see him brought in. When they saw him thus shamefully bound, and pinnioned, against the dignity of so many honours as he had receiued, and of so many triumphes and victories as he had past: the most part of them wept for pity, to consider the misshappe and ill fortune of mans nature, where there is so litle certainety, as in manner it is nothing. Then beganne there some pitteous speach to runne in the mouths of the people by litle and litle, that they should remember the great good he hadde done vnto them in times past, and the liberty hee had restored them vnto, when he expulsed the tyrant Nabis out of MESSINA. But there were other againe (howbeit very few) that to please Dinocrates, sayed they should hang him on a gibbet, and put him to death as a daungerous enemy, and that would neuer forgiue man that had once offended him: and the rather, because he would be more terrible to Dinocrates, then euer he was before, if he escaped his hands, receiuing such open shame by him. Neuertheles, in the end they carried him into a certaine dungeon vnder the ground, called the treasury, (which had neither light nor aire at all into it, nor dore, nor halfe dore, but a great stone rolled on the mouth of the dungeon) and so they did let him downe the same, and stopped the hole againe with the stone, and watched it with armed men for to keepe him. Now when these young noble ACHAIAN gentlemen had fled vpon the sputre a great way from the enemy, they remembred them selues, and looked round about for Philopœmen: and finding him not in sight, they supposed straight he had bene slaine. Thereupon they stayed a great while, and called for him by name, and perceiuing he aunswered not, they beganne to say among them selues, they were beastes and cowardes to flie in that sort: and how they were dishonored for euer so to haue forsaken their captaine, to saue them selues, who had not spared his owne life, to deliuer them from daunger. Hereupon riding on their way, and enquiring still for him: they were in the end aduertised how he was taken. And then they went and carried those newes through all the townes and cities of ACHAIA, which were very sory for him, and tooke it as a signe of great ill fortune to withstand them. Whereupō they agreed to send Ambassadors forthwith to the MESSIANS, to commaund him: and in the meane time euery man should prepare to arme them selues to goe thither, and get him either by force or loue. When the ACHAIANS had thus sent, Dinocrates feared nothing so much, as that delay of time might saue Philopœmens life: wherefore to preuent it, as ſoone as night came, and that the people were at reſt, he ſtraight cauſed the ſtone to be rolled from the mouth of the dungeon, and willed the hangman to be let downe to Philopœmen with a cup of poyſon to offer him, who was commaunded alſo not to goe from him vntill he had drunke it. When the hangman was come downe, he found Philopœmen laid on the ground vpon a litle cloke, hauing no liſt to ſleepe, he was ſo grieuouſly troubled in his minde. Who when he ſaw light, and the man ſtanding by him, holding a cuppe in his hand with this poyſon, he ſate vpright vpon his couch, howbeit with great paine he was ſo weake: and taking the cuppe in his hand, asked the hangman if he heard any newes of the horſemen that came with him, and ſpecially of Lycortas. The hangman made him anſwer, that the moſt of them were ſaued. Then he caſt his handes a litle ouer his head, and looking merrily on him he ſayd: it is well, ſeeing we are not all vnfortunate. Therewith ſpeaking no moe words, and making other a doe, he drunke vp all the poiſon, and layed him downe as before. So man ſtraue not much withall, his body being brought ſo low, and thereupon the poiſon wrought his effect, and rid him ſtraight out of his paine, The newes of his death ran preſently throughout all ACHAIA, which generally frō high to low was lamented. Whereupon all the ACHAIANS youth and counſellors of their cities and townes, aſſembled them ſelues in the citie of MEGALOPOLIS, where they al agreed without delay to reuenge his death. They made Lycortas their Generall, vnder whoſe conduct they inuaded the MESSENIANS, with force and violence, putting all to the fire and ſword: ſo as the MESSENIANS were ſo feared with this mercileſſe fury, that they yeelded themſelues, and wholly conſented to receiue the ACHAIANS into their city. But Dinocrates wold not giue them leyſure to execute him by iuſtice, for hee killed himſelfe: and ſo did all the reſt make themſelues away, who gaue aduiſe that Philopœmen ſhould be put to death. But thoſe that would haue had Philopœmen hanged on a gibbet, Lycortas cauſed them to be taken, which afterwardes were put to death with all kind of torments. Then they burnt Philopœmens body, and did put his aſhes into a pot. Then they ſtraight departed from MESSINA, not in diſorder, one vpon anothers necke as euery man liſted: but in good order and ray, that in the middeſt of theſe funerals they did make a triumph of victory. The ſouldiers were all crowned with garlands of laurell in token of victory, notwithſtanding the teares ranne downe their cheekes in token of ſorrow, and they ledde their enemies priſoners ſhackled and chained. The funerall pot in the which were Philopœmens aſhes, was ſo couered with garlandes of flowers, noſegaies, and laces, that it could ſcant be ſeene or diſcerned, and was caried by one Polybius a young man, the ſonne of Lycortas, that was Generall at that time to the ACHAIANS: about whom there marched all the nobleſt & chiefeſt of the ACHAIANS, and after them alſo followed all the ſouldiers armed, and their horſes very well furniſhed. For the reſt, they were not ſo ſorrowfull in their countenance, as they are commonly which haue cauſe of ſorrow: nor yet ſo ioyful, as thoſe that came conquerers from ſo great a victory. For all of the cities, townes, and villages in their way as they paſt, came and preſented themſelues to them, to touch the funerall potte of his aſhes, euen as they were wont to take him by the hand, and to make much of him when he was returned from the warres: and did accompany his conuoy vnto the city of MEGALOPOLIS. At the gates wherof, were old men, women and children, which thruſting them ſelues amongeſt the ſouldiers, did renewe the teares and rowes, and lamentations of all the miſerable and vnfortunate city: who tooke it that they had loſt with their citizen, the firſt and chiefeſt place of honor among the ACHAIANS. So he was buried very honorably as appertained vnto him: and the other priſoners of MESSINA, were all ſtoned to death, about his ſepulchre. All the other cities of ACHAIA, beſides many other honors they did vnto him, did ſet vp ſtatues, and as like to him, as could be counterfeited. Afterwards in the vnfortunate time of GREECE, when the city of CORINTHE was burnt and deſtroied by the ROMAINS, there was a malicious ROMAINE that did what he could to haue the ſame pulled down again, by burdening & accuſing Philopœmen (as if he had bene alyue) that he was alwaies enemy to the ROMAINES, and enuied much their proſperity and victories: but after Polybius had aunſwered him: neither the Conſull Mummius, nor his counſellers, nor his tenaunts, would ſuffer them to deface and take away the honors done in memory of ſo great & worthy a mā, although he had many waies done much hurt vnto *T. into Manius. So, these good men then made a difference betweene dutie and profite: and did make honesty and profit two distinct things, and so seperated one from the other, according to reason and iustice. Moreouer they were perswaded, that like as men receiue curtesie and kindnesse of any, so are they bound to requite them againe, with kindnesse and duety. And as men vse to acknowledge the same: euen so ought men to honor and reuerence vertue. And thus much for the life of Philopœmen.

The end of Philopœmenes life.

THE LIFE OF
Titus Quintius Flaminius.

IT is easie to see Titus Quintius Flaminius for me, and stature, by Philopœmenes statue of braſſe, to whom we compare him: the which is now set vp at ROME, neare to great Apollo that was brought from CARTHAGE, and is placed right against the comming into the new place, vnder which there is an inscription in Greeke letters. But for his nature and conditions, they lay of him thus: he would quickly be angry, and yet very ready to pleasure men again. For, if he did punish any man that had angered him, he would do it gently, but his anger did not long continue with him. He did good also to many, and euer them whom he had once pleasured, as if they had done him some pleasure: and was ready to do for them still whom hee found thankfull, because hee would euer make them beholden to him, and thought that as honorable a thing as he could purchase to him selfe. Because greatly sought honor about all things, when any notable seruice was to be done, he would haue himself and no man should take it out of his hand. He would euer be rather with them that needed his helpe, then with those that could helpe him, or doe him good. For, the first seemeth as a meane to exercise his vertue with: the other, he tooke the as his fellowes and powers of honour with him. He came to mans state, when the city of ROME had greatest warres and trouble. At that time all the youth of ROME, which were of age to carry weapon, were sent to the warre, to learne to trayle the pike, and how to become good Captaines. Thus he entred into marshall affaires, and the first charge he tooke, was in the warre against Titus Quintius first charge in warre.

Hannibal of CARTHAGE, where he was made Colonell of a thousand footemen, vnder Marcellus the consul: who being slaine by an ambush Hannibal had laied for him betweene the cities of BANTIA, and VENVSA, then they did choose Titus Quintius Flaminius gouernor of the prouince and city of TARENTVM, which was now taken againe the second time. In this gouernment of his, he wan the reputation as much of a good and iust man, as hee did of an expert and skilfull Captaine. By reason whereof, when the ROMAINES were requested to send to inhabite the cities of NARNIA and COSSA, he was appointed the chief leader of the, which chiefly gaue him heart and corage to aspire at the first to the Consulship, passing ouer all other meane offices, as to be Ædile, Tribune, or Prætor, by which (as by decrees) other young men were wont to attaine the Consulship. Therefore when the time came that the Consuls should be elected, he did present him selfe among other, accompanied with a great number of those he had brought with him, to inhabite the two new townes, who did make earnest sute for him.
